Her eyes danced and her dimples suddenly appeared. "You didn't think, Mr. Guy A. Pearce," she pronounced deliberately, "that you would see me in New York? Did you? This is what comes of your carrying off my old doll in your suit-case."

The young man said nothing. His admiring eyes swept her slender figure. From the golden brown of hair and hat that framed her sparkling face, to the little shoes that ventured forth from the hem of her discreetly lengthened skirt, there was not a jarring note. How could he have forgotten how pretty she was?

The girl grew very demure beneath his gaze. As they moved through the crowd toward the waiting automobile, she told him sedately all her plans and prospects. "You see," she explained, "I'm going to learn how to design real gowns for real people. When I've learned all I can here, I'm going abroad. I'm planning about it already. I'm going first to Paris, of course, but I'm not going to stop there. I'm going to see a lot of this nice big world! If I like Europe very well"—she paused reflectively—"perhaps I'll settle down there on the other side of the ocean. So you'll never see me again."

"Never see you again?" he returned. "Not by a jugful."

The girl laughed, but she was now very much in earnest. "You don't know," she insisted, "how kind your sister and Mrs. Worthington have been. Why, I owe everything to them."

"Everything?" he questioned jealously.

"Yes, everything—to them and to you," she added hastily, as she half turned toward him and laid an impetuous little brown glove on his sleeve.

He looked a little mollified, but still he frowned. He intended to make that sister of his—and Mrs. Worthington too—understand that Mary Jane belonged not to them but to him, by right of original discovery.

"If I hadn't found you that day on the bridge—"

"Oh, I know," she interrupted, "that was the beginning of it all. I can't ever repay you."

"Yes, you can," he replied significantly.

"How?" she questioned, and her eyes were wide and her face was the innocent face of a child, but still there flitted across it a little smile that said, "Perhaps," instead of "How?"

"Well," he temporized, as they drew nearer the group ahead, "we'll talk about that another time."

"Yes, people," he called, for the rest of the party were impatiently awaiting them at the door of the motor car, "we're coming. I've just been telling this young lady of the beauties of—er—Switzerland—and she has promised—well, or rather I think I can persuade her—to go along next time."

MOTOR CARS

Made in Chalmers Shops

Standard Bred and Without a Blemish

The Chalmers "Thirty-Six" is, we think, the top notch in motor car construction. There is no way of spending more money on a car to make it more efficient, more reliable, more comfortable and convenient. There is no way of reducing the cost without taking something out of the quality.

The price, $1950, is possible only because every important part is made right in the Chalmers plant. We buy the raw steel, wood, brass, etc., and turn out the complete car. There are no parts makers' profits such as the assembled car prices include. That is why the price is $1950 instead of $3000.

Making all the important parts, axles, frames, motors and gears, we know what each will do.

Every Chalmers is standard bred and without blemish. It has speed, power and staying qualities. Its wind is sound for hills and heavy going.

Consider these notable Chalmers features for 1913:

Electric lights; Turkish cushions; nickel trimmings; improved springs. Long stroke motor; 4-forward speed transmission; demountable rims. Self-starter; Eleven-inch upholstery; increased wheel base. Big wheels and tires; dual ignition system; speedometer. Special silk mohair top; rain vision windshield.

Let us send you our book on the making of Chalmers cars, and our new catalog. Just fill out and return the attached coupon.

"Thirty-six", $1950; "Six", $2400.

RECOLLECTIONS OF GENERAL BOOTH

BY JENNIE FOWLER-WILLING

I MET General Booth first at the Lord Mayor's reception of the Ecumenical Council at the Mansion House in London—tall, lithe, with eagle eye and nose. I told him at once that the one person in England that I most wanted to see was his wife. Gladstone, Tennyson, Bright, Josephine Butler, Queen Victoria, were then on the stage. What a group of royalties! The frail, fine-grained, brave woman, whose "Never!" that day in Conference, when the authorities tried to tie them down to one circuit, and who, with four children, and not one penny of income, dared risk all for the rescue of the submerged—that word, like a reveille of relief, had sent the Salvation Army drumbeat around the globe! I felt that I must have a word with that woman.

He shook his head. "She's resting to gather strength for the next charge. No one can see her!" Our talk ended in an engagement for the next Saturday.

There we sat—two women in desperate earnest to see something doing for the hopeless poor. I used my American privilege of questioning, and she gave answer with the utmost frankness. When I set my face again toward my hostelry, I was sure I had touched the true inwardness of the strange movement that even the Greatheart Spurgeon thought a travesty of Christianity.

At the table I saw the sweetest and most loving of mothers with her fully responsive children—there were eight of them in all. General Booth is reported to have said that he would be glad if there were eighty of them, they were all so helpful. Surely enough, the London papers, in their notices, would announce General Booth to preach at such a place in the East End, Mrs. Booth at such a place in the West End, and all the Booth children that were old enough to carry a message were preaching, praying, or singing somewhere to win the uncared-for.

I had taken a good look at the London slums. My young lady and I, with "know - nothing - fear - nothing" zeal, had made a dash for Whitechapel to hear some of the Booths. We had made our escape before the close of the service, when we saw the inadequacy of the police to handle the crowds. I had gone with a reputable city missionary to her "girls' parlor," where the young girls, too far beneath the surface to go out to service, came from their four-family cellars, with chalk-mark partitions, to be shown how to handle a needle on their ragged gowns.

The lady told me that the East End pugilists were mainly women. She had had a terrible, almost dangerous, scuffle with the girls in trying to save one of them from a beating, because she didn't tell the others that her mother was going to fight another woman in a place hid away to escape the police, who had broken up the fight once or twice. She had cheated them out of seeing the fun; and the lady, trying to save her from their anger, had come in for a share of the drubbing.

I had gone away from those dens and lairs with sick heart and reeling brain. But here was a refined family who were ready to live in them for the sake of helping those London heathen to a better life!

They say that fortunes are made from Paris waste. The Booths believed that good Christians could be made out of that human wreckage; and they braved all that it might be done.

General Booth's sense of humor stood him in good stead in dealing with those slum people. Sometimes, when Mrs. Booth would be preaching one of her fine sermons to a great audience of Salvationists, perhaps she, who was always frail, would need a moment's vocal rest. The general would break in with, "Comrades, give her a volley!" and the "Amens" of those thousands of stout English throats would have raised the roof, if sound could have done it.

I saw him once in Exeter Hall at a slum anniversary. He had asked the "Slum Mother" to tell the beginnings of the work. She was talking a trifle too long for such a mercurial audience. The general caught her hands and danced up and down the platform, while the rank and file shouted vociferously. I have seen prolix speakers called down and sung down, but that old lady was the only one I ever saw danced down!

I went away from the Booth home feeling that I had talked with the greatest woman the world had ever known, except Mary, the mother of our Lord.

London's three greatest funerals show the appreciation of unselfishness hid in the big, needy, human hearts, that seem so hard to reach, and fit only for the moral junk-heap: that of David Livingstone, when he was borne to his resting-place in Westminster Abbey. (Punch put it strongly when he called for "all flags at half-mast," while they carried to the Abbey the man of "weaver-kin" who gave his life for darkest Africa). Those of William and Catharine Booth taught the same lesson. The general loomed larger, with thirty-four thousand at his bier, when they carried him over his slum battlefields than when he stood before the Oxford chancellor to receive his great degree, and was hailed as the "tender-hearted protector of the lowest classes of the people."

"GOOD STUFF"

A Confirmed Coffee Drinker Takes to Postum

A housewife was recently surprised when cook served Postum instead of coffee. She says:

"For the last five or six years I have been troubled with nervousness, indigestion and heart trouble. I couldn't get any benefit from the doctor's medicine, so finally he ordered me to stop drinking coffee, which I did.

"I drank hot water while taking the doctor's medicine, with some improvement, then went back to coffee with the same old trouble as before.

"A new servant girl told me about Postum—said her folks used it and liked it in place of coffee. We got a package but I told her I did not believe my husband would like it, as he was a great coffee drinker.

"To my surprise he called for a third cup, said it was "good stuff" and wanted to know what it was. We have used Postum ever since and both feel better than we have in years.

"My husband used to have bad spells with his stomach and would be sick three or four days, during which time he could not eat or drink anything. But since he gave up coffee and took to Postum, he has had no more trouble, and we now fully believe it was all caused by coffee.

"I have not had any return of my former troubles since drinking Postum, and feel better and can do more work than in the last ten years. We tell everyone about it—some say they tried it and did not like it. I tell them it makes all the difference as to how it's made. It should me made according to directions—then it is delicious."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the book, "The Road to Wellville" in pkgs. "There's a reason."

OUR YOUNGER READERS

WHAT SHALL WE DO TO-NIGHT?

THIS is the season when, after a busy day at school, boys and girls are looking for jolly ways to spend the long sweet evenings at home, and we plan to give many suggestions, with lots of fun tucked away in them, right here in the Cozy Corner. The first one is an Evening of Tableaux.

It will be great fun ransacking the attic for old finery out of which to make up the costumes; and if you get them up really very nicely, perhaps the committee on entertainment may ask you to repeat them for the benefit of your church.

Tableaux Nos. 1 and 2—Scenes in the Life of Pocahontas.

1. Pleading for the life of Captain John Smith. 2. Her wedding with John Rolfe.

Tableaux Nos. 3 and 4—Scenes from Hiawatha.

1. Hiawatha and Nocomis. 2. Hiawatha and Minnehaha.

Tableaux Nos. 5 and 6—Scenes from the Life of Priscilla, the Puritan Maiden.

1. Miles Standish and John Alden. 2. "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?"

Tableau No. 7—Betsy Ross Working on the First American Flag, with Washington Standing By and Making Suggestions.

Tableau No. 8—A Daughter of the Pioneer.

Tableau No. 9—A Petted Daughter of the South.

The little Southern lady in soft brocade, powdered hair, high-heeled slippers, short gloves, a fan and a fancy reticule will be a charming contrast to the sturdy pioneer girl in buckskin costume, with a bowie knife and carrying a musket.

Tableau No. 10—The Girl from the Plantation and the Girl from Salem.

The daughter of a wealthy planter dressed in a soft muslin skirt with many frills, a short bodice with round neck, soft full sleeves, and hair parted in the middle and curled, wearing behind each ear a red rose, sitting in an easy chair playing a guitar. The girl from Salem sits primly in a high-necked, hoop-skirted costume, perfectly plain, with long shoulders, sugar-scoop bonnet tied with broad ribbons, and a large shawl.

Tableau No. 11—A Group of Old-fashioned Girls.

Tableau No. 12—The Golf Girl, Motor Girl, Basket-Ball Girl, Yachting Girl, Driving Girl, Tennis Girl, Girl Athlete, the All-Round Girl.

Tableau Last—The Girl that Everybody Loves.

The prettiest girl obtainable, dressed in evening dress, sitting on a quaint little sofa surrounded with boxes of flowers and candy, and a dozen men grouped about her in various attitudes of service and adoration.

The Harvest Moon

Over fields that are ripe with the sweetness
That hides in the full-tasseled corn,
Over vineyards slow reaching completeness,
Dim purpling at dusk and at morn,
Shine down in thine affluent splendor,

Beam soft, mother-hearted, and tender;
Earth hath not a holier time!

The Old Woman and Her Cats

There once was a lovely old lady,
Who dwelt in a house by the sea;
Her home was a bower of roses,
As sweet as a home could be.

Now she sits by the lonely fireside
And dreams of the days that are past;
In memory she sees the dear faces
Just as she saw them last.

Oh, the flowers bloom ever as sweetly,
The cat and the kittens play,
But mother is listening to voices
That she heard in the yesterday.

The Thing That Makes a Pen Write Keeps the Parker From Leaking

WHEN you set an ordinary fountain pen in your vest pocket, point up, most of the ink runs down into the reservoir below. But some always stays in the feed tube.

When your body heat—98 degrees—reaches the air in the pen, the air expands—pushes up through the inky feed tube—pushes the ink up and out—messes the writing end of the pen, and blacks your fingers when you remove the cap.

That is why ordinary fountain pens leak and smear.

Now the Parker, unlike other fountain pens, has a curved feed tube. The end touches the barrel wall. This touch creates Capillary Attraction. This Capillary Attraction draws all the ink down out of the feed tube before the expanding air goes up.

That is why the Parker does not leak and smear. The curved feed tube is the famous Lucky Curve.

And when you turn the pen down to write, the touch of the pen point to the paper creates Capillary Attraction too, which draws the ink down on the paper.

Thus the thing that makes a pen write is the same thing that keeps the Parker Pen from leaking—to wit: Capillary Attraction.

14k gold pens with hardest Iridium points make Parkers write without scratching or "kicking." Parker Spear Head Ink Controller won't let the ink flow too fast or too slow.

Standard style Parker Lucky Curve Fountain Pens $1.50 to $250.00, according to size and ornamentation.

PARKER
LUCKY CURVE
FOUNTAIN PEN

New Parker Jack Knife Safety Pen can't leak in any position, in any pocket. Comes also in pen knife sizes for lady's purse. $2.50 up.

New Parker Disappearing Clip clinches like a drowning man, but disappears when you write.

Today A Million Meals

A million meals were served today which included Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

In some they were served with sugar and cream. In some they were mixed with fruit.

And countless children tonight ate Puffed Wheat or Rice, like crackers, in bowls of milk.

There was never another ready-cooked cereal enjoyed like these million meals.

All Due to Prof. Anderson

We claim none of the credit for these remarkable foods. Our only part is to tell folks about them and to see that people are kept supplied.

You owe the delight to Prof. A. P. Anderson, who solved the problem of exploded grains.

For these grains are puffed by a steam explosion, following terrific heat. All the granules of the grain are blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act.

And the curious fact is that all this is accomplished without breaking the coats of the grain.

Puffed Wheat, 10c Puffed Rice, 15c

Except in Extreme West

The exploded grains are eight times normal size. They are airy and porous and crisp.

Each grain is filled with a myriad cells, surrounded by thin toasted walls.

The grains melt in the mouth—melt into granules which have a delicious flavor. Nearly all folks consider these thin brown grains the most enticing of cereal creations.

Like Porous Nuts

The taste of the grains is like toasted nuts.

However you serve them the grains taste like nut meats—like nut meats made porous and melting and thin.

They are used in candy making—used in frosting cake—used to garnish ice cream. When eaten in milk you get the same almond taste—the flavor of roasted nuts.

THE ROMAN CHURCH IN POLITICS

A Lutheran Pastor's Inquiry

(From a letter to Lieutenant-General Miles.)

A FEW days ago there came into my hands a copy of the Principles and Constitution of the Guardians of Liberty. As the youngest son of Brigadier General Herman Haupt, who did so much with the railroad and bridge work during the Rebellion to help the Northern Army win the war, it makes my blood boil to know how our liberties to-day are being threatened by an ever watchful and insidious foe. I am anxious to know just what the Guardians of Liberty stand for and how they purpose to carry out the preservation of our liberties. If there is any prospect of winning out, I wish to go into it with my whole soul.

Nearly thirty years ago, when father was called to St. Paul, Minn., to open and organize the Northern Pacific, I came out as a young missionary, and the first man I ran into was Dr. Neill, a fellow alumnus of the University of Pennsylvania, who had been in the State for more than twenty years, and he said to me, "Haupt, I'm glad you've come; keep your eye on the Romanists; they are trying to get the State and nation." I did so, and found, by accident more than by intention, one of our young Swedish Lutheran girls who was rescued from the Roman Catholic House of the Good Shepherd. I was asked to investigate the matter and found that she had been committed for ninety days for petty larceny, and had been detained for fifteen months over her time. She was a strong, well-built girl, and was put into the laundry and served all that time at hard labor. A Protestant earning good money for the Romanists! I found that they had five sources of revenue and were receiving money from the county treasury of $1 per week—more than we could support those girls for at the county workhouse per head on much better fare. The girls received scarcely enough to keep body and soul together. Their institutions are not under the surveillance of the public in any way, and free American girls are detained against their will and compelled to labor for the enriching of the Roman Church.

For three years I was called to labor in the penal institutions of Pittsburg, Pa. They have two such houses there. They ran short of help. A Roman Catholic chief of police and a Roman Catholic court judge soon fixed things up. Several houses were raided; nearly one hundred girls were taken out; the men were fined from $5 to $10 each and turned loose on the community to fill up the houses with fresh material, and the poor girls, most of them, were sent to the two houses of the Good Shepherd. Then, too, I believe they were drawing large sums of money from the State treasury for the support of these private, sectarian prisons. How can loyal Americans stand for any such thing? And yet it is being done on the quiet all over this country. What I wish to know is, what aggressive measures do the Guardians of Liberty plan to put forth to remove the curse of these Roman prisons in a free land, and to guard the different political parties from having each one nominate Roman Catholic officials for each office, so that the voters will be helpless and will have to vote for one of them if he votes at all?

On Sunday last, being the nearest to the 4th of July, it was my privilege to preach to members of the Grand Army of the Republic at Albert Lea, and as a consequence two of them interviewed me with reference to the peril as they see it, and our views certainly coincided. In writing thus to you, I feel sure that you are ever

Stop Paring Corns

End Them in a Scientific Way

Don't keep on paring the same old corn. That merely takes off the top layer. And paring often leads to infection.

A chemist has invented a wax which removes them. It is used in the Blue-jay plaster.

This little plaster is applied in a jiffy. It stops the pain instantly, and it fits so neatly that you simply forget it.

The heat of the foot sets the wax gently working. It loosens the corn root, callous and all and in 48 hours the whole corn comes out.

No soreness, no pain, no discomfort. And no more corn. Tight shoes may bring another, but that corn can't come back. This little plaster now removes a million corns a month. Let it get rid of yours.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

How the Jesuits Teach in New Mexico

THE teaching of Jesuit priests, who dominate and control the Catholic Church in this section, is done secretly in the confessionals. Not one of these priests, so far as I know, is an American. All are from Europe, mostly from Italy, Germany and Spain. Their hatred of everything American is intense, and was made more so by the war we had with Spain. These priests teach the Mexican children that all Protestant churches are the abodes of the evil one, and under no consideration must be entered. In a paper read by a graduate of the New Mexico Normal School it was stated that 90 per cent. of school children in New Mexico never passed the fifth grade. This is true, and it is because of the teachings of the Jesuits. They are also taught never to speak English unless forced to do so by necessity! and they never do, notwithstanding that all are taught English in the schools, and Spanish is not allowed to be spoken either in the schools or on the playgrounds. To a strange American, the children will declare they do not understand English. All this is impressed on their young minds by the Jesuit priests. W. M. S.

Answered Prayers

A LOVED one has been in danger in Mexico; we have been praying that God would bring him safely out of that country, and our prayer is answered."

So prayer is not an impractical, out-of-date matter, but a power that can be applied in the most modern and matter-of-fact affairs. Browning tells of the humble Christian who, when the king had consummated a vast plot for his destruction, Caught at God's skirts, and prayed.

So in the time of the darkest, and the mightiest, and the latest peril, Christians to-day get in touch with the infinite power and find deliverance for themselves and their friends. The letter about the friend in unsettled Mexico was from "A Reader," New York.

There is a sensible note in this bit of praise, too: "I prayed earnestly that God would spare my life and give me health and strength to get back to my work. I thank him that I have improved until able to go through regularly with my daily work." So writes M. R. S., Brooklyn, N. Y. This dear lady, Mrs. A. T. A., East Smithfield, Pa., is having Paul's experience repeated. The thorn is not taken away, but Jesus gives strength to bear it. She writes: "Praise the Lord! I know he sustains me in intense suffering, and he also hears and answers the prayers of loved ones."

The following acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received:

Learn Something New About "Efficiency"

There are perhaps a thousand reasons why man of today is only 50 per cent. efficient, yet ninety per cent. of those reasons have been traced to one cause.

It would doubtless be most interesting for every American, man or woman, to read a treatise by a specialist on the subject and this will be forwarded without cost if you address Chas. A. Tyrrell, M.D., Dept. 162-J, 134 West 65th Street, New York.

Perhaps this little book will help you materially in your business and social duties. At any rate it will tell you a few things about yourself that you never knew before.

This Water Sealed Heat-Tight Top Makes Fireless Cooking Perfect

UNTIL we invented the "Water Sealed" Top of the "Ideal" Fireless Cooker a perfect Fireless Cooker did not exist. You have only one question to consider in choosing a Fireless Cooker—which one best retains the heat? Right out of the top—the hottest part—the heat streams away from the ordinary Fireless Cooker—and it's that precious heat, which is the one thing needful.

Imprisoned heat is what does the cooking in a Fireless Cooker. When you examine your "Ideal" Fireless Cooker, you will see that loss of heat simply cannot take place through its "Water Sealed" Top. This means that the "Ideal" Fireless Cooker Cooks Faster, Cooks Better and Keeps the Food Hot Longer than any other Fireless Cooker. It will Roast, Bake, Steam, Stew and Boil, and saves 50% of the fuel and reduces work and worry to a minimum.

"Ideal" Fireless Cook Stoves are Lined With "Pure" Aluminum

You want a Cooker lined with a metal which will not rust, pinhole, corrode, chip or crack. "PURE" Aluminum is the only insurance against these things. Separate cover over each compartment. Equipment of "WEAR EVER" Aluminum Utensils.

"Winter Suits Like New With Diamond Dyes"

"I think I ought to tell you for the benefit of others about my success with Diamond Dyes. Before I learned the magic of Diamond Dyes, I used to scrimp and worry every Spring and Fall about how to get new, fresh clothes for my daughters and myself.

"I guess the two snapshots I enclose will show you that I don't worry much now. These are two Winter suits I made over from a tight tan serge suit and a brown broadcloth dress and coat. I cut two of the latest——suit patterns, ripped the old suit and dress with coat up carefully and they are just like new.

"I also dyed some old ostrich plumes and ribbons and we made three hats with them.

MRS. H. G. BURGESS, New York City.

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for wool or silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience for over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics, and vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

OUR MAIL-BAG

T. C., Grove City, Pa. Please explain (1) Rev. 20: 5 and (2) Matt. 24: 21-40.

1. This refers to the first resurrection—"the resurrection of the just." The earth, not yet being transformed, is not fully prepared for the transfigured Church, but from heaven the transfigured saints with Christ rule the earth. 2. This portion of the chapter (verses 21-40) relates to the Second Coming and the signs or indications thereof. The first portion of the same chapter was prophetic of the coming destruction of Jerusalem. This twofold prophecy has already been discussed in THE MAIL-BAG.

J. B., Bristol, Va. How can I make putty for window glazing?

To enough whiting add as much linseed oil as will beat it to a stiff dough.

R. B. C., Fort Leavenworth, Kan. Is an atom the smallest particle of matter?

Until recently, the atom was considered the indivisible part of matter; but advances in radio-activity point to the fact that the atom is a complex system, consisting of a positively charged nucleus around which are grouped numerous negatively charged particles of infinitesimal dimensions, called electrons. A great deal has yet to be learned about the electron. Though regarded now as the unit of the material universe, it is really nothing but electricity, though it possesses the properties of matter—mass, momentum, kinetic energy and probably weight.

H. E. K., Wellsville, O. It is useless to speculate on conditions in other worlds, especially with regard to their inhabitants, when we do not even know that they are inhabited. At best, science furnishes only presumption based upon supposed climatic conditions. It is all God's universe, however, and under his love and care, and we do right to hold that he makes nothing in vain and that if there are intelligent beings on those distant spheres they, like ourselves, will have a share in his thoughts and be under his providence.

L. J. L., Napoleon, O. Please explain Matt. 27: 52, 53.

These "sleeping saints" (see Thes. 4: 14) are held to be Old Testament believers who, having served the Lord faithfully according to their lights, and who looked forward to the promise of the Messiah's coming, were quickened at the moment of Jesus' death, although they did not come out of their graves until his resurrection (see verse 53). The opening of the graves was symbolic proclamation that death was "swallowed up in victory"; and the rising of the saints after Jesus' resurrection fittingly showed that the Saviour of the world was to be the "first" that should rise from the dead. (See Acts 26: 23; Col. 1: 18; Rev. 1: 5.)

R. B. S., Memphis, Tenn. What is radium? Explain its properties.

Radium is a metal, though never prepared in metallic form, and is obtained from the ore of pitchblende in very small quantities. It is generally made up as a chloride or bromide and looks like common salt. In this form it lasts indefinitely, without any apparent physical or chemical change. To give the properties of radium here would require too much space. For a clear article on the subject see Marvels of Modern Science in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Home Library.

F. B. M., Seattle, Wash. How does Pintsch light, used on railway trains, differ from ordinary gas light?

Pintsch light is obtained from compressed gas, and is used by nearly every railroad system in the country. The gas is compressed from oil, 125 pounds of pressure to the square inch, giving one foot of oil gas equal to the illuminating power of five feet of coal gas. The lamps for this light are of special design with four or six burners.

A. F. S., Raspeburg, Md. The Bible says we should beware of "false prophets in sheep's clothing." How are we to distinguish them from good preachers and teachers?

The warning is against teachers who come claiming to be authorized interpreters of the mind of God and expounders of his Word, yet who are false leaders, having no spiritual light in themselves and being unfitted to guide others into the light of truth. Coming in sheep's clothing implies that they present a plausible exterior, their lips filled with smooth, persuasive words; but they do not teach nor do they know the Gospel of Jesus. They teach instead a man-made Gospel, and make a great show of liberal ideas. The "old paths" they discard for new ways of reaching heaven. They cast doubt upon the essentials of the faith and teach the doctrines of error. Any teacher who does not hold fast to the cardinal points of the Gospel, or who does not emphasize the divine nature and the mediatorial office of Christ and his sacrifice and atonement; who would exalt works above faith; who belittles the importance of the revealed Word, and casts doubt upon its genuineness and authority; who compromises with sin and the weakness of our nature; who leads his flock to regard with doubt all that pertains to the invisible realm of faith and the supernatural; who attaches more importance to the operations of the human mind than to all else—such a person is not calculated to lead others in the way of life everlasting. It is therefore of the very first importance that the pastor who is chosen for a church should himself be a Christian, living the Christian life, else, however sincere he may be in his efforts, he will not be able to lead others aright.

P. D. E., Norwich, N. Y. Please explain I. Tim. 5: 24.

There are two kinds of sins here specified: The first, those that are palpably manifest (which is the true translation of "open beforehand"). Such sins are evident or notorious and are consequently judged of men. The other kind is hidden sin, which is not disclosed until hereafter. In the next verse, a similar distinction is made with regard to the two classes of good works. The term "going before to judgment" refers to acts which are their own heralds—"crying sins," which accuse their perpetrator.

M. F. G., Rome, Ga., writes: "In your September 25 issue, under the head of "Providing for Old Age," you quote Mr. Graves, of the King Home for Old Men, as saying: 'Only one man in ten thousand is self-supporting at seventy.' I cannot imagine how he could have made such an error, unless he has been living in a very sickly country. This is a city of about 14,000. There are here more than fifty men over seventy, who are making a living without any assistance. Some of them are a good deal over seventy, near eighty. This applies to whites only. Most of them served four years in the Southern army, which was a very hard life and calculated to shorten their days. I suppose there are as many ladies of the same age, but as to this I have not investigated. This must be an unusually healthy locality, and there are more old people in it in proportion to numbers than any other place I know of. Fourteen miles from here there lived until a few years ago Mr. Nathan White, a farmer. When he was 106 years old he planted and made all alone three bales of cotton and three hundred bushels of corn, besides splitting his own rails and cutting firewood for the family. I took him to a photographer and he walked without a cane—walked too fast for me. This man lived to be about 112 years old. He was a native of North Carolina."

L. C., Knoxville, Tenn. What is the order of succession to the presidency in case of death or removal?

By act of Congress, January, 1886, the following is the succession in case of death or removal, inability or resignation of the President or Vice-President: Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney-General, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Interior.

R. E. B., Manitoba. Please explain Heb. 7: 3.

There are two interpretations of this passage. One, which is most generally used, is that his parentage was so obscure and his genealogy so unimportant that it is not recorded. The other is that the mystery veiling his birth is designed to impress us with his exalted nature and office as a priest from all eternity. Melchizedek's person, his office, his relation to Christ (of whose divine high priesthood he was the type and forerunner), and his sovereignty, which was recognized and acknowledged by Abraham, have given rise to innumerable discussions and many conjectures. Some have held that he was Shem, son of Noah, who had survived the deluge; others that he was an angel; and still others that he was the Son of God. This last-named conclusion would appear unwarranted, however, and evidently it was not held by the early church, as Heb. 7: 3 says he was simply "like unto" the Son of God, and in chapter 6: 20 Christ is referred to as a priest "after" the order of Meichizedek, which phrase would hardly have been employed had the two been identical. Josephus, the Jewish historian, says that he was a righteous king who "on account of his virtues was made the priest of God." This combination of the twofold office of priest and king (not uncommon in remote times) appears for the first time in the Scripture in Genesis and afforded Abraham an opportunity of testifying his gratitude to God in the usual manner by making an offering of one-tenth of all the spoil of battle.

H. D. Johnson, Allenton, Mo. 1. Please define Christian liberality, especially in regard to paying ministers, missionaries and other Christian workers. 2. Is "knowledge" in II. Pet. 1: 5 "knowledge of God" as in verse two? Has "virtue" in verse three the same meaning as "virtue" in verse five of II. Pet. 1? 3. Which do you consider the cardinal Christian virtues?

1. We are told in Scripture that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and this applies to ministers as well as others. There are people who seem to think that because "salvation is free," therefore they have no legitimate financial responsibilities in connection with the Gospel. The attitude of the real Christian is altogether different from this. He regards all his possessions as gifts from God, entrusted to his keeping and to be administered as a sacred stewardship. Many very excellent Christians set apart a portion of their means as the "Lord's money," and find a blessing in so doing. It is a disgrace to a church or congregation to have its ministers underpaid, and its missionaries and others, who devote their lives to the furtherance of the Gospel, insufficiently supported. Such men are "robbing God." They are not Christians at heart, although they may be such nominally. 2. The chapter in question is an exhortation to all the Christian graces. The "knowledge" in verse 2 is better interpreted "full knowledge" of the unity of the Father and Son (see John 14: 7-11.) The "knowledge" quoted in verse three is that experimental realization of God which is the first step in the new life. The "glory and virtue" (verse three) refer to the glory and transcendent moral excellence that characterize God's majesty. The word "virtue" is seldom used, however, in expressing the divine qualities. The same word (in verse five) means moral excellence and strength after the manner of the divine perfection, though in infinitely lesser degree and in a human sense. 3. The cardinal virtues, so-called, are four, viz.: prudence, justice, fortitude, temperance, but the wider range of Christian virtues is set forth in verses five, six and seven of the chapter in question.

C. Z., Canby, Calif. 1. Works of necessity, charity and mercy may be done on the Sabbath, and a visit to a sick relative would certainly seem to be within that category. 2. Pork is forbidden under the Mosaic law, and is condemned by others than Jews as unwholesome, though there are many who eat it. 3. Romans 14th chapter is devoted to the discussion of Christian forbearance and the consideration that is due from us to our weaker brethren. The general principle is laid down that we should do nothing, either in eating, drinking, speech or action, which would offend our brother or cause him to stumble. Paul lays down the rule that while ritual distinctions are at an end, "it is good not to do anything whereby thy brother is offended or made weak." Nor should we do that which our own conscience condemns, because if we do that concerning which we are in doubt, and have no faith in it, we are self-condemned by our own wilful violation of conscience. 4. There is no harm in innocent games in moderation, or for exercise, provided always that the element of gambling be left out. 5. God is ready to forgive "to the uttermost," if we come to him repentant, asking forgiveness for Christ's sake. 6. God's law should be first in our hearts and lives, and we are justified in disobeying any one where obedience would involve breaking God's law. 7. Restitution and atonement, as far as lies within our power, are commanded. We are to pay our debts, right the wrongs we have done wherever we can, make peace where we have quarreled, restore what we have taken away. Failing the performance of this duty on our part (if it can be performed) we have no right to claim divine forgiveness.

Miscellaneous

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. The story of Gabrielle (which appeared in serial form in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) was to have been published in book form, but the author died before carrying out her purpose.

Reader, W. Va. Insurance is a proper provision for those who are dependent upon us and for whom we can leave no estate, or make no other provision. The whole subject of insurance is now under legal regulation, and is as far removed from gambling as can be imagined.

Adelaide L. Mason, a reader of this paper in Chelsea, Mass., suggests that "Anxious," Rutledge, Pa., whose inquiry concerning Christian peace and assurance was lately answered in THE MAIL-BAG, should procure the book Abide in Christ, by Rev. Andrew Murray, which she will find most serviceable. It may be procured through any bookseller.

J. M. D., Germantown, Pa. There are at the present time 80,000 Protestant Christians in Japan, estimated. Forty years ago there was not a single Protestant church in that country. This is the best answer to those who claim that the Gospel is making but little progress in the Mikado's empire. Although it has encountered difficulties there as elsewhere, it has surmounted them all, one after another, and the future looks bright, and gives assurance of still greater spiritual harvests.

No Thin Man or Woman Should Miss This Opportunity

We invite you to try a scientific flesh-forming food at our expense—a wonderful discovery endorsed by ministers, physicians and scientists — that puts good solid flesh and fat on people who are thin and underweight.

50c Box Given for Trial

"AND THEY USED TO BE SO THIN"

THIS new way for increasing weight is called Sargol. Thousands of thin people have gained flesh by using it. It produces fat by correcting the faults of digestion and food assimilation.

Most people are thin, not because they don't get enough to eat, but because they do not get proper nourishment out of the food they eat. Sargol stops this waste—it saves the food-fats and the muscle building protein—every ounce of food gives its full amount of nourishment to the blood—millions of new flesh-forming cells are created and hurried to those parts of the body where impoverished nature is crying for them to round out and develop the emaciated figure to its normal proportions.

Women whose clothes never look stylish because of their bony figures—Sargol is for you.

Men who lack energy because of poorly nourished bodies—men who are handicapped in business because of their small size—Sargol is for you.

If you want beautiful impressive figures—if you want full attractive faces—if you want the energy, the nerve force and vitality that can only come from a well-nourished body, mail the coupon below and get a trial package at our expense. Address your letter to-day to the Sargol Company, 9-x Herald Building, Binghamton, N. Y.

IF you want proof we will furnish it—gladly—read these letters—the statements of those who have tried, been convinced and will swear to the virtues of Sargol. The full address of any of these people will be sent if you want it.

Rev. George W. Davis Says:

"I have made a faithful trial of the Sargol treatment and must say that it has brought me new life and vigor. I have gained twenty pounds and now weigh 170 pounds, and, what is better, I have gained the days of my boyhood. It has been the turning point of my life."

Mrs. A. I. Rodenheiser Writes:

"I have gained immensely since I took Sargol, for I only weighed about 106 pounds when I began using it, and now I weigh 130 pounds, so really this makes 24 pounds. I feel stronger and am feeling better than ever before, and now I carry rosy cheeks, which is something I could never say before."

Clay Johnson Says:

"Please send me another ten-day treatment. I am well pleased with Sargol. It has been the light of my life. I am getting back to my proper weight again. When I began to take Sargol I only weighed 138 pounds, and now, four weeks later, I am weighing 153 pounds and feeling fine."

Your Son's Future

A PROMINENT minister, well along in years, recently made the following statement: "You can't develop strength of character in a boy or prepare him for a vocation unless you teach him to work." He speaks of his three sons, now prosperous men, saying: "Other people might have expected them to be better than ordinary boys when young, but I did not. Two things I did always require of them, however, and these were strict obedience and plenty of wholesome work."

It is this wholesome work for boys in which we wish to interest you in regard to your son. A definite pursuit during an hour a day or several hours each week, with an incentive; some activity that will keep him in the open air and at the same time off the street-corners; an occupation that will exercise his mind and body, that will make him bright and alert, and teach him the fundamental principles of business. You will agree this is exactly what your boy needs.

We will furnish plenty of incentive. A Handsome Shetland Pony, with Cart and Harness complete, is given as a reward of merit to the best boy. Watches, Knives, Name Stamps, and other prizes, too numerous to mention, are additional rewards.

With your assistance and encouragement we feel sure that your son will make a success of this little venture. Let him send the coupon below and enclose with it 15 cents in stamps to pay for five (5) copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the wholesale rate of three cents per copy.

Upon receipt of the coupon and money, we will send your son ten (10) copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which are to be sold at five cents each. He pays for five —we send five additional copies free. He sells them all for five cents each, which provides him with capital for his second supply.

If this Coupon is mailed immediately, we will send him a Christian Herald Gold and Enamel Crest Pin "FREE." (See illustration above). Please act at once.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

so inspired him that he actually laughed and pressed the change upon his customer. The little match-vender had learned a lesson that would make a man out of him. This is a story that will do to tell the younger children.

Here is another that both the children and the grown-up people should read. The United States Commissioner of Labor took upon himself as a part of his work to examine into the conditions of child labor in the District of Columbia. He turned his attention to the investigation of newsboys, many of whom he found were acting the part of extortionists by begging to keep the change when a nickel was handed to them. Kind-hearted but thoughtless people said "Yes" to the ragged little newsies, and thus unwittingly started them on a dishonorable course of life. The commissioner one evening was accosted by a little newsboy with long baby curls, to buy his "last paper," which of course he did. He moved off a little distance and saw the same boy sell a "last paper" to as many as ten persons; that was the boy's trick of appealing for charity, and he was on the way to be a professional thief, if he was not one already.

The new charity provides better housing for the poor, and that is just as it should be. But even after that is done, there will be need for kind oversight. A friendly visitor went into an apartment house. One woman was very proud and happy to show her bedrooms, kitchen and living-room. "But where is your bathroom?" the visitor asked. The visitor insisted upon seeing it, and finally when it was shown, the bathtub was covered with boards; when the boards were lifted a pig in brine was discovered. The woman explained: "We didn't need the bathtub, and so we thought we'd keep our winter meat in it."

Ruskin has truly said: "How often it is difficult to be wisely charitable; to do good without multiplying the sources of evil! To give alms is nothing, unless you give thought also. It is written not, 'Blessed is he that feedeth the poor,' but 'Blessed is he that considereth the poor.' A little thought and a little kindness are often worth more than a great deal of money."

The charitable work of the Lord Jesus was largely in the line of working miracles of healing and feeding. In this we can not do likewise, but when we make human efforts to relieve distress of mind and body in others, the Lord himself will so bless our efforts that results will be nearly miraculous if not quite so. All he expects of us is to do the best we can do.

Love thyself last! Drink deep
The nectared anodyne of selfishness!
Feast full upon the diet angels eat—
Pity and help and vast compassion! Seek
The pathway to the kingdom; finding that,
Other things shall be added! Griefs shall come,
Pain, hardships, death, it may be, on the path;
Yet turn not back! hand once upon the plow,
Drive the brave furrow forward, eyes intent
On the share's point! Trust heaven for recompense,
Forgetting recompense; trust God for due
Of goodly things, and for soul's due of peace
Foregoing both! EDWIN ARNOLD.

War in the Balkans

HOPE that war between the Balkan States and Turkey could be averted grew rapidly less during the first days of October, and, following weeks of occasional border clashes, definite reports of a serious engagement at Harmanli were received on October 3, in which the casualties were estimated at 400. Actual fighting thus preceded the diplomatic action of declaring war. Bulgaria, Servia, Greece and Montenegro were about to send an ultimatum to Turkey, demanding immediate autonomy for Macedonia, Albania, Old Servia and Crete. Prior to the reception of this note Turkey sent to the Powers a statement that "In view of the manifestly aggressive attitude of the Balkan States Turkey reserves to itself full liberty of action."

FREE: Four Booklets Which Have Taught Many People to Cure Themselves

One clever young university student writes from Lincoln, Nebr

"I have confidence in this system. It has relieved an unsightly skin and mem... inertia through the valuable suggestions and hints in your four booklets. There is mine of practical hints in them; enough to convince a skeptic, were he to stick to t... rules faithfully, and give it a trial.

"I have already gained more brain and nerve force—more efficiency without e... forced exercise.

"Your little books eliminated chronic catarrh from my system in about three week... To put it weakly, I was astonished. I knew now, that butter, eggs and ri... cream caused the trouble. I thank you for your knowledge, and hope to learn more ... your system in the future."

Different Classes of Foods Cause Different Diseases

I have produced in myself at will from time to time such complaints as rheumatism, catarrh, fevers, kidney trouble, blackheads, sores, dandruff, etc., by eating different classes of foods to excess, proving that the waste from each class of foods produces an entirely different disease. For instance, eggs, cream, butter, cheese, milk and salt are mucus-making foods which produce catarrh. Starch and eggs (paste-making foods) in wrong combinations congest and produce headache, dullness, brain fag, etc., while lean meats, green vegetables and fresh, juicy fruits do not.

G. H. BRINKLER, FOOD EXPERT

A thin man, after being out of work nearly a year through weakness, was restored in three weeks to hard work as a carpenter at full pay. In such cases the change from a clogging, death-producing diet to energizing foods caused a literal transformation.

Another patient, deaf in the right ear, owing to a discharge caused by an excess of mucus-making foods (cream, butter, cheese, etc.), was completely cured of deafness and catarrh by taking correct combinations of suitable foods.

A case of kidney and bladder trouble of ten years' standing was saved from a surgical operation, and the objectionable discharge cured within ten days, because the loss of control was due entirely to the constant irritation from certain irritating foods and drinks.

Brainy Diet

A chronic sufferer, weighing 415 pounds, unable to exercise, took correct combinations of ordinary daily foods and reduced over 150 pounds (in public life, under many witnesses) gained strength with firmer flesh, and lost rheumatism.

Correct Combinations of Foods Cure Disease

I have always cured the above-named symptom in a few days or weeks by returning to a correctly combined diet. The experiments have been fascinating, and the results underlie success in life.

People Write:

"My brain power and general efficiency have been about double this year by selecting brainy foods. I have made a fortune in real estate, and the credit is honestly yours."

"The government should investigate and teach the Brainy Diet System for the good of the nation."

"The hints in Booklet No. III, on foods for curing congestion, liver, nourishing the brain, etc., are worth untold dollars, although the books are free."

Get a California Farm Be Independent in the San Joaquin Valley

There is no other similar area under the Stars and Stripes where earnest effort will bring such tremendous returns. You go into a finished country, needing only intelligent work to bring fortune—independence to you and yours.

Go now and buy this land. It is settling fast and the prices are steadily advancing. You still can buy small farms of ten, twenty or forty acres, with water for from $125 to $150 an acre. This same land, planted to alfalfa, will sell for from $200 to $300. Can you make money faster? But, once established, you won't sell. This alfalfa will bring you $40 to $70 an acre if you sell the hay. If you feed it to dairy cattle, hogs and chickens, your returns will be at least $100 an acre.

And fruit—for this is the home of fruit—is making fortunes every year.

Go out and investigate. The Santa Fé sells round-trip homeseekers' tickets to California and elsewhere in the Southwest on the first and third Tuesday of each month—only $65 from Chicago.

In the Footsteps of St. Paul

every direction. Though the days of persecution of the Greeks are past, most, if not all, of these churches are used at the present day, at least on special occasions, like the name-days of the saints to which they are dedicated. It would seem that with seventy-two Greek churches and thirty-two mosques, to say nothing of the little sanctuaries for other races, the 22,000 inhabitants of Berœa might have sufficient religious privileges—of a kind, at least.

But, alas! there is not a single Protestant church of any kind in Berœa, perhaps not a single Christian who would accept the doctrines of Paul in their purity as we understand them. Let us be thankful, however, that the name of Christ is still known and that in these seventy-two churches, the lineal descendants of the church Paul founded, our Lord is still worshiped, though in much ignorance and darkness and superstition.

St. Luke is as brief and succinct as ever in his account of the apostle's life in Berœa. We know that as usual he went first into the synagogue and that the Jews were "more noble than those of Thessalonica." To this day it is a common saying that the same is true of the modern Jews of Berœa. A graphic writer thus pictures the scene in the Berœan synagogue where Paul preached:

"The rabbis and ministers, attired in their flowing robes, hold in their hands the well-thumbed scrolls of parchment containing the writings of Moses and the prophets. The apostle directs them in these to reference after reference, proving that Jesus was indeed the Christ. May we not imagine him saying, 'Turn to your roll containing our old prophet Micah's prediction: you will find there mentioned the birthplace of the Messiah.' The presiding minister reads aloud: 'But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall He come forth unto thee that is to be the ruler of Israel.' 'Jesus,' Paul may be supposed to say, "was born there.'"

Thus this writer goes on imagining how Paul told the Jews how his tribe was predicted, how he was to be born of a virgin, to be a lineal descendant of David, and how his rejection and death were described by the prophets, while the rabbis turned the scrolls and read the prophetic passages in confirmation of Paul's statements.

This is not altogether a fanciful account of the apostle's experience in Berœa, for we know that the Jews "received the word with all readiness" and that they "searched the Scriptures daily whether those things were so." We also know that many of them believed, and that this was also true of the honorable women among the Greeks and not a few of the Grecian men as well.

But the unbelieving, jealous Jews were soon upon Paul's tracks once more. They could not let him rest even in remote Berœa, but from Thessalonica they came, ready to hound him to death, and eager to drive him out of Macedonia. As in their own city they stirred up the people, and Paul and his companions knew that in order to continue their work and to carry the Gospel message to still other peoples he must at once leave the city where he had been so hospitably received. So while Silas and Timothy stayed in Berœa to comfort and strengthen the infant church, Paul, who seems to have been the only one whom the hostile Jews really feared (a splendid testimony this to his tremendous spiritual power and untiring vigor), was sent away by sea to Athens. Thus again we see how God makes the wrath of men to praise him, for though driven from obscure Berœa he is enabled to proclaim the everlasting Gospel in Athens and Corinth, the world's greatest centers of learning, philosophy, art and commerce.

TURKISH NAVAL GUNNERS AND OFFICER

SERVIAN INFANTRYMEN AND THEIR COMPANY COMMANDER

WAR BREAKS OUT IN THE BALKANS

ON THE afternoon of October 8 the world was shocked, though not surprised, by the announcement that the little kingdom of Montenegro had declared war against Turkey on the previous day and that a bloody though indecisive battle had taken place on the frontier of Macedonia. For about a week before this date the rumors of war in the Balkans had filled columns of the daily newspapers. Despatches from the capitals of all the great Powers of Europe had told of the efforts of the various governments to bring such pressure to bear upon the fiery little states that make up the so-called Balkan Confederacy that actual hostilities might be averted.

A GREEK SOLDIER IN WALKING-OUT UNIFORM

The relations between the government of the Sublime Porte and the governments of its northern neighbors have been in a state of high tension for many months past. The larger part of Macedonia, which is really Turkey in Europe, has as many Christian inhabitants as these smaller states which a few years ago made independent kingdoms by an agreement of the controlling powers of Europe. In race and training and feeling these Christians of Macedonia are almost identical with the Servians, the Bulgarians, and, to a certain extent, the Montenegrins. The fellowship between the peoples is very close, and the sympathies of the small independent kingdoms have gone out in no uncertain fashion to their more-than-cousins who have been suffering under Turkish misrule. The coming of the Young Turk Party into power at Constantinople brought the promise of reforms for Macedonia. These proved to be promises only, for nothing has ever come of them.

During the last few days of September the Turkish War Ministry announced its intention of concentrating an unusually large military force at Adrianople, ostensibly for purposes of field training and manœuvers. This caused a great deal of apprehension in the smaller bordering states, and Bulgaria and Servia both began the mobilization of their armies. Montenegro followed a few days later and pushed her operations to a conclusion so rapidly that she was the first ready to take the field.

The correspondents of the various great daily newspapers have given brilliant pictures of the military enthusiasm that is shown in all the countries which are vitally interested in this affair. From Constantinople comes the declaration that enthusiastic crowds have been marching the streets and that the call of the Turkish reservists to the colors has brought out almost one hundred thousand more men than was anticipated. From Belgrade, Servia's capital; Sofia, in Bulgaria; and Cettinje, the capital of Montenegro, come similar stories of enthusiasm and firm determination to bring the Turk face to face with his final struggle for the last of his once great dominions in Europe.

A SERVIAN INFANTRYMAN

Greece, too, has mobilized her land forces and her navy. The enthusiasm there runs as high as in the Balkan kingdoms themselves. Even far-away New York, a few days ago, felt a touch of this Greek enthusiasm when about seven thousand Greeks gathered to express their loyalty to their king and country; to make arrangements for the return home of thousands of their young men to bear arms and also to take subscriptions for the carrying out of this undertaking. The enthusiasm of the crowd ran to the wildest extremes. Young men came upon the platform and pledged themselves unreservedly to their king and flag. Inside of fifteen minutes the finance committee held cash and pledges to the extent of $20,000.

France was responsible for the first move made to preserve peace in the Balkans. Her calls addressed to the various Powers seemed to bring forth the response that all were ready to stand back of any demands which she might make. M. Sazanoff, the Russian foreign minister, made hurried visits to London, to Paris, and to Berlin, and it was generally believed that his mission was being

DO IT NOW!

A SERMON

BY

Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT: "Do this now, my son: Give not sleep to thine eyes nor slumber to thine eyelids. Deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler." Prov. 6: 3-5

DO WHAT now? Get thyself out of the snare. What snare? The snare of suretyship. Who was caught in it? Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, a reckless spendthrift. He had fallen into the hands of adventurers and money sharks. He had given promissory notes to the young voluptuaries with whom he associated in his dissolute quest of pleasure. He had gone further and indorsed their obligations, for which he was held personally liable. He had hypothecated the good-natured indulgence of his royal father to such an extent that patience in that quarter had ceased to be a virtue. The net had now closed about him and his father's advice was that he should deliver himself and at once.

The young prince could not appeal to the law, for the Jewish law of suretyship was rigid to the last degree. He could not appeal to his creditors, for "business was business." He could not beg his comrades to satisfy these claims, for they were as bankrupt as he. But the necessity of doing something was obvious; and the sooner the better. "Get thyself out of thy difficulty," says the wise man, "and do this now." It is a business proposition which is laid down. If you were to ask the average merchant as to the secret of success in commercial life he would assuredly say that it depended on four things.

Four Prime Essentials

First, Honesty. This is assumed at the outset; not because "honesty is the best policy," but because it is right. The cash boy in a department store must have a conscience or he will never get on.

Second, Industry. "By hammer and hand all arts do stand." Something is to be said for genius; but all the natural gifts of the brightest genius that ever was born will not insure success unless he is prepared to sweat for it. Work is what wins. Eight hours a day? Yes, ten, twelve, more if need be. God never made an eight-hour man. "I went by the field of the slothful; and lo, it was overgrown with thorns; and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall was broken down. Then I saw and considered it well. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep; so shall thy poverty come as one that traveleth, and thy want as an armed man." Idleness is the anodyne of purpose and the sepulcher of hope. The man with his hands in his pockets seizes none of the opportunities that pass by.

> The heights by great men won and kept
> Were not attained by sudden flight;
> But they, while their companions slept,
> Were toiling upward in the night.

Third, Enthusiasm. "The labor we delight in physics pain." In order to succeed we must needs be in sympathetic touch with our work. An eagle on a perch is the most awkward of living things; but behold it as on poised wings it pierces the heavens with eyes fixed, undazzled by the sun! What makes the difference? The eagle is now in its element. We do best what we love to do. If you are a dry goods clerk see to it that you measure out tape as if it were cloth of gold. If you are a grocer's boy, deliver your load of vegetables as if they had grown in the hanging gardens of Babylon. If you are a cobbler's apprentice, hammer your lapstone as if you were playing on "David's harp of solemn sound." If you are a typewriter, finger your machine as if you were Paderewski at the keyboard of his piano. If you are a teacher in the public schools, teaching the young idea how to shoot, do it as if you were Apollo teaching archery to the children of the gods.

But the fourth prerequisite is the one that more immediately concerns us; to wit, Promptitude. The call of our strenuous times is for minute-men. The motto of John Ruskin was "'To-day"; that of Walter Scott was "Hoc age," meaning "Do it"; that of Franklin was "Time is money." I have seen similar mottoes on the walls of business offices: such as "Do it now," "Don't dawdle," "Never put off until to-morrow what can be done to-day," "Now or never," "Make hay while the sun shines," "Take time by the forelock," "Step lively," "The Street of By-and-by leads to the House of Never."

We are the only creatures in the world who are behind time. The homing birds know when to fly. The stars of heaven meet all their appointments. The earth makes a circuit of five hundred millions of miles and is back again at the solstice—on the second? No, on the millionth part of a second! We alone waste time; and time is more than money. The sands that fall through the hour-glass are diamond dust. They stand for opportunity. Once gone they are gone forever. "The mill cannot be turned with the waters gone by."

Too Late! Too Late!

A few years ago I went over the battlefield of Waterloo with an old Walloon guide. It was in the autumn, and the harvests covering the historic ground were ripe for the sickle. They were not yellow, but red as blood; for the poppies were in luxuriant bloom and overtopped the wheat. As we stood by the doorway of the stone chateau which was the center of the battle, the guide pointed out the wall which sheltered the Old Guard of Napoleon, and the ditch where Wellington's musketeers were hid, and the well which was filled with bodies of the dead and from which the cries of the wounded were heard on that fateful night. On my asking for the direction in which Blücher's troops had come to the relief of the allies, the guide pointed to a road running over the crest of a distant hill and through the wheatfields; and at this point, carried away with the excitement of the moment, the old Walloon cried, "There's where he came! At four o'clock in the afternoon!" Then turning to the opposite hills, he added, "And there's where Jerome should have planted his great guns at half-past three!" Then, with curses on the head of Prince Jerome, he wailed, "Too late! Too late! And France was lost!" This is the requiem of lost fame, lost fortune, lost life, through all the ages. Too late! Too late!

I have spoken of the advice of Solomon as a business proposition. But it applies equally well to the higher life. For religion is business; though we do not always so regard it. If man were an ephemeron; if his life were only threescore years and ten; if death were the end; then, as a matter of course, we could do no better than to confine ourselves to the workshop. But if life here is only the vestibule of an eternal life; if time is only the small arc of an infinite circle; if we are merely serving an apprenticeship in this world to qualify us for another further on; then it is obvious that our most important business is not to be getting a mere livelihood but to be getting ready for the endless life that awaits us.

Character Building and Service

The first item in this higher business of life is Character Building; for what we are is the germ of what we shall be. We are here to make the most of ourselves. We are here to equip ourselves for what awaits us. We are here to grow; not to mark time, but to get on; "so to live that each to-morrow find us further than to-day." This is the sum in addition which Peter proposes when he enjoins us to "add" grace to grace until we arrive at symmetry of character in the likeness of Christ. Thus we are to reach "the measure of the stature of the fulness" of a man. And if this is ever done it must be done now; since at the dead-line our characters are fixed: as it is written, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still," and so forever.

A building is going up on a neighboring corner; and I observed that before the steel frame had reached the second story a placard was posted announcing that it would be "Ready for occupancy on the first of May." We are building a house in which we are to live forever; and it must be ready for occupancy when Death strikes the hour. We have, therefore, no time to lose. We are, here and now, determining what manner of persons we shall be through all the ages.

The second item of importance in the business of our present life is Service. For we are not our own. We are bought with a price; not silver and gold, but the precious blood of Jesus, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot. We, therefore, belong to him. Our time, our physical and mental strength, our talent and treasure, all belong to him. "We serve the Lord Christ." If this be so then our chief business is not to make the most of ourselves but to serve him. He said, "Ye call me Lord and Master, and ye say well, for so I am." Our business, then, as Christians, is to do his will.

It is necessary, as a matter of course, to attend to the common tasks of livelihood; but even these are to be done for his glory. "Who sweeps a room as to God's laws, makes that and the action fine." But there are other and higher tasks in the furtherance of the kingdom of Christ, from which no lower occupations can excuse us. We are called to be fishers of men. Soul-winning is our vocation. And there is something to be done, in the line of this high beneficence, every hour of the day. To procrastinate is to leave undone. To postpone one of to-day's duties until to-morrow is simply to crowd out one of to-morrow's duties or push it further on. Wherefore, if you have anything to do, do this now.

Begin the Christian Life Now!

In the autumn, when the wheatfields of Dakota are ripe for the sickle, the cry of the farmers goes up for "hands." The ingathering cannot wait. Our Lord said to his disciples, "Say not, it is yet four months and then cometh the harvest. Lift up your eyes and see!" The fields are already ripe! Thrust in your sickles and reap. The secret of right living in the service of Christ is to do at each moment what each moment requires of us.

> Make a little fence around to-day,
> And therein stay.

A friend recently came to me with a newspaper in his hand, saying, "Did you see that Thus-and-so committed suicide last night?" His voice trembled as he added, "'He was my nearest friend. I knew he was going at the pace that kills. I thought of it when I awoke yesterday; and I resolved that before the day was over I would go and reason with him. But it was a busy day, and now—it is too late." The moral of which is, Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do this now.

But suppose one has not begun to live the Christian life; what then? Do the first things first. The ship that would cross the sea must first hoist anchor.

> Are you in earnest? Seize this very minute:
> What you can do, or dream you can, begin it.

You cannot build a Christian character or a Christian's work until you have begun the Christian life. You cannot make a journey until you have taken the first step. And why not do this now? Do you say you want to think about it? Certainly. "Count the cost." But do not deceive yourself by confusing deliberation with procrastination. You have been brought up in the clear light of the Gospel. You have heard sermons without number and the Bible is open before you. What more do you want? What you call "thinking" may be mere putting off. Not to decide is to decide not. And danger lies that way.

The trouble with the unconverted is precisely like that of the spendthrift prince. They are taken in the snare of suretyship, "like a bird in the hand of the fowler." They are in bondage under the law. They have done the things which they ought not to have done and have left undone the things which they ought to have done. They have heaped disobedience on disobedience. All their obligations have gone to protest. What shall they do? Appeal to the law? Justice is a merciless creditor. Its only answer is, "Pay me that thou owest!" What shall be done? Do nothing? That would be stark fatuity. Is there, then, no escape from the net?

At this point the Gospel enters, saying, "What the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son, in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh; that the righteousness of the law might

WHERE I FOUND THE MASTER

I SOUGHT him in the words of men,
As told with tongue and writ with pen;
Too oft he seemed forgot;
I sought him in the busy street,
But 'mid the men I there did meet,
Alas! I found him not.

I sought him in the wooded hills,
The birds' sweet songs, the purling rills;
I found him but in part;
At last I bowed in grief and sin;
I wept, and lo! I felt him in An humble contrite heart.

Easley, S. C. ANDREW LEE PICKENS.

Do It Now!

fulfilled in us." In other words, Christ comes to discharge our obligations to the broken law. He pays the ransom; we sing, "Jesus paid it all, all the debt I owe." It does not follow, however, that all are saved; for a clear condition has been affixed to the benefits of this redemption, to wit: that the penitent sinner shall accept it. He that believeth in the Son hath everlasting life;" but what of him who refuses to believe, or accept? He remains in the bondage of the law. Is it too much to ask that we shall accept the proffered gift of God? Is it too much for the Saviour to ask that we shall clasp hands with him? If you believe that he has redeemed you, why not thank him for it? If you really desire to have him cancel your obligations why not ask him? Why not accept the receipt at his hands? For you will want that receipt on the great day. But when shall we do this? Do it now! The choice is always between to-day and to-morrow. To-day is ours but to-morrow is God's. "To-morrow" is written over the door of the poorhouse, over the archway of the potter's field, over the gate of hell. No man ever tends to be lost; he simply postpones his salvation until a more convenient time. He does not propose to reject Christ; he simply puts off thinking about it. Wherefore, if you have any decision to make, make it now.

In each man's life there comes a time supreme;
The day, one night, one morning or one noon,
The freighted hour, one moment opportune,
The rift through which sublime fulfilments gleam.
Oh, happy he who, knowing how to wait,
Knows also how to watch and work and wait,
Life's broad deck alert, and at the prow
To seize the passing moment, big with fate,
From opportunity's extended hand,
When the great clock of destiny strikes Now!

Little Words of Love

THERE are weary hearts to cherish
While the days are going by." Opportunities to say kind words, dispense good cheer and show sympathy are frequent. We should never pass them without availing ourselves of the chance to be God's messengers to those who are heavy-hearted and over-burdened. Why do we so often speak as we were bored beyond endurance by the book agent and the vender of wares brought to our doors? Often it is out of our power to make a purchase, but this is no reason why we should not treat the one who comes with politeness, and send him or her on the road with a feeling that our good wishes are going too.

Little children often need words of love. They run to father and mother with their small triumphs or trials, and are disappointed if they are roughly turned away and made to feel that their affairs are matters of indifference.

One of the sweetest privileges of life is the giving time without stint to those who interrupt us. Of course, time is now and then money, or time may not be our own. Whatever the circumstances happen to be, if we control our time, let us regard interruptions as sent on purpose to enable us to help other people. The busiest person may learn how to sidetrack the thing in hand, meet an interruption with patience and courtesy, and return with renewed zest to the work that was laid aside.

ARE YOU AN ANGEL?

MODESTY, doubtless, may prevent you from answering at once in the affirmative. Pray do not be in haste, however, to answer "no," because there may be but one alternative. If you are not an angel, what then?

Old-fashioned classifications of men and women have become meaningless and confusing as they have multiplied indefinitely. The familiar line of separation which puts all the good on one side and all the bad on the other side is broken up, and we cannot apply it safely. Who is good, and who is bad? Some one has answered that "there is so much good in the worst of us and so much bad in the best of us that it does not behoove any of us to find fault with the rest of us."

We are given to dividing men according to characteristics which we seem to see in them and which we feel competent to judge. But our eyes deceive us again and again, and our judgment is superficial and mistaken when we set out to classify our fellow men as wise or foolish, strong or weak, true or false, mean or noble. Even when we try to classify ourselves, having some advantage in that we can look deeper beneath the surface, we find the task such a doubtful one, despite the advantage, that we are willing to give over sorting out our fellows.

The essential division must relate, after all, to qualities of the spirit, which is the real life, rather than to qualities of mind or body, which are only the mediums through which the real life expresses itself. If the great spiritual forces of good and of evil which control the world can operate only in and through human lives, it must be evident that all mankind falls into two grand divisions—those who are controlled by and act in obedience to the spiritual forces of good, and those who are controlled by and act in obedience to the spiritual forces of evil. Every one of us must be enrolled in one army or the other, because the rivalry is so keen that no man, woman or child is overlooked by the recruiting or drafting agents. The person who does not definitely enlist on the one side is pretty sure to be drafted on the other side.

We have authority for believing that both angels and devils are abroad in the world on their active missions. Some are "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation." Others are "the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world," and which "now work in the children of disobedience." Every human heart has been made the campaign headquarters for one kind or the other of these active spirits. The citadel has been gained after a hard fight, perhaps, and is held only by constant struggle, but the dominant spirit dwelling there is the answer to our question at the head of this article.

WE USED to sing with enthusiasm an old hymn beginning "I want to be an angel and with the angels stand." For some reason that favorite hymn of the past is not so much in favor now. A mansion in the skies, though we may all ardently desire it, can wait while we are doing our best to make earthly homes fit to dwell in, and while we are concerned in giving those who have no such homes a fair chance to gain them while they live.

CHRISTIAN HERALD folk would hardly approve an enterprise which gathered poor, wretched children together in the city slums and taught them to sing, "Oh, think of the home over there, by the side of the river of light," and then sent them back to play in the gutters, or to crusts and curses in their garrets. The practical way to give these poor waifs some conception of "the home over there," more beautiful and joyous than the place they now call home, is to give them a taste of beauty and love and joy in some earthly home, such as Mont-Lawn, "the Children's Paradise."

There is no need to postpone angelhood until we reach "the home over there." There is more need of angels here and now. Small chance has any one of realizing the ambition to be an angel in the world to come who does not practice the profession in the world of to-day. There is no preparatory school for angels in heaven. But graduates from the preparatory school on earth are gladly admitted.

ANGELS are very different from other persons, although the difference does not consist of wings or shining raiment. Still, there is a radiance in face and manner which proclaims them, whether they work in a kitchen, or toil in a workshop, or grace a drawing-room.

One day, a ragged little fellow, about ten years old, was standing before a shoe store on Broadway, bare-footed, peering through the window and shivering with cold. A lady riding up the street in a beautiful carriage observed the forlorn little lad and immediately ordered her driver to stop in front of the store. The lady, richly robed, went to the boy and said:

"Little boy, why are you looking so earnestly in that window?"

"I was just asking God to give me a pair of shoes. Mama told me p'raps he would if I asked him," was the reply.

The lady took him by the hand and went into the store and asked the proprietor if he would allow one of his clerks to go and buy her a half dozen pairs of stockings. The proprietor cheerfully assented. She then asked him if he could give her a basin of water and a towel, and he replied, "Certainly," and quickly brought them to her.

She took the little fellow to the back part of the store, and, removing her gloves, washed and rubbed those cold little feet and dried them with the towel.

By this time the young man had returned with the stockings. Placing a pair on the boy's feet, she purchased and gave him a pair of shoes. Then she tied up the remaining pairs of stockings, handed them to him, and, patting him on the head, she smiled and said: "Now, my little fellow, you feel more comfortable, I'm sure."

As she turned to go, the astonished lad caught her hand, and, looking up into her face, eagerly exclaimed, "Are you an angel?"

There will be many little boys and little girls with bare, cold feet this coming winter. Are you an angel?

There will be many wretched homes where mothers and children are shivering and starving—where fathers are going down, discouraged and hopeless, in the struggle. Are you an angel?

There are thousands of men on the streets fighting poverty and temptation, while Rescue Halls and Bowery Missions seek to cope with work too great for their resources. Are you an angel?

There are sad hearts in homes where sorrow has entered; there is coldness, and hardness, and doubt where love and faith ought to be; there is humble work near at hand such as He did who said "I have given you an example"; there are dark places that need to be made bright, and foul places that need to be made clean and sweet. Are you an angel?

INDIAN SUMMER

WHEN the breath of the dying summer
Has passed from the world away,
When the fields are no longer golden,
And the woods no longer gay,
When the skies have lost their glory,
And the world is bleak and bare,
And hints of the coming winter
Are felt in the frosty air,

Then, from out of the far-off heaven,
Where dwell the years that are fled,
Comes back the spirit of summer,
The ghost of our blessed dead.
In the hush of the gathering twilight
When the night is near at hand,
With wings that are swift and silent,
She comes from the spirit land.

And away from the sky at morning
She brushes the clouds apace,
Till the sun looks forth from heaven
And smiles like an angel's face.
She wraps in her misty garments
The shivering earth and chill,
And breathing the warmth of the roses
She says to the winds "Be still."

And all through the days she lingers
There is sunshine and song and mirth,
And the spell of her gracious presence
Lies over the sleeping earth;
And the spirits of men grow braver
For the message her sweet lips bring.
"Hope on through the weary winter,
And wait, and watch for the spring."

When youth's beautiful dreams have faded,
And passed from our lives away,
When the world is no longer golden,
And our hearts no longer gay,
Then into our souls aweary,
And shadowed by care and woe,
God sends, like a blessed spirit,
A dream of the long ago.

And our hearts grow brave and tender,
With the glow of the days gone by,
And we catch the wonderful music
Of life's truest melody.
"Grieve not for thy youth departed,
Or the sorrows the swift years bring;
Hope on, through the snows of winter,
And wait and watch for the spring."

Biddy the Hen

THE lost egg—more plainly, the bad egg—costs the family circle of the United States over $66,000,000 annually. This loss is by no means the fault of Biddy, the hen, who does her thrifty part to solve the "high cost of living," laying yearly over $400,000,000 worth of eggs. Not a bad one does she lay. How then do we, her beneficiaries, manage to despoil ourselves of two in every twelve of her gifts?

Biddy's product is kept by the farmer a week or two or more before it gets to the country store, where it abides another several weeks before shipment to the city commission merchant. From the retailer, in due or undue season, Biddy's eggs reach the consumer's pantry or ice-box, and thence appear by relays on his table. Now, here is a problem of delays which Biddy cannot solve, and it is up to us, mere mortals, to do it. Everybody can help a little, and everybody who helps a little is doing a public service—helping to feed our big family.

No less an agent than the Government of the United States seeks to sustain Biddy's effort to feed us, and to co-operate with the farmer in getting fresh eggs to market. The Agricultural College of the State of Minnesota, through Mr. N. E. Chapman, of its extension staff, is blazing a path which all the schools of all the States might follow. He preaches the value of Biddy and her works to railroads, merchants, teachers, farmers and country schools. Children flock to hear "Uncle Norton," as they call him. He runs poultry classes in country schools. This is a thing every teacher in every country school might do. If any of our readers want to know how, we think a request addressed to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., would bring information.

The suggestion has often been made that we substitute thrifty, productive, domestic Biddy for the eagle as our national emblem. She certainly deserves position on our coin.

EVANGELISTS IN SESSION

Rev. W. E. Biederwolf

ABOUT one hundred and fifty evangelistic workers from all parts of the United States and from Canada gathered as guests of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, for an Evangelistic Conference, September 18-20. The call for this conference was issued by the Rev. Dr. James M. Gray, dean of the Institute, in behalf of the trustees and faculty of that institution. The evening sessions were held in the Moody Church; the morning and afternoon meetings, in the various halls of the institution.

Dr. Frederick E. Taylor was one of the strong speakers of the conference. Dr. Taylor is pastor of the First Baptist Church of Indianapolis, Ind., and a former evangelist.

"I do not wish to criticize," he said. "I only want to talk over with you a few things that may help us in our work. We are all aware of the condemnation which is being poured forth against present-day methods in evangelism. I think we as evangelists and ministers fail many times because we give too little time to the spiritual. I find a woful lack of deep spiritual life in many of the evangelists, the lack of turning aside each day to get close to God. We say we are 'so busy' and are 'so tired.' Jesus was never too tired to pray. I believe we should have a definite time for prayer and study of the Bible. Mr. Moody was a man of prayer. He searched the Scripture. If there is any good to come from this conference, it must begin with you and me. Are we in condition? 'Search me, O God, and try my heart.' Let that be our prayer."

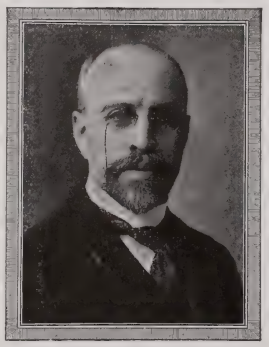
Dr. Taylor said that when he gave up his church work and started out as an evangelist another evangelist invited him to come to his house and learn, as he said, the "tricks of the trade." "I have got 'em skinned a mile in taking an offering." "I was indignant," said Dr. Taylor. "Just imagine a Wesley, a Whitefield, or a Moody saying this. Once they gave Mr. Moody a free-will offering of from $2,000 to $3,000 for several months' work in London. Mr. Moody handed back one-half of this amount, saying, 'It is too much.' I think a local campaign committee these days would almost have heart failure, if an evangelist would return half of his offering.

"Some exaggerate results," said Dr. Taylor. "I have sat on pulpits and counted when evangelists have named the number of persons asking for prayer. 'There's one, and another, and another, and yet another,' cried the evangelist, and he kept right on counting. All I could see were two hands in the whole room." "And I have seen the same thing many times," remarked a brother seated near Dr. Taylor.

"At a meeting in St. Louis," said Dr. Taylor, "there were in the audience about three thousand men. 'All who wish to lead a better life,' said the evangelist, 'please stand.' Every man in the hall stood. 'Three thousand men for Christ,' yelled the evangelist, and the next morning the papers reported 3,000 men converted." Insincerity in story-telling was also touched by Dr. Taylor. "I know an evangelist," he said, who tells a story as if he were the actor in it, when I know that the story was told him and he was not near the event when it happened." Dr. Taylor spoke of evangelists who try to get applause by denouncing higher criticism, of which they themselves are ignorant. Many evangelists are becoming superficial because they do not keep up with the times in their reading. "When you get the evangelist down in a corner," he said, "he does not know what higher criticism is and how it differs from lower criticism. I am more afraid of lower criticism than higher criticism."

Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, in speaking of remuneration, said that he hoped that some plan would be found by which evangelists could earn a stated salary instead of depending on the "free will" offerings which, in many cases, might be too small or entirely too large.

It was regretted that the Rev. W. A. Sunday could not be present. Mr. Sunday was holding meetings in East Liverpool, Ohio, and sent an interesting and characteristic letter to his brother evangelists at the conference.



Rev. James M. Gray, D.D.

Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin

The Rev. Dr. Henry Ostrom spoke on "City Evangelism." "Some people now have an idea that a little Buddhism and a little Confucianism and a little Christianity make a modern religion. Let us never yield to the idea, but give the people the old-fashioned kind of religious doctrine and we will have them all saved." Evangelist L. A. Cooper discussed the subject "Which produce better results, union or denominational meetings?" and declared that his observations led him decidedly to favor denominational campaigns.

Rev. Henry Ostrom

Miss Grace Saxe, of Waterloo, Ia., organizer of the "Neighborhood Bible Classes" in campaigns conducted by Rev. W. A. Sunday, told something of her work and results that have resulted. Miss Saxe gave a brief outline as to how she c ducts these classes in the various cities, and clared that last year 10,000 had begun Bible stu which a visit to several cities just now indica they were resuming. The plan of study Miss Sa divided into three parts, intellectual, devotional a practical. These classes, the ministers say, have a certain large way solved one of the most i portant and difficult problems presented at the cl of an evangelistic campaign, namely, that of p viding some definite and adequate way which the new and renewed life of th who have come under the power of t Christ may be nurtured and trained a put to work.

The Rev. Dr. John M. Dean, of Chica in his address on "How Are Ministers Be Awakened?" deplored the lack of sy pathy with evangelistic work on the pa of preachers, and advised establishing chair of evangelism in every theologic seminary throughout the world. "A go tonic," he said, "for some of the theologic students and professors would be to into the Rescue Missions of our cities a do personal work."

Dr. Gray, the venerable dean of t Moody Institute, gave a hearty welcome the evangelists at the opening session a said he believed that it was of God th this conference was called. It was ma plain to every one present that the Ho Spirit was present in great power. Nev has the writer attended a more spiritu gathering. There was much prayer. The was no show of temper at any time, matter how hard the methods of many present we criticized.

This great company of evangelists prov themselves men of God. They are eager to w souls. They were in conference together brethren. One could not help noting the de humility of these evangelists and singers, who wi take up their work this winter greatly strengthene and helped by what they saw and heard at th conference.

WAR BREAKS OUT IN THE BALKANS

attended by success. Just at the close, however, of a sixteen-hour conference in Berlin with the Russian, German, Italian, Bulgarian and Greek diplomats came the overshadowing announcement that Montenegro had declared war and started operations.

The first intimation of actual hostilities was the report which came on Monday night that Montenegrin troops had attacked the town of Berani, across the frontier in Albania. This was unconfirmed and not generally credited in London and New York. Tuesday afternoon brought the unconfirmed report of still more fighting, and on Wednesday morning the accredited representatives of some of the world's greatest newspapers sent confirmatory reports putting an end to all hope that peace might still be maintained in the Near East.

Mr. G. Ward Price, the London Daily Mail's special correspondent at Constantinople, telegraphed: "The report of a Montenegrin attack on Berani, Albania, is confirmed. The town has been the center of a brisk engagement since Monday night. The ministers of the Balkan States are hourly expecting instructions from their governments ordering them to leave. A declaration of solidarity with Montenegro from the other three States is expected hourly, or even the opening of hostilities without a declaration of war.

"It will be one of the most relentless campaigns in history. The war spirit of the Turkish people is worked up to fight desperately in defense of their territory from joint attack by neighboring states. In no crisis in the recent chaotic history of Turkey has her position, not only without her gates but also within, been so marked by grave possibilities, and above and beyond all is the grim fact that the scourge of war may only too easily spread to the rest of Europe."

The Daily Telegraph's Belgrade correspondent says: "King Nicholas of Montenegro to-day (Tuesday) arrived at the army headquarters at Podgoritza. The inhabitants of Skutari, who at once proclaimed Nicholas their king, begged his majesty to occupy the town."

The Daily Mail's Vienna correspondent quotes the following despatch from Oltenitza, Roumania, to the Neues Wiener Tageblatt: "A massacre occurred yesterday (Monday) at Turtukai, Bulgaria, near the Roumanian frontier. Egged on by agitators from Rustchuk, armed Bulgarians attacked the Turkish inhabitants at the dead of night, pillaged their houses, and started appalling slaughter, even women and children being sacrificed. The Turkish quarter presents an awful spectacle to-day. Pile of corpses are lining the streets. Only a few Turk succeeded in escaping to Olteritza, which is jus across the Roumanian border. A witness of th massacre states that Bulgarian police participate in the slaughter and pillage."

Mr. Bennet Burleigh, the well-known war co respondent, writes to the London Daily Telegrap from Sofia: "The great Powers may arrange t keep the ring, but the Balkan peoples, with bitte memories in their minds and accumulated sorrow in their hearts, persist in declaring for war. Th Balkans are resolved at all costs henceforth to b absolutely free from Turkish control direct or indi rect. The foregoing may be accepted as true o public opinion and partly true of official opinion.

"Let me emphasize that Europe in general over estimates the military power in action of the Turks For defense they are excellent. For attack the are faulty and weak. Nor have you known o counted the strength and character of the allie forces—the Bulgars, Serbs, Greeks, and Montene grins. Bulgaria puts over 300,000 men into th field—60,000 more than was estimated; Servia ha over 300,000, also an increase of strength, whil Greece and Montenegro have larger numbers tha was expected."

OUR PEACE MISSION TO MEXICO

GEN. OROZCO STATES THE REFORMS THE REVOLUTIONISTS DEMAND

BY HENRY ALLEN TUPPER, D.D., LL.D.

President Madero
of Mexico

SOME years ago, during the Diaz administration, I visited Mexico; and the wonderful possibilities of the country greatly impressed me. Under the strong rule of President Diaz troubles among the people were quickly quieted, the investment of foreign capital was encouraged, the material resources of the land were developed and popular education received a new impulse. But in these latter years it was apparent to the world that the man who had ably ruled the restless Mexicans for more than three decades was losing his power; and the many voices of discontent were not hushed at his bidding as in former days.

The success of the Madero revolution brought about the downfall and exile of Diaz; and Don Francisco I. Madero became president of the Republic of Mexico. But a change in the administration of the government did not produce a change in the spirit and demands of the people; and Madero soon found that, as he had ridden into power on the currents of a revolution, he was being tossed by the billows of the storm which he had largely created. Pascual Orozco, Jr., the brilliant young general during the Madero revolution, declaring that the newly elected president was acting in bad faith in failing to keep his pre-election promises, took the field against the existing government, and since the first of the present year the disturbances in Mexico have been increasingly serious and complicated.

It is surprising that the civil strife among our neighbors across the Rio Grande River should be viewed with such apparent indifference by the American people; and it is strange indeed that no definite and intelligent effort has been made looking toward the restoration of peaceful relations among them. I am aware that any movement in this direction would necessarily be attended by grave difficulties; but these are not insurmountable and the gravity of the situation should inspire rather than discourage us in this mission of peace.

Under date of July 20, 1912, the following letter was written:

Rev. Henry Allen Tupper, D.D., LL.D., New York:

"MY DEAR DR. TUPPER: I have the pleasure to inform you that you have en appointed one of the honorary vice-presidents of the International Peace orum, and Special Peace Commissioner. We are assured that you will honor ese positions, and by your diplomatic wisdom, with the hearty co-operation the International Peace Forum, bring about much good through your en- avors. We are very much interested in the efforts that you are making for e restoration of peaceful conditions in the Republic of Mexico, and our orum will do all in its power to aid you in this blessed service.

"JOHN WESLEY HILL,
"President International Peace Forum."

From the opening of the year, I had taken a deep and active interest in exican affairs; and, after receiving the sympathetic assurances of the Inter- ational Peace Forum, I determined, if possible, to study the situation at close inge. In August I visited El Paso, Texas, situated in the extreme western d of the State on the Rio Grande River. From there, through the good offices prominent Texans and with the aid of the attorney of General Pascual rozco, Jr., a personal conference was arranged with the leader of the Mexican volutionists. Accompanied by three American gentlemen and General rozco's attorney, I visited Juarez, Mexico, and in the room where the noted terview between President Taft and President Diaz was held, I met, for the rst time, the ablest representative and leading spirit of the revolution in our ighbor republic. In the room with General Orozco were Señor Cordova, his cretary-general, the general's father, Pascual Orozco, Sr. (who is now a risoner on American soil), and six or eight prominent Mexican revolutionists. General Orozco presented a very striking appearance. He is about thirty ars of age, and over six feet in height; his features are large and rugged; is expression is firm and intelligent; his figure is attractive and stalwart and his whole demeanor betokened a man of unusual force of character and strength of purpose. Neither the general nor any of his aides wore uniforms; indeed, this much-talked-of young leader met us in his shirt-sleeves, and his welcome was cordial and democratic.

For two hours, through my interpreter, I conversed with Orozco and his attendants; and toward the close of the interview, as I explained explicitly the object of my visit and the purposes of the International Peace Forum, he called aside his secretary and attorney. To them, as I was informed later, he said: "This seems to be a great opportunity, for I want peace."

In resuming our conversation, he asked: "Dr. Tupper, will you come to me again tomorrow afternoon, at two o'clock?" Receiving an affirmative answer, he continued: "I shall then have for you a paper and a personal letter which you can use as you please. I hope your effort will be successful."

I returned to El Paso and next afternoon, with four Americans and three Mexicans, I promptly kept the appointment. General Orozco and three of his aides joined us outside of the custom house at Juarez, where he was residing; and he manifested even greater cordiality than he had shown the day before. His first words were:

"We sat up until three o'clock this morning, preparing a statement and letter for you."

After a few moments of informal conversation, the general, through his secretary, handed me a document containing more than three thousand words and a personal letter, both of which he signed in my presence. The longer writing is largely a detailed historic statement of the rise of former revolutions in Mexico, particularly the one under Diaz; but there is one paragraph to which he called special attention, and which states his own position and contention in the present uprising. It is this:

General Pascual Orozco
The Rebel Leader

"It appears to me useless to say what are the causes and the possible results of this revolution; but I desire to insist on some points: The fundamental cause is the maladministration of Mr. Madero and his family, through which it has been impossible to bring about any peace negotiations, and peace cannot come to the country except through the termination of that administration or the fulfilment of the promises; that is, either Mr. Madero retire or guarantee in a positive manner the correction of these evils: administrative corruption, nepotism, impositions, immense privileges, and offenses against the domain and against the freedom and life of the majority of the citizens."

After this communication had been carefully read and discussed, both in Spanish and English, General Orozco, in a very impressive manner, said: 'I have prepared a personal letter expressing my thanks to you, and showing my spirit and motives in this war. You are at liberty to use both this and the longer statement as you desire."

The letter is most significant and now, for the first time it appears in print. The following is a literal translation of it, from the Spanish:

"CITY OF JUAREZ, August 12, 1912.

"Dr. Henry Allen Tupper:

"SIR: I give to you in my name and in the name of all of my comrades the most effusive thanks for the disposition which you have been pleased to manifest to me to learn the motives of the present revolution and to interpose the valuable influences of the International Peace Forum, of which you are the dignified and conspicuous representative. The elevated sentiments you have expressed, and which I have had the pleasure to value personally, induce me to give to your knowledge during our interview the causes and purposes of the revolution in order that, in view of the same, you may form your judgment in the noble purposes which your association proposes, and which has all my

The Nation's Voice on Rome

IT IS a mistake to imagine, as some people seem to do, that the religion of Christ is largely a thing of concession, of yielding compliance for the sake of peace, love and harmony. These three are indeed to be greatly desired, but never at the sacrifice of a vital principle. There comes a time when, great principles being at stake, duty demands that we take a firm stand in order that the whole world may know clearly where our allegiance lies. As Paul dealt with Alexander the coppersmith on a certain occasion, so we must "withstand to the face" those who would destroy the sanctities of our national and religious life.

This is the situation that confronts the Christian Church to-day with relation to the peril of Roman domination. It is not a situation of our seeking, but one that has been forced upon us by the bold and defiant utterances of the papal prelates and press, especially within a comparatively recent period. These utterances cannot be misinterpreted; their true purpose is evident in every line and syllable. To meet vaunt with vaunt, threat with threat, is not within the province of a Christian journal. How, then, are we to deal with the oft-reiterated intimations that it is the purpose of the Romanists to "make America Catholic," to dominate our politics, to come to "their own" by "securing more Catholics in Congress"? How are we to treat with a foe which for twenty years has boasted that Protestantism is "decadent and will soon disappear"? How shall we estimate the political activities of a church which claims absolute temporal power throughout the world; which has already set up at least three thrones of temporal power in the United States; which claims for its cardinals the official precedence due to "princes of the blood"; which is already in the saddle in a political sense in some of our biggest municipalities, and whose sudden growth in wealth and power is only surpassed by its arrogant claims for the future?

These facts constitute substantially the problem submitted by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in a recent letter addressed to a number of the leading pastors of various Protestant denominations, and also to the presidents of our foremost theological seminaries. Recognizing the constitutional rights of all religions to the free exercise of their faith in this republic, we invited no criticism of creeds or religious principles. But when any church or denomination leaves its legitimate sphere and plunges into politics, as the Roman Church has done with the avowed purpose of overriding all other religionists, and "making America Catholic," it becomes a proper subject for public criticism. This is the view universally taken by the distinguished contributors who have sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD their responses to our invitation to an open discussion of the subject. In these frank and outspoken letters, the first instalment of which we print to-day, one may feel the very pulse-beat of the free and independent American people. We believe these sentiments will find an echo in many millions of American hearts.

The time is now ripening for a new reformation, though not on the lines of the old. Here, in this republic, which Leo XIII declared was "the hope of Rome," we are evidently destined to witness a struggle between an arrogant hierarchy, backed by the wealth, influence and pomp of papal power revived in almost medieval magnificence, on the one hand, and the nation's love of civil and religious liberty and the enlightenment that comes from popular education, on the other. The Christianity of Rome is not and never has been that of Christ. It seeks a "kingdom of this world." Happily, our people are already awakening to a realization of the folly and wickedness of Rome's old pretensions, which Europe has cast off forever.

We commend the reading of these letters to all lovers of religious liberty, who believe in the separation of church and state and in an open Bible. They are inspiring and convincing. They form a part of the literature of the very notable historical period in which we are now living.

Hail to the Fleet!

IT IS with many conflicting emotions that the metropolis greets the spectacle of the mightiest fleet ever assembled in any harbor of the world (the greatest assembly of American war vessels ever witnessed, one hundred and twenty-three ships carrying 27,300 men). Even those whose souls revolt at the thought of war are thrilled with pride for the nation which, from such recent beginnings, has evolved the splendid navy capable of producing such a magnificent display. The demonstration was not without serious purpose. It was made not for mere love of display, but to awaken the patriotic impulses of the people, to give an educational exhibition of our naval equipment, and to present to the world a spectacle of dignified power.

America is coming into the harvest time of her long and patient years of strenuous constructive toil. America is no longer an experiment; she has proved her worth as a world power. The war with Spain gave a hint of what a great nation may do to help a neighbor in distress, and pointed the way to a time when armaments shall be not agencies for aggression, but for protection of the weak and for the triumph of international justice. As America has been called of God to explore and possess new regions not only of land but of ideals, so she must still lead the way toward that glad time when kindness shall be the law among nations as it is being recognized as the only sane and righteous social law for individuals.

The time has not yet come when the armaments of Christendom can be spared. War is a bitter thing; pain and death and widows' tears are woful matters. But for some years to come there will be need for these international policemen to guarantee international weal. God grant that the navy of the United States may never again be engaged in a great and bitter strife! God grant that with our added power there shall come constantly the opportunities for peaceful pursuits and the possibility of peaceful relations with our sister nations! God grant that the day may not be immeasurably distant when, as the swords are beaten into plowshares and the spears into pruning-hooks, the ships built for death and ruin shall be turned into vessels of merchandise and mercy to carry cheer and healing and bounty over the seven seas.

The Balkan War Begun

MODERN civilization has little use for the Turk. He has been so long a monstrous anachronism, an obstacle to human progress, that it would almost seem that any legitimate combination of circumstances that would wipe him off the map of Europe would be doing the world a service. But he seems to possess wonderful powers of recuperation. Twice in a twelvemonth he has been suddenly forced into war—first by Italy over Tripoli, a now by peppery little Montenegro, representing t Balkan principalities—yet so far is the Turk fr being weak and helpless that he now seems to forcing events and prepared to try conclusions w Montenegro, Servia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Cre whose united armies are threatening his b ders. Unless intervention comes quickly, the c flict may become general, involving others than t little group of Balkan allies. The Turk may be tering on his last great campaign on European s There is no harder fighter than the Ottoman at b and the struggle may be long and bitter. What t result will prove none can foresee. It is worth n ing that the Pope, who made no effort to stop h tilities between Italy and the Porte, is anxious to a mediator in the Balkan broil, although he has been invited to act. He could not intervene in t Tripoli campaign, as he would have been opposi the aroused patriotism of Italy. But the papal d of peace probably spreads her wings too late to even noticed amid the smoke of the Balkan confli

General Notes

—NEWS FROM PEKING to the Frankfurter Zeitung states th a Belgian financial syndicate is negotiating a loan of $50,000,(to China for railroads connecting four important cities, vi Lanchau, Siangfu, Kaipingfu and Haichanfu. Meanwhile, t Chinese loan in London has been unsuccessful, only forty p cent. of the $25,000,000 placed before the public having be subscribed.

—CRITICISM OF PROFESSOR SCHAEFER'S recent address in En land, announcing that science had at last definitely discover the origin of life and could actually produce life from a chemi compound, has been widespread and vigorous. Strange to s not a single scientist of note upholds the professor. Dr. Alf Russel Wallace sums up the situation by saying: "All t scientist can do is to experiment on dead matter. He cann subject living matter to his chemical process while it continu to live." The kindest of the critics satisfy themselves by sayi that Dr. Schaefer permitted himself to be carried away by enthusiasm and announced as a thing accomplished that whi is still but a dream, as far from realization as ever.

—"BIG JACK" ZELIG, a notorious New York gunman a gambler, and one of the district attorney's principal witnes in the Rosenthal murder case, was shot dead by a Russian J named Phil. Davidson on a street car in Second Avenue, N York, October 5. The crime is believed to be an outcome the Rosenthal case, and the allegation is made that Davids was urged to the act by those who were interested in getti Zelig out of the way, to prevent him from testifying at the tr of Police Lieutenant Becker, who is accused of instigating t murder of Rosenthal. Davidson, however, declares he kil Zelig out of revenge, because the latter had robbed him of $ and beaten him besides. The murderer, who is known as "P Phil" on the East Side, has fraternized for years with the la less bands of thugs and gunmen whose recent misdeeds ha given them criminal prominence.

Mobilization of Atlantic Fleet

THE mobilization of the United States navy took place between October 6 and 15. New York was not the only city to witness a great gathering of warships. In San Francisco d Manila the Pacific and Asiatic fleets also were obilized, and if it had been possible for one to see these harbors simultaneously he would have en the United States navy on dress parade. The et gathered in New York waters was the largest e ever gathered within a harbor in any part of e world, the British naval demonstration being in e open roadstead off Spithead. There were all d 123 ships of all classes in the armada, 1,000 mmissioned officers, 300 warrant officers and 26,- 0 enlisted men. There were thirty-one battle- ips, four armored cruisers, four cruisers, twenty ecial-type vessels, six naval militia vessels, eight olliers, twenty-four destroyers, sixteen torpedo ats and ten submarines. The six largest fighting ips, the Arkansas, Wyoming, Florida, Utah, Dela- are and North Dakota anchored off Seventy- nth Street up to One Hundred and Twenty-fifth reet. On October 6 Rear Admiral Hugh Oster- us arrived in the harbor with ten battleships. he next morning an official call was made on the ayor in the City Hall. In the afternoon officers d sailors went to see the Gian<s and Yankees ay baseball. October 12 there was a land parade bluejackets.

After e reviews of e fleet by the resident and her officers the 14th d 15th of ctober the et left the arbor. The ng line of ips, the mil- on proud ectators, the yriads of ectric lights at night, the spectacular display of rce and real protection to a nation and the pa- iotism and heroism inspired in the hearts of the tizens made the mobilization of the Atlantic fleet e of the most profitable events in the history of e year. It is not the steel battleships so much as e men back of the guns and the character of the illions of people back of the officers and sailors at constitute the real defense of the land and of e nation's interests throughout the world. The e of a navy as an instrument of war is thus men- oned:

Very Ancient Love-Letter

EV. DR. F. C. EISEN, professor of Old Testa- ment interpretation in Chicago, has just trans- ted a love-letter written on a baked brick in abylon four thousand years ago, which has been ound in recent excavations. It contains a unique re for the toothache, and the avowals of the riter's warmest affection for his lady love, and his tense desire that she should come to him in his new ome. The letter is as follows: "To Bibeya from imil-Marduk: May Shamash and Marduk grant ee, for my sake, to live forever. I write this to quire after thy health. Let me know how it goes ith thee. I am now settled in Babylon, but I am in reat anxiety because I have not seen thee. Send ews when thou wilt come that I may rejoice at it. ome in the month of Arakhsama [November- ecember]. Mayest thou, for my sake, live for- ver." The toothache cure is: "So must thou say this: 'O worm, may Ea smite thee with the might of his fist.' Thou shouldst then do the following: Mix beer, the plant sa-kil-bar and oil together. Repeat thereon the incantation thrice and put it on the tooth." Human love is one of the elemental, one of the eternal things. The dust of the years has not dimmed it, the convulsions of society have not shaken it, the chemistry of the centuries has not dissolved it; it burned in the tender words of affection on the brick tablet of Babylon four thousand years ago as in the messages of lovers to-day. The heart of the letter taken out of the buried ruins of centuries could be included in the healthy story of to-day and reflects the sentiment described in the Bible: "Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair." Human affection in ancient or modern times is only an emanation from the infinite affection which is manifested toward us in these words:

I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee. (Jer. 31: 3.)

Detects Storms at Long Distance

THE "barocyclometer," an instrument so sensitive as to detect a hurricane five hundred miles away and thus enable ships equipped with it to steer clear of storms, is to be installed by the United States Government in all the naval stations on the Atlantic Coast, and perhaps on ships of the Atlantic fleet. The instrument was invented by the Rev. José Algue, director of the weather bureau of the Philippine Islands. Thus science comes to man's aid again in the mastery of the wind and the sea. In olden times people knew very little about the seas and did not venture far out into them, and they ran into the harbor in hiding at the first hint of the storm that stirred its depths. The new weather instrument just adopted by the United States Government and other inventions of the kind mark somewhat the advance in scientific discovery since the days of Christ, when little or nothing was known of the origin or pathway of the winds.

The wind bloweth whence it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth. (John 3: 8.)

Pilot Defied Kaiser

AS THE imperial yacht Hohenzollern was entering a Norwegian port, the Kaiser, impatient at the slowness of the vessel's speed, himself rang the bell indicating "Increase speed." To the Kaiser's amazement the Norwegian pilot, an old sea-dog named Nordhuns, rushed to the telephone and cried to the engine-room, "Slow down; take no notice of the bell." The Kaiser looked at the man who dared to speak thus in his presence, and said to the pilot: "Go and put yourself under arrest." "I shall not leave this place," replied the old man firmly; "the ship is under my guidance and I take orders from nobody, not even an emperor." The officers looked on in silence, for they knew that the pilot had the nautical regulations in his favor. Great was their surprise when they saw the emperor quit the bridge, leaving the pilot alone. The next day the Kaiser, who had recovered his good humor, decorated the old sailor, and named him his "official pilot in Norwegian waters." The old sea-dog knew the waters better than the emperor did, and he knew the danger there was in an increased speed, and that the laws of navigation gave him the direction of the vessel, and he dared the king in doing his duty. There was a hero in olden times that often defied the king for conscience sake, and was decorated and rewarded afterward for his moral courage.

Then answered they and said before the king, that Daniel regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a day. (Dan. 6: 13.)

Pedler Gave Short Weight

MRS. ELIZABETH ANDREWS, of Staten Island, New York City, bought, as she thought, a bushel of potatoes of a pedler. When the man had gone she thought the bushel very small and weighed the potatoes, and found that she had only gotten thirty-seven instead of sixty pounds' weight—only a little over one-half of the amount she had paid for. Mrs. Andrews is in comfortable circumstances and could have ignored the trifling swindle, but she was very indignant at the idea of being robbed in such a fashion. So she started out after the pedler and chased him pretty well over Staten Island from eleven in the morning till nearly dark. She overtook him and had him taken to the police station, where she made a charge against him. Mrs. Andrews is one of the women who have joined the crusade against the high cost of living, which she claims is partly on account of the light weight and short measure given. For wives to protect their husbands and families against this form of dishonesty is to be commended. It will aid in the reform so much needed. Full weight and measure were required under the Mosaic dispensation.

Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have; I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt. (Lev. 19: 36.)

Prominent Man Loses Eyes

FORMER State Senator A. F. Thompson of Phœnixville, Pa., one of the best known and most highly respected men of the State, met with a fearful accident the other day which resulted in the loss of both eyes. Mr. Thompson has a fine country place at Phœnixville, where he is an amateur farmer. He was experimenting with a new method of removing stumps. He planted dynamite under several of them and saw the success of his invention. One stump did not move and he went to investigate it. Just as he approached it the dynamite exploded, the blast catching him full in the face. He groped his way to his home, and was taken as swiftly as possible to the hospital, where both of his eyes, which were sightless, were removed. His accident is not likely to cost him his life, but he will be blind forever. He is a man of wealth, of thought, sentiment and character, and he will have quite a world within visible to his spiritual eye. There are explosions of sin that put out the spiritual eyesight. Christ warns against this spiritual blindness:

If thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness (Matt. 6: 23.)

SHALL ROME "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC"?

LEADING COLLEGE PRESIDENTS AND PROTESTANT PASTORS EXPRESS THEIR IDEAS ON THE ROMANIST PROBLEM AND THE BEST WAY TO DEAL WITH IT

Rev. Josiah Strong | Rev. Charles M. Sheldon | Rev. Warren A. Candler | Rev. D. R. Steffens | Rev. Francis E. Clark

IN VIEW of the widespread discussion in religious and secular circles throughout the country over the avowals by Roman Catholic prelates and press that the purpose of the hierarchy is to "make America Catholic," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently invited a number of leading Protestant pastors and theological professors to express through its columns their ideas of the best method of dealing with the question at issue. It was pointed out that this project of Catholic conquest was not a spiritual one, nor was it confined to the utterance of a single cardinal, but was expressed everywhere in Catholic pulpit and press and even in Papal allocutions, the latest being that of Pius X, which declared it to be a duty to bend every energy, "public, social and political," toward making this country the "first Catholic nation in the world." The program is emphasized by the recent phenomenal Catholic activity in politics, State and national, by the establishment of a throned hierarchy in this republic, by astounding claims of royal precedence for Roman cardinal-princes, by the condemnation of our public schools, and especially by the open vituperation of Protestantism, which is the faith of a great majority of the American people.

Our invitation met with a prompt and enthusiastic response. Many of the letters received are evidently written by men who have brought to the consideration of the subject trained minds familiar with every detail of the question, and appreciative of the grave danger of Rome's pernicious activities. In almost all the letters, one is made to feel that the hearts of the writers are filled with the love of our common country and its birthright of political and religious liberty. As these letters constitute in themselves a liberal education on the great vital issues at stake, they deserve a wide reading. The first instalment of this remarkable correspondence is given below:

Rome's Arrogant Political Claims Constitute a National Peril, Writes Bishop W. A. Candler.

THE trouble with the Roman Catholic Church is that it seeks to be both a church and a political party. Its arrogant claims of being the only true Christian church, intolerant as they are, might be treated with indifference; but when for its head it asserts temporal power and civil authority, intruding itself by logical consequence into the political affairs of every country which it enters, a position is assumed which cannot be allowed any church whatsoever. If it must assume such a position, its members must not complain if it is met with political opposition not offered to any other church. This is why such great men as Gladstone, Bismarck, Juarez, Diaz, Garibaldi, and the ruling statesmen in France have resisted its pretensions.

Since the Spanish-American War and the acquisition by the United States of colonies where Romanism has been the established religion, it has been more aggressive than ever in our political affairs. The peril of Romanism to our institutions is not an imaginary danger, conceived by the heated brains of fanatics; it is a real and constant menace. It must be resisted in our country, as it has been resisted in England, Germany, France, Italy, Mexico, Portugal—as it has been resisted in every country where it has secured any considerable following. If it were willing to take its place as a church along with all the other churches, it would be improper to meet it with any other attitude than that in which we meet all the other churches; but it is not willing to be only a church. Putting itself in a class to itself by its political animus, it must take all that such an improper position makes inevitable; it can not claim the political exemptions of a church while it asserts political claims as well as churchly prerogatives.

WARREN A. CANDLER.
Bishop Methodist Episcopal Church, Atlanta, Ga.

Protestantism Must Be Alert, as Rome Works Politically Under Cover.

I SHARE in the conviction that the Catholic Church needs to be very carefully watched. Her record is such, in countries where she has in the past held practical supremacy, that those who know her are naturally suspicious. Of course it may be agreed that we are in a new age, and that even the Roman Catholic Church has undergone change. This, of course, is cheerfully conceded; but within the memory of most of us, that church has made a bitter fight against the use of the Bible in the public schools, until the custom of reading the Bible in the public schools of our country has been practically abandoned. It was felt by many that the position of that church was justified, because of the fact that this country believed in the separation of church and state. However, the recent attitude of the Church of Rome demonstrates conclusively that it was not because she felt that a principle of our government was being violated, for she has spared no pains to put Catholic influences in the public schools.

Protestantism needs to be alert. Her enemy is wily, and in the past has done her work under cover. There is reason to believe that much of her present work is being done after the same manner. Fortunately, evidence is not wanting that this organization has been able to use large political influence for the accomplishment of her ends, and not only is the safety of the Protestant Church at stake, but also the safety of our republic.

Rome's Political Ambition Doomed to Failure, Declares Pastor C. M. Sheldon.

PERSONALLY, my own experience with the Catholic Church and knowledge of its purpose has been limited to a small section of country; but within that experience, I have always found these facts to be prominent:

It has never acknowledged nor recognized the Christian ministry or discipleship of our Protestant Churches by any real fellowship in its ministerial unions.

It has refused to participate in general movements for common reform or uplift of the community when urged to unite with other Christian bodies for that purpose.

It has used its influence against the use of the Bible in the schools, and withheld its support from common appeals to the entire community to teach ethics in education.

It has denied historical freedom of thought to adherents, and has allowed saloon-keepers to brewers to remain undisturbed communicants of rites and ceremonies.

It has emphasized ritual and dress in its fo of worship to such an extent that during a re Catholic celebration at a cathedral, three colu of a large city daily were used to describe in de the garments worn by the clergy.

If the political ambitions of the Roman Cath Church in America are actually what those ought to know say they are, then it is certainly duty of every true Christian disciple to oppose s ambitions in every Christian way possible. world is growing more and more enlightened power of true Christianity will in the end previ I do not fear for the final outcome, and do not lieve Roman Catholicism is going to be suprem America, because I believe that through the education and discipleship of the people true Ch tianity will prevail. Meanwhile, let the tru about the Catholic Church be made known, that may guard against its errors and protect the fu from its danger.

Professor Dau Tells of the Political Aspiration Rome's Hierarchy and How to Combat Them

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has set forth facts wh in my opinion, are incontrovertible, regard the openly avowed aspirations of the Roman C olic hierarchy to make religious conquest of nation, and to make our country the future wo center of the Papal power. CHRISTIANITY, THE LIGHT-BRINGER*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THREE sorts of blindness are set before us in this lesson: first, that of prejudice in the case of the Pharisees who questioned Jesus and demanded a sign of him; second, that of ck of knowledge—ignorance—when the apostles asoned with one another because they could not derstand what Jesus had said; third, the blind- ss of eyes, which Jesus found in a man at Beth- ida.

The blindness of prejudice made the Pharisees ll Jesus "a Samaritan, a devil, a winebibber." hat will not prejudice make men say? The story told of a man who stoutly asserted that there ere no gold-fields excepting in Mexico and Peru. nugget dug up in California was shown to him as sitive evidence against his assertion. He was t in the least disconcerted, d replied: "This metal is tremely like gold, and you ll me that it passes as such the market, having been clared by the assayers to indistinguishable from e precious metal. All this will not dispute. Never- eless the metal is not gold, cannot be gold, because ld comes only from Mex- o and Peru." Persons who ve prejudices become self- nceited, arrogant, and pocritical. These charac- ristics were so blazoned it by the Pharisees that sus had often to condemn em, even calling them by e severe names of "hypo- ites," "blind guides," whited sepulchers," etc. hy should they seek Jesus, hile he was still in De- apolis, asking a sign? lainly it was that they ight confuse him and mble him before the peo- e, for they did not think sus capable of showing at he was indeed the Son God as he claimed to be. sus plainly answered, "No gn shall be given." If ey had been earnest seek- s after him, how different ould have been Jesus' atti- ide toward them! And, too, ey had seen enough of Jesus' work in healing men nd feeding the multitudes to convince them that e was the Son of God, if they would be convinced.

After this incident Jesus left Decapolis, and came er to the other side of the Lake of Galilee. But ere were Pharisees wherever Jesus went. It ould be difficult to find to-day just the sort of harisees Jesus met, but similar hypocrites are to e found now and everywhere. Many of them hide ehind their ability to live a good life before the yes of men, and a wicked life in the depths of their wn hearts. There is another type which professes hristianity but which wrongs its tenants and eats its customers. Let us not forget it is just s surely hypocrisy when one secretly prays and believes in religion, but for fear of sneers fails to rofess what he believes. Hypocrisy is a lack of armony between creed and conduct, between the abel and the goods. If you have not the goods, tear off the label; but if you have the goods, put the label on boldly.

When Jesus told his apostles to "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod," they connected his admonition with the fact that they had brought only one loaf of bread with them in the boat, and thought Jesus was warning them against such bread as the Pharisees were wont to use, or that of the Herodians (a Jewish political party who were devoted to King Herod). Did they think possibly that what is one man's food may be another man's poison? Jesus saw their blindness of heart, and said, "Do ye not perceive, neither understand? Have ye your heart hardened?" For Jesus had meant to warn them against the wrong teachings of the Pharisees, and the false notions of the Herodians, for they were likely to come into closer contact with that sort of people than ever before. "Strange," we say, "that the apostles should have made such a mistake!" Strange that they did not think of that day after the feeding of the multitude, when Jesus had spoken in the synagogue at Capernaum about "the true bread out of heaven," and with it contrast the bitter bread of the Pharisees and the Herodians. But Jesus himself took that very incident to enliven their understanding. It was a solemn warning to them not to be impressed with the teachings of the Pharisees and the Herodians, no matter how specious they might seem. Later, Jesus said to his apostles: "The Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I have said unto you" (John 14: 26). This was realized on the Day of Pentecost, when multitudes were fed with the Bread of Life by the apostles, and three thousand souls were added to the church in one day.

"Beware of the leaven of the Pharisee." This injunction of Jesus is needed to-day in the United States to guard against Bahaism and other Oriental cults that are being so industriously pushed upon Christians in a wily way, trying to make them think they will be all the better Christians if they accept Bahaism! It is claimed that Bahaism is the final perfected religion destined to comprehend and unify all the world's other forms of religious faith! Is the Bahaist teacher greater than Christ?

Let us see how the true leaven of Christianity works. Dr. Joseph Parker in his book, The People's Bible, tells about the work of one man, William Duncan, who went among the Metlakahtlans, one of the most ferocious and murderous tribes on the North Pacific Coast, but they were men of intellectual capacity, though in barbarism. It was laid upon the heart of William Duncan that he should teach Christianity to those people. His thought was laughed at and scorned. He enlisted one who could initiate him into the mysteries of the language of Metlakahtla; there was no written language. He told them that he wished to tell them about the white man's God, if they would allow him. The end was a garden of the Lord, every man subdued; within thirty years the whole place transfigured, transformed; civilization, education, an interest in spiritual things; a falling down before the Cross of Christ as the God and King and Saviour of men.

Jesus had a special sympathy for blind people. How many blind eyes he opened; some with a word, some with a tender touch, some with clay made by his own spittle applied with his own fingers! We have one instance of this kind in Bethsaida; a blind man was brought to Jesus by his friends, and they besought Jesus but to touch him and he would see. How great was the faith of those friends! Jesus sometimes opened the eyes of blind people in a crowd as he was passing along, but for some reason best known to himself he took the blind man of Bethsaida by the hand and led him out of the village before he began to restore his sight. Then he spit upon his eyes, and laid his hands upon him, and asked him, "Seest thou aught?" Only dimly the man saw; he could not distinguish men from trees. He needed another touch of Jesus to make him whole. Again Jesus laid his hands upon his eyes, and afterward he saw all things clearly. "Do not enter the village," said Jesus, knowing that if he should an intense excitement would prevail that might prevent his teaching the multitudes.

The tender helpfulness of Jesus should make us all very compassionate for the blind. Carmen Sylva, the queen of Roumania, had her eyes bandaged for weeks while she laboriously learned to write Braille, the raised letters for the blind. It is said that not only did her eyes ache, but her right hand as well; but by the process she became one of the most helpful friends the blind people in all the world have ever had. She established a school for them where they were taught music and many industries, so that they could earn their own livelihood.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—SUPERINTENDENT J. R. PEPPER, a leading member of the International Lesson Committee, writes: "The question as to 'retaining boys from 15 to 18 in the school' is always a hard one, and I have no doubt every school in America has had trouble at this point. One of the most efficient ways we have found is to district the city and put certain persons to work in each district and never let up upon those who are absenting themselves from school, writing, telephoning, teacher visiting, calls visiting by committees and individuals, parents enlisted as far as possible and then giving them something special to do when they come. This latter requires careful planning, but it is worth it all to succeed at this hard undertaking. Where graded system is used, the general superintendent of the school cannot conduct reviews intelligently without vast labor or can the superintendent of the department do it best, but we find it must be done chiefly by the teacher and that puts added strength upon the teacher's work and also added responsibility where it really should belong. We have found the most fruitful source of recruits for our teaching force comes from the adult classes and we draw most of our teachers from that direction."

—ALL THAT HAS been so ably written about seizing opportunities ere they pass out of reach is applicable to Sunday school superintendents at this time when the men's Bible class movement makes it easier than ever before to get young men and older men permanently settled in our Sunday schools. It was stated at the Rhode Island Sunday School Convention by Mr. A. T. Atwood, of Albany, N. Y., who is in charge of adult class work in New York State, that more adults are now joining the Sunday schools than children, and more men than women.

—A BIG BIBLE CLASS of fathers is the best way to keep the older boys in the school, and into such a class they should graduate in token that they are men, at twenty-one years of age, or shortly before. Such a class, organized with a president and other officers, nominating its own teacher with a tactful committee on sociables, another on athletics, others on social service and work for boys, every one on some committee, and "something doing" all the time, is a "magnet" not only to hold what we have but to draw others.

—HOW CAN WE BETTER show the wonderful momentum of this movement and the influence on Bible study of the Men and Religion Movement, than by reporting that half a million men have joined organized Bible classes in three years, as many as the whole membership of the Y. M. C. A. in our country? The men's Bible Classes find in the Y. M. C. A. their best ally, and the two movements should be closely associated. The organized Bible classes usually recognize their duty to promote "civic reforms," but the writer believes that only in the gravest emergencies should this or any other official branch of the church enter directly into law enforcement or party politics, but everywhere men's classes should be federated and by resolutions, deputations, volleys of letters, "reason" with officials "of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come." Towns never before under "No license" have been rid of the saloon by the votes of men's leagues, and every class should have a civic committee that by correspondence with reform societies will keep their members informed of appointments for patriotic service.

THE HEAD OF THE HOUSE

BY JEAN MAHAN PLANK

WHEN the carriage brought her home from the funeral, Amy Kerner walked steadily up the winding path to the little wooden bungalow, nestling under a roof of roses. As she threw back with a weary gesture the strange black veil which floated like a cloud about her thin form, she revealed to portly Mrs. Cotton, walking at her side, and to the three solicitous watchers behind the latticed windows, that a dazed pallor was upon her fine, homely, worn face, but not a trace of tears.

Martha Spence, a small, spare woman, with stooping shoulders, came out upon the porch, where blue plumbago and white jasmine wrestled with the roses for possession. Martha gave a nervous hitch to her ill-fitting shirt waist and her faded brown skirt, and pushed back slightly the bowled straw hat from her scant gray hair. She on the one side and Mrs. Cotton on the other took Amy's arms in an awkward attempt to help her up the three wooden steps.

"Yeh must be awful tired, Mis' Kerner," sympathized Martha. "Me'n' Mis' Brace's been here an' got things sort o' straightened up, and the minister's jest come in, too. He hurried back so's to get here before you did."

Amy's dazed look quivered into one of comprehension, and she responded in a low, wondering voice:

"How kind you all are—how very kind!"

Mr. Brace, the young minister, and his pretty wife put the widow into a wooden rocking-chair; Mrs. Cotton, a competent woman, the general adviser of the neighborhood, handed her a fan, while Martha Spence brought a cup of tea. As a rapt, unseeing expression settled upon her face, they talked in low tones, almost as if she were not there.

"I'll come in an' help her pack up what things she'll need to take to her sister's in Ohio," volunteered Martha, "fer of course she'll go right there. They're well-t'-do folks; an' yeh know"—her voice sank—"there's only $500. What's that? We kin hev an auction," she proceeded with relish. "That's the way to get the best prices. It won't take long to dispose of what there is." Martha glanced significantly about the bare little place where orange-laden branches, waving against the lattices, took the place of pictures, and to which the absence of knick-knacks and upholstery gave distinction.

Mrs. Cotton's strong voice broke in, and her firm, clear glance wiped from the scene, as it were, for the time being, Martha's scrawny existence.

"Mrs. Kerner won't need to go and be a dependent on her folks. Why, she's been working at that embroidering for so many years, and never selling any of it—just giving it to the orphan asylum. Now, Mrs. Bartlett told me she'd pay her any time for one o' those little cloaks, two and a half for just the work, and buy the materials herself. And I'd take one at the same price for my new grandson. Besides, Miss Scott would be glad to get 'em for her little shop in the city. Of course Mrs. Kerner will have to give up this house; she can take that little room in the wing of Mrs. Victor's boarding-house; and she could help Mrs. Victor some for pay."

"Tew 'n' a half fer one o' them cloaks!" muttered Martha acidly. "Why, it takes a fortn't stiddy workin' jest t' do the embroiderin'!"

The remarks of the two ladies were apparently addressed to the minister's wife, who listened with an absent smile. Mrs. Brace was too young, too much engrossed with her new bliss and new responsibilities to comprehend the sweeping from a life, in the manner of a cataclysm, love, home and surety—a woman's world suddenly become chaos.

The minister, however, was gazing steadily at the bereft. He had a thin, spiritual face, and a listening look. He started at the sound of his wife's silvery voice.

"But, Mrs. Cotton, how we shall miss Mrs. Kerner's work at the asylum! That is selfish, I know, but when the babies are dressed they look just like a flower-garden, with all that exquisite embroidery."

The widow stirred in her chair.

Mrs. Brace dropped to her knees in sudden comprehension

"And lately," continued Mrs. Brace, "she has been making the very loveliest cloak of all for that little crippled Julia. And by the way"—she spoke in an aside to Mrs. Cotton—"we are so puzzled to know what to do with Julia. You know Mr. Brace has her sort of in charge because he was with her mother when she died. She must be placed where she will at least be treated kindly, and everybody who wants to adopt asks for the pretty children. But the cloak Mrs. Kerner is making for her! Do you know that she never even has her work stamped? That she does it just as if she were painting—out of her head, her imagination?"

Amy Kerner sat up straight. "He always liked me to do it. He called it 'love-work'." She sank back in the wooden rocker; her gaze wandered out of a window to where the mildest of breezes was stirring the sadly waving grasses of southern California.

Mrs. Cotton leaned over to the minister's wife. "You knew, didn't you, that they lost a baby two years ago? The first cloak she gave was the she had done for her own; and as fast as she c finish them since, she has given them to the asy babies."

Martha Spence hitched her hair to whisper distance. "Yes, he always encouraged her in and an awful extravagance too; that expen cashmere and them silks; and him only a garde He was an awful good man, there's no denyin' t but not practical, you might say." She recalled exciting prospect of an auction, and spoke alou

Amy: "Well, Mis' Ker I'll help you with y packin' an' gittin' re When do you think li you'll be able to go to y sister's? You know five h dred does melt away a fast, an' when the head o' house is gone—"

Mrs. Cotton's ample fig had been waxing rigid du these remarks. She now tur her head slowly, and the l she gave Martha Spence all the effect of a gold l nette leveled upon the ene She spoke, however, to A

"Don't you be afraid, M Kerner! You can make y way. Why, there's alw plenty wanting help of kinds if the embroidery i enough. You keep your c age up! Don't you be af you can't make a livi You're smart enough for t surely. Now, whenever like I'll come and go with to Mrs. Victor's boardi house. In two or three d maybe?"

Amy's gaze came back the circle of eyes bent u her. At first her mo showed a puzzled pain, t a sudden surprised flash w over her face. She hesita an instant before she sai a calm voice:

"I do not expect to m any change. My husban he wouldn't want me to le my home. We built it, he always wanted that should live in it. I—I s just stay here."

For an awkward inst the four visitors gazed in lence, then they all ar The minister stepped ward, a troubled look u his face. "We—loved—each oth she faltered.

Mrs. Brace dropped to knees in sudden compre sion. Love she knew alre and the thought of its appalled her. She laid soft cheek against that of elder woman, and when, later, she left the h with her husband, her hand sought his with a cli ing clasp.

Mrs. Cotton had been standing in grim, pleased surprise. She started now toward the d saying dryly: "Well, good-by, Mrs. Kerner!" sense of irritation, nevertheless, being too much her, she wheeled about and spoke sternly to A "No woman that's left like you can expect to k up her own home, with the cost of living and t —and the head of the house gone. It would tak least fifty dollars a month, and it's too little a h to let rooms. Mrs. Kerner, you're not being missive to the will of the Lord."

Martha Spence's voice struck in with sharp dorsement:

"Why, it's jest a temptin' o' Providence. I ain't, then I don't know what is."

OUR NATION AND ITS CHILDREN

ucation: Scholarship or Efficiency?

A HOPEFUL sign of our times are the many letters coming to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about our public schools. "What are the schools doing for our children?" "What our children learning in them?" "What are children getting out of them?" "Are the hours long, curriculums too severs, for growing boys girls?" "If our public school system is wrong, are we to find out in just what particular? how are we to help mend it?"

can't see that my children are being as well for life as were their grandparents who went the old-field schools. The public school here, holds for a few months in the year, is taught a girl chosen because of her kinship with the ing family rather than her fitness. The school he mountain, started by philanthropists, is edung the children away from the country with its rses in stenography, book- oing, millinery, and so on. ll we go back to the old- l schools from which we such men as Lincoln and ck Stephens, who hoed and wed and went to school ween whiles, but learned ething when they went?" tes an Appalachian Moun- subscriber, perplexed ost beyond his bearings.

low, our system of public ools is not wrong, but our lic school system may e its faults. Other good ngs have. This sort of pub- education is one of our at national developments, is worth any trouble we y take in the mending. e promise of mending is this spirit of inquiry on part of parents and of satisfaction on the part of cators. The latter put ir finger on the weak spot; y have thought it out and e facts and figures; they trying to work a change, for this they need the operation of parents. The lt, say they, is in the sys- itself, which is not yet ly developed. It was created scholars and bookmen; v it must adapt itself to day and the nation; must ch our children the things y need to use in their life- rk; must become more ctical.

Questioning Parents

"Do not the new courses being introduced—man- training and domestic ence—crowd my child, re- e health and strength, and unfit it for life's battle?" s one parent. Another de- nds, "Why should my child nd years of labor master- dead languages, ancient history, and the like, ich it cannot use in its lifework?" Between se two lies an answer: To the child whose work may require these last, opportunity uld not be denied. The child whose leaning is toward mechanics or other of the applied arts uld not be forced to acquire learning he does not d at the expense of that which he does. Again, vironment should count. It is absurd to teach same course in the country and the city schools. the country, agriculture, horticulture, stock-raisy, poultry-raising, and dairying should have minence. Nor are these subjects dissociated th the sciences; they are simply the translation botany, biology, bacteriology, and chemistry into ms of everyday use. As to ancient history, all ree that it is of great practical value if its lessons e applied to the life of to-day, and we learn from sins and failures of the past how not to sin and t to fail in our municipal and national life. en, too, the humanities—history, the classics, toric, philology, mythology, and all the rest—en a new world of pleasure and inspiration in the lm of books, the enjoyment of literature.

Destructive criticism is always easy. We hear it all sides every day. Constructive criticism is tirely another matter, yet is the only kind that unts. Now the problem is, can we, who are outde the system, help the educators of our country apt the public schools more fully to the life of day, to the needs of the individual child, the needs of the special locality? If there are ideas in your brain that may help us to a solution, do not hesitate to tell of them. The question is an open one and the entire nation feels its need of an answer.

Meanwhile, the following letter may serve as a pointer: "I was recently visiting in a rough mountain section where everybody was poor and had to do manual labor in field or dwelling. Idling and shiftlessness were evident, most so among the men. The women could not leave home and babies to loaf at crossroad stores. Life was hard, and they aged quickly. Methods of work were crude. Rocky hillsides did not encourage good husbandry, nor rude shacks good housewifery. The school has spasmodic sessions of several weeks during the year. I heard in that school not one word about agriculture or housewifery. The hope of the section was in the orchard industry started by settlers of means who were seeking to employ reliable and competent native help. Yet this subject was entirely neglected in the training of the children.

"A prosperous orchardist said to me: 'I fear I must import labor or abandon my property. Yesterday, on my visit to my orchard, I found mules standing like statues to their plows, hoes lying where dropped, sacks of peas and fertilizer open to impending rain. In nearby woods men shouted and dogs yelped. When I had waited an hour, my "hands" straggled back. As, according to my custom, I handed their foreman the bag containing their wages, I said quietly: "Do you men think it right to quit work for rabbit-hunting?" Every plower and hoer stood at sullen attention. A stalwart youth said snappily: "I don't care what I'm doing, I stops when my dog jumps a rabbit!" A woman, with dinner-buckets on her arm, shouted: "We don't sell our liberty!" A noble sentiment however misapplied. I took off my hat to her, and left my money in their hands. Now I am willing to teach fruit cultivation to incompetents, and pay them to learn, for I am an orchard enthusiast. But what am I to do with unreliables, with men conscientiously unreliable—thinking freedom and unreliability synonymous? These are strong, fine fellows, with a rock-bottom of good character, but they have not been educated aright; they have not been educated to their environment. to love and reverence nature and nature's gifts, and the work that is to their hand. They look on hoeing and plowing, sowing and reaping, as menial toil. They should be taught that it is sacred service to help the earth bring forth her increase.

"'If the teacher in the little school here would lead her flocks into an orchard at due intervals and give them lessons in the care of trees, it would change the attitude of this community toward orchard-work, would dignify it in their eyes, interest them in it, and develop the section in many ways.'

How the Solution Worked

"I thought on his words in my next visit to the school while a lad declaimed 'Catiline's Defiance to the Senate.' 'Here is where I come in,' thought I. 'I will have a little private talk with the teacher and tell her what Mr. Orchard says.' This I did. She sent him a note asking permission to 'lead her flocks at due intervals' into his orchard for object lessons in fruit culture; confessed her ignorance of the art, and suggested his co-operation. He met the school in his orchard, gave the first lesson himself, offered prizes for perseverance and efficiency, and wound up with refreshments and music from a graphophone. Other orchardists followed his example. That school has become the star institution of its community, and its most distinctive and popular feature is the course in fruit culture. Its scholars know how to plant, to prune, to worm, to spray, to hoe and to plow trees; and how to gather and pack fruit for shipment without wounding and skinning trees and without bruising fruit. To whatever section of our country the fruit goes, the receivers are beneficiaries of that little school. What I did for that section anybody can do for another by studying its needs, its school, and approaching its teacher, preacher, and leading citizens in the right way."

THE HOME'S TREASURE AND THE NATION'S PROBLEM

THE advance of the rising generation is by far the most interesting and potential feature of human experience as well as one of its greatest problems. Here are a girl and a boy with all the charm of childhood; a future woman and a future man, with all the possibilities for romance, for genius, for success or failure. They are our nation's asset, charge and problem, and it is trying to discharge its obligation through the public schools. Is this being properly done?

Stress of Life

"We don't live any more. We're all the time getting ready to live," said one woman to another. "I've moved three times in one year—not because I wanted to; I want to stay in one place and not be packing and unpacking all the time. In the first case, the house in which I roomed changed hands; in the next, the people meddled with my affairs until I had to go; in the last—before I came here—the house was to be torn down to make room for a business establishment. And now—" She looked into the other's eyes—the other who had hoped to keep this tenant, and not to have to move furniture all over again to suit somebody else. "This house," said the tenant, "is not constructed for two families. One bathroom and one kitchen and no separate gas meter—"

"I know," said the other, "I have thought of making improvements—" "Oh, not for me!" hastily interjected the tenant. "The firm my son works for may order him to Buffalo, or Galveston, or San Francisco any time!" "That's it! Everybody is uncertain. What one tenant wants, another does not; and with everybody so uncertain, why, I'm uncertain myself! I think I'll break up and board."

A grandmother spoke up: "We used to have time to live. We had not such unrest. We had, as a rule, to spend a lifetime in one place, and we adapted ourselves to it and it to us. Generation succeeded generation in it. Those who married and went away came back for long visits to the old homestead. Parents tried to have their children marry and settle near them. Grandparents and grandchildren, brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts and cousins gathered under the old apple trees or about the big fireplace. They loved the old homestead; loved to be together; to have the neighbors drop in; they lived. I don't know what's the matter with you modern folks that you can't live, but I think moving around has something to do with it. I wonder if this movableness does not breed instability of character and instability of affection."

SAMANTHA AT CONEY ISLAND AND A THOUSAND OTHER ISLANDS

By Josiah Allen's Wife

Given for One NEW Yearly Subscription at $1.50. Or, Given with One Renewal for $2.00. Postage Prepaid.

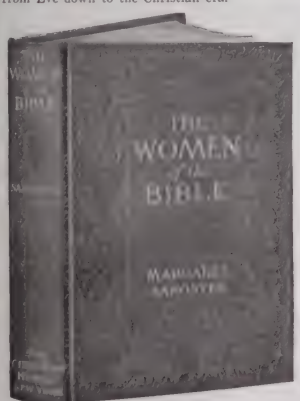
Samantha was living happily enough as Josiah Allen's wife when they returned from their trip around the world, and all might have gone as merrily as a wedding bell, had not Serenus Gowdey put the idea of Coney Island into Josiah's head. After that Josiah could talk of nothing else.

Samantha gave him catnip tea, but that didn't get the "pizen" out of his system. He spoke of it day and night, and Samantha was more shocked than surprised one morning to find that he and Serenus Gowdey had run away to the great amusement city by the sea. Of course Samantha followed him immediately. How she pursued Josiah through the mazes of the concessions, how she rode the witching waves, went on a voyage to the moon, watched the circus, looked in the magic mirrors, sank through the floor, got lost in the maze, trod the rocking steps, lectured the Head Hunters, discovered the fire, rescued the incubator babies from the flames, and finally saved her beloved "pardner" Josiah from the jaws of the blazing lion, etc., etc., are all told graphically with humor and pathos.

THE WOMEN OF THE BIBLE

Given for One NEW Yearly Subscription at $1.50. Or, Given with One Renewal for $2.00. Postage Prepaid.

This magnificent volume by Margaret Sangster has been cordially welcomed in tens of thousands of America's Christian homes. It is the most comprehensive book ever written on womankind, for it is a World's Portrait Gallery and embraces the foremost representatives of the sex from Eve down to the Christian era.



Mrs. Sangster had this to say concerning The Women of the Bible:

"In studying these wonderful women, we are brought face to face with many types of character. No two women in the list are precisely alike; yet not one, whether she be saint or sinner, prophetess or queen, daughter of antiquity or child of the early Christian era, fails in being distinctly and wholly feminine. There are many of them heroines who have the courage of men and woman's beauty in rare combination. There are women who came from the plain people, who rose to the height of a great occasion and met an emergency with an undaunted front. From Eve in the Garden of Eden to Esther on the throne of Persia—it is a far cry."

Seldom has any book issued in recent years been so beautifully illustrated as this great volume, which contains sixteen full-page artistically colored portraits of Bible heroines by famous masters. The book is printed in large, clear type, contains 368 pages, and is handsomely and substantially bound in cloth.

The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913 will be bigger, brighter and better even than that of 1912, which brought us so many letters of pleased comment.

You will find it brimming over with facts and figures concerning the World's Religions, the United States Government, Foreign Governments, Agriculture, Gardening, and many other serious subjects, besides containing good stories, inspiring poems and humorous sketches.

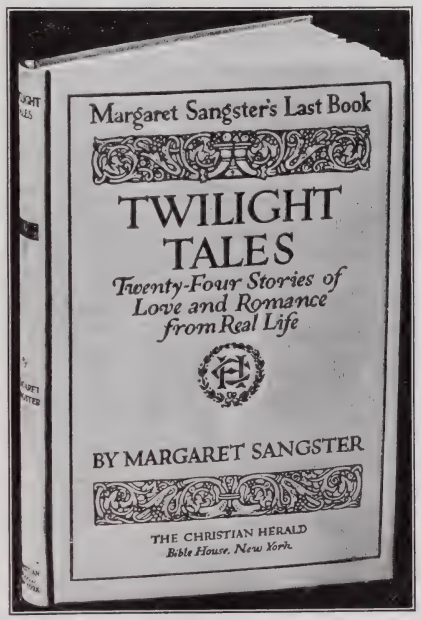
TWILIGHT TALES

By Margaret E. Sangster

Twenty-four Delightful Stories of Love and Romance From Real Life

Given for One NEW Yearly Subscription at $1.50. Or, Given with One Renewal for $2.00. Postage Prepaid.



Those who already know the rare literary charm of Margaret Sangster's writings will welcome this volume—the last perfect product of her wonderful talent. Twilight Tales comes almost as a parting message from one who has been greatly beloved by countless multitudes, and whose contributions for many years in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have made her name a household word.

Mrs. Sangster's remarkable power of sympathy and of sounding the depths of human feeling is evident in every one of these twenty-four complete stories. She is never so much the mistress of her art as when relating in her own inimitable way the progress of some love match in simple life, some idyl of the farm or the village, or a romance of the cottage, the garden, or the orchard. An ardent lover of nature in all its moods, she has put into these Tales the true atmosphere of American rural life as it is to-day, with all its charm of changeful season and its panorama of flowery lanes, ripening fruits and waving fields. Her heroes are fine types of manly character, and her women have the sweet and comely fascination, mental and physical, which we love to associate with the daintiest idea of American womanhood.

There is a thread of pure gold running through the Twilight Tales from which the reader may divine the author's purpose in writing the book. It is the line of God's protecting love and care which encircles all who trust in Him, and the knowledge of which gives to even the smallest detail of everyday life a purpose and significance. She spreads before us the little daily dramas, the heartaches, the disappointments, the sweet surprises and unexpected joys, the separations and the reunions, the cares and consolations of the household, the "journeys that end in lovers' meeting" —all are unrolled like a moving picture, with the vivid action of life itself. Mrs. Sangster has crowded the best heart and soul stories of her whole career into this book. Love, romance, self-denial, ambition and the success that true character commands are here pictured with a fragrant setting of American home-life in town and country. It is a book which will exert a strong spell on the mind of the reader and which creates its own atmosphere of woodlands and old-fashioned gardens and charming American homes, and her men and women are such as we love to meet.

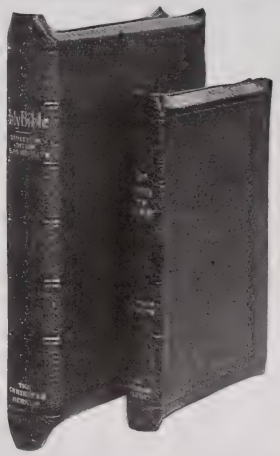
RED LETTER BIBLE

Given for Three NEW Yearly Subscriptions at $1.50 Each. Or, Sent with One Renewal for $3.00. Postpaid.

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed. In the Old Testament, the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are printed in red. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are printed in red. A Red Star (*) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.



Our Red Letter Bible contains full References; also a Concordance, Subject Index, and Dictionary—all under One Alphabetical Arrangement—together with Helps, Maps, and numerous Illustrations. The text of this Bible is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market.

If you can afford to pay $1 more, or $4 instead of $3, ask for the same Bible bound in Genuine Morocco, Calf Finish, Leather Lining, Silk Sewed, which will wear a lifetime. This Bible is equal to any $10 Bible. Sent free for Four New Subscriptions at $1.50 each.

Red Letter Testaments given for One New Yearly Subscription at $1.50. Or Sent With One Renewal for $2. Postpaid.

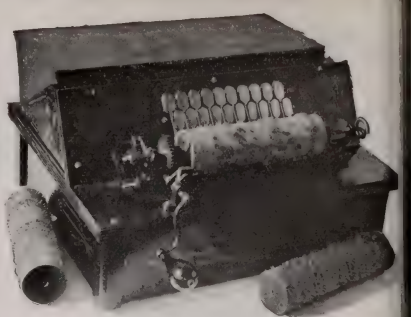
THE "MOST POPULAR" MUSIC FOLIOS

A Choice of Any One Folio Given for One NEW Yearly Subscription at $1.50. Or, a Choice of Any One Folio Given with One Renewal for $2. Postage Paid.

A happy inspiration seems to have guided the work of the compilers of the "MOST POPULAR" music books. In no other series of books does the choice from the great mass of available material display such intelligence of judgment and such nicety of distinction between what should and what should not be included.

THE MOST POPULAR HOME SONGS.—This collection contains one hundred and thirty-five of the old, familiar and favorite songs which seem to be in themselves a part of American home life. The varied contents, including songs of sacred, sentimental, humorous, plantation, pathetic, and patriotic character, include every really "popular" home song, and the folio is one which cannot be spared in any home where music plays a part in recreative hours. Cloth backs, heavy paper sides. Other Folios are:

The Most Popular Hymns. (Words and Piano.)
The Most Popular National Songs. (Words and Piano.)
The Most Popular College Songs. (Words and Piano.)
The Most Popular New College Songs. " " "
The Most Popular New Songs for Glee Clubs. " " "
The Most Popular New Songs for Male Quartette. " "



GEM ROLLER ORGAN

Given for Five NEW Yearly Subscriptions at $1.50 Each. Or, Sent with One Renewal at $1.50 and $3.00 Additional. Price without Subscription $5.00.

The Gem Roller Organ is well known to thousands of our readers, as more than 5,000 of these organs were purchased through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD alone. It has been one of the most popular low priced musical instruments ever made. The music costs only 30 cents a roll delivered, and three rolls are given free with each organ. There are thousands of rolls to select from, sacred, popular and patriotic. The powerful bellows produce a large volume of tone with more sustaining power than can be given by any two pianos. The Gem Roller Organ is the result of many years' experience in the manufacture of organs. The music is obtained from a roller furnished with pins which operate upon valve keys, made of steel. All the working parts of the instrument are easily accessible, and are made of solid metal, the rollers and keys being mounted on castings. Nothing has been omitted to give these instruments their crowning qualities of extreme simplicity and durability. They are beautifully finished, making a handsome parlor ornament, and are genuine musical instruments which any child can play without teacher or practice. Full-sized organ reeds are used, and the volume of sound will fill any ordinary sized hall. They will play hymns and popular airs with clearness and accuracy, and furnish acceptable music for any occasion. For Sunday schools and home they are most admirable. There is no limit to either kind or quality of music they will play. There are 2,000 different selections to choose from. Sent by express at receiver's expense. Weight, 15 pounds.

HE HEAD OF THE HOUSE

Glasses of jelly and y conceits of cooking found their to the front door. Strong-armed ibors were ever ready with offers d a hand. Amy accepted grate-the little attentions that ad-d a possible return, but when , the florist, came in one day with ffer to work her small garden, remarked that he didn't exactly time for it, but wouldn't like to er kept out of her vegetables, hesitated.

. Allen, however, coughed once or , and his face flushed. "Well, of e it takes time—but—well, the is, I—I'm making some experi-s in flowers, and I'd rather like to ome more ground. I—" ny's clear eyes surveyed him ghtfully. "Then if it is an advan-to you, we will make the arrange-," she said with quiet dignity.

e cloak she had been embroidering he crippled child was finally com-d. Examining the finished work, held the little garment out at s length. Upon the soft, creamy ground of French cashmere, a n in yellow and white poppies in-oven with arabesques outlined the er.

t is the very prettiest of all," ght Amy. A look of puzzled won-rossed her face. "It almost seems I'd never seen it before. I won-ow I came to make those wreaths." e carried the cloak, under stiffly d palms and languorous magno-to where, fenced in by festoons ink and white Cherokee roses, the an asylum opened its sheltering s. As she went through the s, a motor-car like a moving ce floated up to the curb, and a who bore the hall-mark of a per-ge alighted.

half hour later, the lady was ding in the nursery, exclaiming at t of the babies being arrayed for afternoon's outing.

never saw anything like it in my such embroideries in an orphan-And such marvelous work! Do me—" he nurse touched her arm, and ted, whispering, to where Amy t to fasten the new cloak about neck of the crippled baby.

You say," murmured the lady, t she is a widow and almost pen-niless? Must make her own living? Well, I'll give her a chance to do it, that is sure. May I speak with her?"

Amy listened to the lady in troubled silence. It was a strange offer, but made with an earnest assurance that was convincing. The matron was enthusiastic.

"Mrs. Kent is a senator's wife, Amy; and she has a magnificent mansion in Washington. Just think of going there with her, and having all the embroidering you can do—at big prices!"

"And you shall live for a time right in my house," added Mrs. Kent kindly. "I'll see that you are cared for."

Amy adjusted the last loop on the cloak before she spoke. Her voice trembled a bit.

"I am grateful. It is a wonderful kindness. I cannot understand it—so much kindness in the world! But—my husband—I—I must wait—to-morrow I will tell you. I must think what he would want me to do."

. . . . .

It was late when Amy reached her home, and she entered a mystery of moonlight, palm-branches, and towering eucalyptus, under which the little dark bungalow dwelling was hidden in masses of shadowy foliage like a nest. Her heart swelled with humble gratitude. How tenderly she was cared for! There seemed in the perfumed air an almost tangible, personal something that she could touch and speak to. Was this—could this be love?

In the night she woke, and wept, and wondered. Arising, she looked out of the lattice to where the calla lilies were growing in the moonlight. She drank in the warm whiteness of their beauty, and wept, and slept again. The next morning, before starting her work, she seated herself with the old book by the front lattice, where, through the blue plumbago, she could see the dew still sparkling on the grass. A mocking-bird flew down from an orange-tree to snatch a surprised worm from its moist home in the sod, and flew instantly back to the perfumed perch among the orange-flowers.

Amy began turning the leaves of the book. "Commit thy way," she murmured; "trust also in Him—"

She remembered with a sudden sharp pang that Mrs. Kent would come to-day for her answer. She fluttered the leaves. "And thine ears—shall hear a word behind thee—this is the way—"

She arose and brought out her work basket. It had occurred to her that little crippled Julia ought to have a new cap, and she had decided to embroider one for her.

When it became known in the neighborhood that Mrs. Kent had departed for Washington without Amy Kerner, it was Martha Spence who imparted the fact to Mrs. Cotton, when the two ladies met in the butcher's shop.

"Would you believe," asked Martha breathlessly, "that she told the matron that he wouldn't want her to leave her home? How on airth does she know what he wants now? She must be a bit touched, I say. Why, she jest sets there and embroiders 'n' embroiders, an' don't go out t' try an' sell any of it—though goodness knows that wouldn't be much use; she'd far better go to her folks. There's lots o' ways she could pay fer her keep. But—jest wait a minute!"—Mrs. Cotton had made a gesture suggestive of washing her hands of the whole situation, and was turning away—"I hain't told you half." Martha's eyes gleamed with the excited joy of the news-bearer. "Would you believe it? She's taken that little crippled Julia—adopted her—took her as her own! Now!"

Mrs. Cotton's impatient frown gave way to a stony glare. After an instant, she dropped the ejaculation: "Scotland's burning!"

Amy, nevertheless, surface emotions regarding her improvidence could not keep the two ladies away from her bungalow longer than toward the end of a week. As Martha, one late afternoon, was hitching her stooped figure along the cement pavement as fast as she could carry it, she saw the minister and his wife going up Amy's gravel path. Martha tried to attract their attention by signs, for her gleaming eyes and excited breath needed to be relieved of a burden by impartation. Failing this, she hurried her steps, and reached Amy's open door just behind Mr. and Mrs. Brace.

The sound of a voice raised in forceful admonition caused the three newcomers to pause on the threshold. In front of the mantel stood Mrs. Cotton. Her face revealed signs of struggling sympathy and righteous wrath; her eyes were directed to the lattice where Amy was standing. Upon the table at the widow's side, the feet of little Julia rested, and the child, in a gown of pale blue linen embroidered delicately in white daisies, was responding to the newly found love by rapturously clasping and patting the face of her adopted mother.

"Do you want us to think you are clear crazy, Amy Kerner? You've gone now and cut off your last chance of keeping your head above water, and holding your independence. Why, don't you know that you can't leave that child a minute without somebody to look after her?"

Mr. Brace had taken a step forward, but Mrs. Cotton, at sight of reinforcements, had begun to lose self-control.

"Don't you realize," her voice rose, "that with what little you have oozing out, and nothing coming in, you're going to find yourself where you'll have to take charity? Why—"

"Lemme tell you," burst in Martha of the gleaming eyes.

Mrs. Cotton flashed at her. "We know well enough what you advocate—her going to relatives. But what relatives will consent to take her with this child on her hands? And legally adopted, mind you! She can't get rid of her now. And Amy—" she turned with waxing anger and flushing face to the widow—why, you, at your age—you're not an old woman—you could likely as not—plenty of women do—marry again!"

Amy Kerner's form straightened. Her pale face contracted grievously. With a gasp, she caught the crippled child in her arms, pressed it convulsively to her breast, and walked quickly away a few steps. In a corner, she turned about and faced what seemed to her the united powers of the inferno. Anything in the nature of strife or reproach was a foreign element to her tender soul; but Mrs. Cotton's last words were like vitriol poured upon a wound.

The minister had been making futile efforts to stem the tide of Mrs. Cotton's indignation, while an embarrassed smile hovered about his mouth. When Amy turned at bay, however, quick moisture shone in his eyes.

"Perhaps I can help Mrs. Kerner solve her problem," he now said quietly. "Little Julia was given into my care with the hope of finding a proper home for her. I thought the safest way would be to place her temporarily in the asylum, knowing that any one taking her from there would be moved by the tenderest and most charitable of motives. I am deeply gratified at the result. Julia could not have found a better home, or a warmer welcome. And with Julia will come to her guardian, for life, fifty dollars a month."

Mrs. Cotton sat down. Martha Spence raised her hands speechlessly, and the minister's wife burst into tears. But Amy Kerner only clasped more closely the little crooked form and buried her face in the soft embroideries of the child's robe.

Martha's own news could not be kept longer. Half laughing, half crying, she broke out in a choked voice:

"And what do you think! That senator's wife who was goin' through the asylum, has written to the matron that Mis' Kerner could jest as well do the work fer Washington folks right here in her own home. For she'll get the orders for her, and she says there will be a plenty of 'em. And she's ordered four already — and sent the money. And what do you think she's goin' t' give fer jest one cloak? Twenty-five dollars!"

ANSWERED PRAYERS

IN THE deepest sorrow of my life I prayed to the living God, and he answered my prayer. I give him all the honor and glory, for I knew not the way myself."

There is tragedy and triumph in that letter, coming from a lady in Illinois. It would make, too, a good text for a sermon on prayer. The sorrow was very deep, but the living God was wise and mighty and kind. It is the people who have this view of God, this conviction about him, who are likely to get results when they pray; particularly when coupled, as in this case, with deep humility. This woman "knew not the way," and acknowledged it; her lack of wisdom was quickly matched by God's omniscience, her weakness by his power, and now that the trouble is over she feels in her heart that all the credit is due to Jehovah. Her humility, her confession of helplessness, her simple trust made the pathway along which his power could sweep into her life, bringing light and gladness.

Here is another letter, which teaches important lessons about prayer: "Our precious boy was saved after going through a terrible operation, and two years of sickness when even doctors gave him up. I concentrated my mind and energies on him and did all in my power, and with the help of God and a good doctor his life is spared."

In this case, as in certain of the Saviour's miracles, there was something which could be done by the one who was asking help. This mother prayed, but while she prayed she kept busy nursing the sick son; and she chose a good doctor, recognizing that God is in science as well as in grace, and that his divine healing often comes through the fingers of a skilful surgeon and through the chemical properties of medicines. Prayer and intelligence, faith and works must go together as we try to bring God's power to bear upon our human needs.

Further acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from E. T., Vinita, Okla.; E. S., Greenville, Tenn.; Mrs. W., Randolph, Ill.; A. S. S., Richfield, Pa.; J. D. D., Greenville, Mich.; J. THE MAW-KEN

.ST year a brochure upon this interesting people, whose home is on and about the rocky Mergui Archipelago in the Bay of al just off the coast of Tenassiurma, was published by the In- Government in connection with thnological Survey. This ac- was from the pen of Mr. W. J. rripiet, and in it we find the Ken classed as Mongolians. To classification we must defer, h there are many apparently reasons to question its accuracy. features resemble this race only ly. The eyes are not markedly e, but the cheek-bone is high. en first seen in their boats at the of Mergui, or loitering about in of food, the Maw-Ken appear to rraded savages; but an intimate al knowledge of them dispels lusion. Clothing is a new thing ost of them, and they generally d upon the cast-offs which they ick up in Mergui. The wearing kind of apparel gives them the rance of the nursery rhyme begwho come to town, some in rags ome in tags—there are none in gowns. Men and women gen- have the upper portion of the exposed, and few of them seem erstand the art of being personclean. Their boats are evilng from the offal which they nto them when preparing things e pot, and all swarm with creepings innumerable.

n in the streets of the town, color, which is a true brown e that of the Burman), attracts ion, and their peculiar gait them objects of curiosity. In ng they carry the body forward, keeping their balance on a pitch- at. Their boats are their homes. live, cook and sleep in them. fashion of them is strange. and stern are scooped out, to for entering and leaving the An attempt to enter from the night cause an upset.

name Selone, Salone, Selon, or g—one may take one's choice— ir Burmese designation; but they hemselves Maw-Ken. The name de up of two words—O'maw, to ; and O'ken, salt water (or the O'en is fresh water. "Drowned sea" is their self-given name. tains a history, and for this rea- is regrettable that the govern- paper upon the race has not ed it. The Maw-Ken explain years and years ago they had a om upon Kissering Island. The ese came down, drove them out founded a Burmese kingdom. y there are remains of a large ese settlement in the middle of sland. The Maw-Ken were thus driven out into the island to live a roaming life. Whenever they attempted to settle, they were molested by Burmese and Malays. When first they took to the sea life they made the sides of their boats too low, and during the monsoon weather the sea came in and numbers of boats were swamped and the occupants drowned in the sea—hence their name. Profiting by experience; they added a section to the sides of the boats. This is marked off by a rib and may be seen in the construction of their boats today.

A few of the Maw-Ken have settled on islands. These people cultivate fruit and vegetables. They are still harrassed by Malays, who, when the fruit is ripe, will land and clear away with as much as they want. In days of yore the acts of piracy were worse. Even now the Malays hold up solitary Maw-Ken boats and rob them of their provisions. The Maw-Ken are a defenseless people, and there are no police in the Mergui Archipelago. Since the pearl fishing has been taken out of their hands, they find it hard to get a living. They cannot manage deep diving in costumes, so they cannot work for those who have taken out a license for a diving-pump.

Many years ago a missionary worked amongst the Maw-Ken and invented a script, adopting Burmese characters and adding some Roman ones. He had an illustrated reader printed in this script. The effects of his work have been practically obliterated by time. The writer of this article is giving them a phonetic Roman script. He has three keen students—a man and two boys. A dictionary getting on for two thousand words has been compiled, and is being added to daily. Some translation work has been done, including the Lord's Prayer and the Decalogue.

The Maw-Ken have a romantic history, which it is not easy to trace. They "forget" when questioned, until they feel they can trust their questioner. They respond to sympathetic treatment. Some are ready to settle and to build a large village as soon as the arrangements are completed for some one to take charge of them. A scheme has been placed before the government and has met with kind consideration and promise of support.

W. G. WHITE.

In forwarding this interesting little story of an almost unknown people, Miss Susan E. Haswell, of Ahlore, Burma, writes:

Mr. White's term of service as chaplain of Moulmein's will close in a few months, and he will go to his home on furlough; after which, God permitting, he plans to return to work among this people. It is a work which will call for great self-denial and patience. I know that Mr. White will be grateful for prayer for God's blessing on the work and for any other sympathy the Lord's people may be led to give.

A few years ago was one school in Canton, China, a mat house, placed upon a of land that had been donated, modated a school of more than children, where not only reading ounting were taught, but many arts; best of all, the blind chilwere taught to see their Saviour the eyes of their souls. We vis- school for blind children in Pe- accommodated in comfortable ings, quite artistic in form. We glad to see it recognized, believhat the beautiful appeals to blind e in ways that we know not of.

The Golden Text

has in it the promise of light, the of life, and they shall have it who e followers of the Lord Jesus Christ; all are blind until they do. A new invention called the "optophone" has recently been made; by means of it blind people are made to see through their ears, not objects, but light. It is a box connected with telephones which are attached to the ears by flexible wires. It may be adjusted so that the brightest light, either sunlight or electric light, produces silence and then various shades of darkness produce sounds of corresponding intensity; or it may be adjusted to darkness so that light produces a sound whose loudness measures the intensity of the light; then moonlight is very audible, and the sun roars! It must prove of no small benefit to the blind to thus see light, opening up a new world to those who have never seen, and making it safer for them to move about. But no optophone is needed to reveal the glories of the light of heaven; Jesus alone can do that.

"While ye have the light, believe on the light that ye may become the sons of light." (John 12: 36.)

OUR YOUNGER READERS

GOOD TIMES IN THE COZY CORNER

MY DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: Your school work is in full swing now, and you are busy, I know. As I said to you in September, master it if you can. It is mastering that counts. Choose the most difficult part of your task first; attack it with a will. The easier parts will soon yield and you have saved time then to come along with the Aunt in the Cozy Corner to have some real fun.

I shall need you all as the winter comes on, for we shall be having such good times together. The plans for many of our good times will appear right here in our dear Department, and others I shall be writing you about from time to time in answer to your nice letters. We have so many new guests in the Cozy Corner that we must give them no end of happy entertainment, you see.

Have you ever played Country Spelling-Bee? If you have not, do ask mother to consent to your inviting your schoolmates to spend some Saturday evening with you, when there are no lessons, and play it. It is no end of fun, I assure you.

In the Autumn Shade and Sunlight

A Country Spelling-Bee

EACH guest on arriving is presented with a small bean bag, either red or green, which he or she keeps until later in the evening, when, after much mysterious guessing as to what the bean bags are for, the guests are asked to form into two lines, the "Red Bags" and the "Green Bags," for a spelling-bee. A captain is chosen to give out the words, which should not be over three or four letters; but they must be spelled backwards and very promptly, which is not so easy. For every mistake the speller must pay a forfeit, and redeeming of forfeits is one of the best parts of the bee. Doughnuts, taffy, lollypops, apple cake, popcorn balls, bags of roasted chestnuts, slices of pumpkin or mince pie, coffee in tin cups with treacle sweetening and coffee-cake are appropriate refreshments for a Country Spelling-Bee.

A Pretty Parlor Trick

CAN you pick up a handkerchief twisted ropewise by its opposite ends, and, without letting go of either end, tie a knot in the middle of it?

This is the way to do it. Lay the twisted handkerchief in a straight line upon the table. Fold your arms so that the fingers of the right hand come out above the elbow of the left arm, and the fingers of the left hand pass below the elbow of the right arm. With arms in this position bend forward and pick up the handkerchief, the right hand picking the left-hand end of the handkerchief, the left hand picking up the right-hand end of the handkerchief. On drawing your arms apart it will be found that a knot is tied in the center of the handkerchief.

Soap Needed

WHILE the agent was selling farm machinery at the house, the friend at the gate held his horse, and a conversation took place with the small boy of the family.

With grave incredulity he was saying: "Are you sure you are only nine years old? I think there must be some mistake."

The boy was positive, but to make sure, "Ma!" he called. "Ain't I just nine years old?"

"Yes, son."

After a time he ventured: "Say, mister, what made you think I was over nine years old?"

"Why," said the stranger, "I couldn't understand how you could get so dirty in nine years."

Answer to Last Week's Puzzle

The missing letter in last week's puzzle is E.

A SONG FROM THE SUDS

QUEEN of my tub, I merrily sing,
While the white foam rises high;
And sturdily wash and rinse and wring,
And fasten the clothes to dry;
Then out in the free fresh air they swing,
Under the sunny sky.

"I wish we could wash from our hearts and souls
The stains of the week away,
And let water and air by their magic make Ourselves as pure as they;
Then on the earth there would be indeed
A glorious washing-day!

"Along the path of a useful life
Will heart's-ease ever bloom;
The busy mind has no time to think
Of sorrow or care or gloom;
And anxious thoughts may be swept away,
As we bravely wield a broom.

"I am glad a task to me is given,
To labor at day by day;
For it brings me health and strength and hope,
And I cheerfully learn to say,
'Head, you may think; Heart, you may feel,
But, Hand, you shall work alway!'"

LOUISE M. ALCOTT.

I am lovingly always,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

FOR OUR LITTLE PEOPLE

LESSONS IN CRUELTY

A ROBIN REDBREAST in a cage
Puts all of heaven in a rage;
A dog starved at his master's gate
Predicts the ruin of the State;
A game-cock clipped and armed for fight
Doth the rising sun affright;
A skylark wounded on the wing
Doth make a cherub cease to sing.
He who shall hurt a little wren
Shall never be beloved by men;
He who the ox to wrath has moved
Shall never be by woman loved. . . .
Kill not the moth or butterfly,
For the last judgment draweth nigh;
The beggar's dog and widow's cat,
Feed them, and thou shalt grow fat.

sympathies and commands my gratitude. You may be sure that, as a man, as a Mexican, and as commander of the revolution, I desire vehemently the arrival of peace, established on liberty and justice. I am confident that the motives I express, and the manifestation of which has been shown in the spirit and the opinions of my comrades in this struggle, will result in complete justification in the lofty moral standard of yourself and the association you represent; and you may be sure also that if the result establishes in my country those principles which the revolution upholds, I am disposed to make any personal sacrifice, however great, and also all of my comrades, and shall be pleased with the suggestions and inspirations which the men of good will may be pleased to accord me. Reiterating to you my profound estimation, and requesting that you kindly present the same to the association you so ably represent, I am pleased to offer myself as your most attentive, sure servant and affectionate friend, P. OROZCO, JR."

This letter is stamped with a seal, reading: "Commander in Chief of the National Revolutionary Government. Staff Headquarters."

Since my return to New York I have kept in daily touch with the Mexican situation through sympathetic friends in Mexico and Texas. Important conferences have been held with influential Americans, who pledge their heartiest co-operation in this mission of peace; and should I favorably consider the urgent invitations to visit Mexico again, I shall, in the name of the Prince of Peace, hopefully pursue this merciful mission, to which I have placed my hands and into which I have placed my heart.

HENRY ALLEN TUPPER.

Dr. Tupper, who has been a frequent contributor to the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has placed at its disposal the story of his peace mission and its hopeful results. He visited President Taft at Beverly (Mr. Taft is an honorary president of the Peace Forum), and the latter, while expressing his earnest desire for amicable solution of Mexico's troubles, regretted that in his official capacity he could recognize only one authority, that of the Madero administration. Mr. Tupper has also been in communication with the Foreign Relations Committee of Congress with a view to enlisting its aid in the promotion of peace. President Madero has been fully informed of recent events in this connection and it has been recently announced in the press despatches that Madero's government is willing to grant amnesty to Orozco and his associate leaders in the revolution provided they lay down their arms. Whether such an offer has been formally communicated to Orozco and his associates cannot now be learned; but the fact that both sides desire peace on honorable and satisfactory terms is a significant tribute to the influence of the American peace-lovers, who undertook a task which to most men would have seemed doubtful and dangerous, but which may yet prove to be just the one bold and timely act that was needed to pave the way to peace in Mexico.

NO REAL SUCCESS WITHOUT CHRIST

MAY I say something as to the article headed "How to Find Success" in your paper dated September 18, 1912, page 903? The statement to boys, "You have but one life to live, and it is immeasurably important that you do not make a mistake," is most solemnly true. Will it do to leave Christ out when he says most emphatically, "Without me ye can do nothing"? There may be success as men count things, and religion too, without him; but it is written, "All our righteousnesses (the best things about us) are as filthy rags," Isa. 64: 6. Of course, temperance, industry, etc., are good and commendable in their way; but the Scriptures declare, "They that are in the flesh cannot please God," Rom. 8: 8. No doubt Nicodemus was moral and religious, but it was to him and not to some depraved person that Christ said, "Ye must be born again," John 3: 7. Paul was a religious man before he was converted (see Acts 26: 5); but from Phil. 3: 4-9 it will be seen that as for all those fine things "in the flesh," including his own righteousness which is of the law, he afterwards counted but loss and filth that he might be found in Christ, not having his "own righteousness, . . . but that which is through the faith of Christ."

The word "religion" and its derivatives occur but a very few times in Scripture, and generally, if not always, with qualifying terms. James 1: 26 contains the words, "This man's religion is vain," and the next verse goes on to speak of "pure religion and undefiled before God," showing that all religion is not that.

Perhaps there is no occupation better morally as men look at things than the cultivation of the soil, and yet it is said, "The plowing of the wicked is sin," Prov. 21: 4, and it must be remembered that by "wicked" the Bible does not mean necessarily those who are low and base in the eyes of men, but those whose hearts are unchanged. Jesus said to some covetous people once, "That which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God," Luke 16: 14, 15.

There can be no real, abiding success without Christ. An apostle says, in I. John 5: 12, "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life," whatever else he may have.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE GIRLS' MISSIONARY BAND of the Presbyterian Church of Dunbar, Neb., has undertaken the support of an orphan in China. The little girls are planning a handkerchief bazaar whereby they hope to raise sufficient funds to support their little ward for one year.

—THE FIFTH ANNUAL Medical Missionary Conference will be held at the Sanitarium, Battle Creek, Mich., beginning December 31 and holding over January 3. A very cordial invitation is extended to all Christian missionaries to attend. Members are to be entertained for one week by the institution. Inquiries should be addressed to The Medical Missionary, Battle Creek, Mich.

—EVANGELIST S. B. SHAW recently closed a series of revival services at Gladwin, Mich. The meetings were attended by crowds from all the surrounding country and most of the business establishments of the town closed earlier than usual on account of the meetings. There has not been such great religious interest manifested in the community for years.

—MARION LAWRANCE, general secretary of the World's Sunday School Association, informs THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that great interest is being shown in the plans for the World's Seventh Sunday School Convention, which is to take place in Zürich, Switzerland, next July. Five hundred reservations have already been made with the transportation committee and it is expected that 2,000 delegates from the United States and Canada will attend.

—REV. Z. C. BEALS, for twenty years missionary at Wuhu, China, is now home on furlough. He has gone through three of China's great famines, and also the famine last year caused by the great flood. In that connection he was appointed by the committee as buyer and in one month bought $150,000 (Mexican) worth of rice for them. This money was given by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and others. He was for over twenty years a close friend of the late Dr. Klopsch. Any church which wants a good lecturer in the autumn or winter on missions would do well to write him at 160 Warren Street, Boston, Mass.

Church in America now has under its absolute control — that it cannot possibly be realized soon, that it will hardly ever be realized without the aid of non-Catholic forces. Still it can easily be shown that this belief rests, in reality, upon a hypothesis which, if proven to be a fact, upsets the very claim of the objectors. From a purely academic point of view, the proposition: If Catholic ascendancy is to be secured in the United States of America, it must be secured with aid from non-Catholic sources, is just as tenable, and just as easily maintained, as this counter-proposition: If Catholics can obtain aid from non-Catholic sources in their aggressive policy, Catholic ascendancy in our country is assured.

It is, therefore, a one-sided method of reasoning which pronounces the publication of such facts as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD lately has set forth a piece of alarmism and pessimism. There is another danger threatening us: apathy, lethargy, mental indolence, unwarranted security, and moral cowardice. And this danger is more formidable than the former; for this danger spells death, utter inaction in the moment of peril, while the former means, at the worst, hasty action which can be speedily checked and corrected.

I am of opinion that the mere prospect that outside aid and support may come—or let me rather say, the fact that it is coming—to the leaders of American Catholicism, represents the real gravity of the present situation. American Catholicism has succeeded in creating a false impression of its importance, influence and power. Not a few of our citizens have hastily yielded to this impression without studying the facts in the case. This impression exists, in a very pronounced form, in the domain of politics, but it is also observable in all the social strata of our national life, from the wealthy trader and the man conspicuous in public life down to the humble wage-worker and private citizen. While the present numerical strength of the Catholic Church in our country may be overestimated, it is not possible to overestimate its actual influence in our present day social and political life. It is in indisputable evidence in the government of most of our large and many of our smaller municipalities. The public servants belonging to the Catholic Church who are on the pay-roll of our cities and towns are often out of all proportion to the voting strength of Catholics in that locality. Nor can this disproportion be explained on the ground that Catholics are by nature mentally and morally better fitted for public service. They may be more eager to serve; but that will not make them office-holders, unless they can impress upon their fellow citizens that it is necessary, for some reason or other, that they be placed in office. Catholic influence is being felt—and feared—by publishers of encyclopedias, who must figure on a speedy sale of large editions to reimburse themselves for capital invested; by publishers of periodical literature, who derive a large amount of revenue from advertisements. Unless these enterprises are conducted by men who will publish the truth at whatever sacrifice, they will be inclined, for their own financial advantage, to pander to Catholic power and influence, negatively by suppressing or mitigating facts unpleasant to Catholics, positively by heralding Catholicism and eulogizing its institutions and enterprises. This applies, also, in a measure, to the daily press of our country; although I personally believe that the large space often allotted to notices of Catholic events is paid for like an advertisement, though it is not published in the conventional form of advertisements. Else I can see no reason why publishers of our large dailies should be inclined to extend special favors to Catholics, when the overwhelming majority of their readers is recruited from the ranks of non-Catholics.

The latest statistics of the Catholic Church available at our National Census Bureau are found in the Special Reports of the Census Bureau for 1906. In Part I, page 25, of these Reports the Roman Catholic Church is credited with 12,079,142 communicant members, all other church bodies with 20,857,303. These figures embrace both male and female members, also minors as young as twelve years of age, or even younger. These figures merely refer to the church-going part of the nation. Outside of the Protestant, Jewish, Mormon, Greek, and other religious bodies, there is in our country a non-Catholic population of the age of communicants that is twice, perhaps three times, as large as all these bodies combined.

With these figures before one, and bearing in mind at the same time that the general tenor of our republican institutions is not genial to hierarchical pretensions and aggressiveness, one is ready to join the British historian, James Anthony Froude, in his amazement at the extraordinary growth of Catholic power and influence in the United States. Froude published his sentiments about thirty-five years ago in the North American Review. At that time the situation brought about by the growth of Catholicism in our country did not look half as critical as to-day. What would the British author say if he were to examine the situation as it is to-day? It is plain, I think, to any one who examines the facts, that Catholicism in the United States has not gained its present strong position without the conscious or unconscious, voluntary or involuntary aid of non-Catholics.

To the end that this aid may be withdrawn, there must be kept up an intelligent and respectable, but vigorous and persistent campaign of education and enlightenment, such as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is engaged in. No Catholic, indeed, must be subjected to social ostracism in any form, or to industrial or commercial annoyances because of his church relationship. Neighborly relations and trade relations between Catholics and non-Catholics must not be disturbed. Nor must any obstacles be erected to Catholics in the discharge of their religious and civil duties. There is but one thing that the non-Catholic part of the nation must clearly understand and insist on, and that the Catholic part of the nation, too, must plainly perceive and acquiesce in as a fair and equitable verdict, viz., that the claims to temporal power of the Roman Popes are incomptaible with American liberties; that any attempt to enforce these claims must be resisted by every American patriot; that even the publication of these claims must be resented as a disturbance of our national peace; and, last but not least, that any citizen of the United States who is found supporting these claims will have only himself to blame if his fellow citizens regard him with distrust, no matter how well they think of him otherwise.

Such a campaign will be attended with good results and will forestall graver dangers. In the first place it will bring about a revision of views on the part of such non-Catholics as are fearful that the opposition to Catholic aggression in the United States emanates from religious or social intolerance, and is apt to endanger the peace and prosperity of the country. It will compel these people to see that this opposition really has at heart the best interests of the country, its continued peace and prosperity, and that for all inhabitants of our land; that the opposition is directed, not primarily against a certain class of our citizens, but against a foreign power which dominates this class, and, through them, seeks to dominate our

You Want This Great Book

OCCASIONALLY you come across a book which seems actually to open some new part of your mind. It seems to give you insight into some fascinating part of life which heretofore has been absolutely closed to you. It seems to start your pulses to quicker movement and your very spirits to newer action.

And all this through Inspiration, which reading the book gives you.

"THE INNER BEAUTY"

is just such a book. As you read, it opens your mind and soul to the wonderful, uplifting, ennobling influence of Music.

It lifts the curtain before your eyes, and reveals close to you a magic existence, which you can enter at one step and completely set aside the humdrum, sordid cares of your everyday life.

It stirs within you feelings which only Music and its great influence for Good can create.

In simple language "The Inner Beauty" explains how Music is the medium through which great souls have sent down to us messages of joy, inspiration, pathos, sternness, tragedy, sympathy, love.

It explains how these messages may be interpreted, felt and expressed by anyone who desires—no matter how unskilled technically in Music he may be. It explains how the invention of the makes even the novice able to play pieces of great difficulty or extreme simplicity with perfect ease and complete understanding. How it makes him give pleasure and inspiration not only to his listeners but to himself as he plays.

VIRTUOLO

Such a thing would not be possible if his mind were tied down to a difficult process of producing music. The Virtuolo calls forth Instinct—the natural instinct for Music which lies dormant in every one of us. And it not only calls it forth, but gives it the means of perfect, free expression. All of which it accomplishes by the utter simplicity and responsiveness of its playing mechanism.

Truly "The Inner Beauty" is a wonderful book. It is so simple, easy to grasp, and yet so full of Truth, that it might have been written by one of the greatest composers—a Beethoven, a Mendelssohn, a Mozart himself.

It is published by the Hallet & Davis Piano Co., who manufacture the Virtuolo, and are famous as makers of the well-known fine-toned Hallet & Davis Piano, a piano on the market since 1839, and played on and praised by greatest composers and pianists such as Franz Liszt, Johann Strauss and others.

The Virtuolo can be had in the Hallet & Davis Piano, also in the Conway Piano, another instrument of high artistic merit.

SHALL ROME "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC"?

entire country. In the second place, this campaign will convince such of our statesmen and politicians, editors and publishers, whose public policy is dictated to them by thoughts of immediate profit and reward, and who are prone to seek alliances that will insure them a speedy achievement of their political or other purposes, that it is inopportune to disregard a growing public sentiment, which looks with disfavor and alarm upon their opportunist policy in the management of public affairs; that it is really to their interest to side with the mass of citizens who resent Roman aggression in our country, rather than with the one class of citizens who, either because of their erring conscience, or from a mistaken view of their personal advantage, foster, aid, and abet such aggression.

And this leads me, in conclusion, to say a word in behalf of our Catholic fellow citizens. Any attempt on the part of non-Catholics to adequately explain and justly determine whose is the responsibility for the undue aggression of Roman Catholicism in our country must not overlook sundry facts. In the first place, it is but fair that a distinction be made between the Roman hierarchy, in particular the Italian head of the same and his advisers, and the laity of the American Catholic Church. True, the consistent Roman Catholic must follow the dictates of the Pope and the Curia. The Catholic Church, accordingly, has been able, as a rule, to control the action of its followers on public questions, and to present to the outside world the spectacle of a well-compacted society loyally supporting its leaders. Nevertheless, it may safely be considered a question that cannot be answered except when the actual test comes, viz., whether Catholic laymen, if they were placed before the alternative of either refusing to obey their Pope in his demand of support for his temporal schemes, or renouncing allegiance to our secular government, would not choose the former course. I, for one, believe that there would be not a few who would choose this way out of the dilemma. In the second place, we must not forget that, despite the seeming advance of Catholicism and its cry of "the passing of Protestantism." there is a constant defection from its fold going on, not only in European countries where for centuries it held undisputed sway, but also in our country. Bishop Cameron of Pittsburg calls it "leakage," and no doubt draws an ironical smile from Protestants when he speaks of the Belgian Catholics who come to this country as being "Catholics in name only," and when he says of the Italians in particular: "from their poverty, lack of religious education, indifference and apathy toward the church, they are a favorable field of proselytizers." (The Presbyterian, July 3, 1912.) Surely, "this is the most unkindest cut of all" for the poor Italians. First, Rome makes them what they are and then blames them for being what they have become under Rome's fostering care! It is possible to view these Italians in a better light: they know from their own sad experience what Romanism in full operation means to the spiritual and secular interests of men. Many of these people would be loath to establish in our country a supremacy and tyranny from which they had fled in their own country. The ceaseless and ever louder assertion of the claim of American Romanists for prerogative and preferment may, in the end, serve a good purpose with some of their own people: it may open the eyes of some of them as to the danger which threatens our common liberties; for these would be taken from them as well as from non-Catholics, if America should become a Catholic country.

Lastly, there are also in the Roman Church in our country well-meaning people who earnestly strive to go to heaven. They honestly believe all that their Popes and priests teach them. They consider it their religious duty to support also the temporal claims of their Popes. Their consciences are bound in the strong fetters of error, and they are horrified at hearing their religious leaders attacked. Their misinformed and misdirected conscience bids them regard the truth which non-Catholics publish about the tenets of their church as falsehood, slander and vituperation. They are led to look upon their leaders as persecuted martyrs. Such is the deplorable power of an erring conscience: a person with such a conscience spurns the truth in his endeavor to follow the truth. If he wants to act conscientiously, he must obey his erring conscience; that is the only one he has. For these people every one must entertain cordial pity. They may ultimately become bigoted fanatics. But their bigotry is not removed by abuse and by relentlessly charging them with error. Only the truth of the Gospel of Jesus Christ can break the fetters with which their consciences have been bound. The State can do nothing for these people. Their misery is of a spiritual sort, and will yield only to spiritual treatment. Evangelical Christianity has a great mission to these people, to lead them by the pure teaching of the Word of God from darkness to light, from error to truth, from bondage to liberty. Among the forces of Romanism these people represent the "tenth legion"; they are conquered, whenever they are, only by the grace and truth of the Son of God.

No Church Should Be Permitted to Dominate in America's Political Life, Writes Dr. F. E. Clark.

YOU have presented a most serious theme for our consideration. While I believe in giving to every Roman Catholic every political and social right that any Protestant enjoys, I am just as strongly of the opinion that he should have no more such rights or privileges.

If, as seems probable from the expressions of Pope Pius, Archbishop Ireland and others, which you quote, there is to be an aggressive effort to make the Roman Catholic Church a power in the political life of America, every Protestant should resist this effort. Though I am a Congregationalist, I should repudiate any effort on the part of Congregationalists to obtain control of the machinery of government for the sake of promoting the interests of my denomination, and I certainly should not voluntarily concede any such rights to any other denomination, however large or powerful it might be.

No Political Church, and Church and State Forever Separate, Writes Dr. Goodell.

IN AMERICA, church and state must forever be separate. Whatever may be their religious affiliations, her citizens must see to it that no political aspiration be allowed to divert any church from its moral and religious high calling. If any church becomes a political schemer, God and all good citizens will see to it that her candlestick is removed out of its place.

Completely Equipped

The Fastest Selling Car in America

EFORE we announced this car we had signed contracts for over 39,000. Yet we had planned to limit our 1913 production to 40,000 cars. We are hipping 150 cars a day. Yet we could 00 a day if we could make them. Right ve are over 3,000 cars behind our iate shipping orders. We have been condition for the last 30 days. It is ing to look as if we never could up.

tically every important 1913 announce- as been made. A careful examination e announcements will prove precisely ve have been claiming—that there is $1,200 car built that has any more al value to offer than this one for $985.

omobile values must be looked at from 1 different angles. You must consider ly the price, but what that price buys You must take into consideration the , the strength, the beauty, the con- on, the size, the appearance and the nent of the car. You must judge a car material in it; the workmanship on it; ethods employed to produce it; and ut not least, the facilities behind the ction methods.

mine each one of these fundamentals Overland at $985 and you will find a at is identical with any $1,200 car in orld. Go further and you find high-grade construction and painstaking care in finish that equal the production methods employed in the making of any $5,000 car you know of.

This car has the power of a $1,200 car; it has the strength of a $1,200 car; it has the size of a $1,200 car; it has the seating capacity of a $1,200 car; it has the wheel base of a $1,200 car; it has the chassis construction of a $1,200 car; it has the comfort of a $1,200 car; it has the beauty and finish of a $1,200 car.

Take the equipment item alone. It has a Warner speedometer—the best made; it has a fine mohair top and boot; it has a clear vision wind shield; it has a self-starter and Prestolite tank—every practical accessory made for an automobile. And all for the one price—$985. There are no "extras."

Then there are those important construction features which are only found on the very high-priced cars. This model has a drop-forged I beam section front axle, fitted with the famous Timken bearings; a three-quarter floating rear axle fitted with Hyatt bearings; a selective transmission, with three speeds forward and reverse, fitted with annular bearings, and a cold rolled pressed steel frame. It has the center control. The brakes are unusually large for a car of this size and power, and are ample for cars of much greater weight. There are two powerful sets of the drum type, internal expanding and external contracting. The great braking surface of these is indicated by their dimensions, 13 inches by 2¼ inches each. These are the brake dimensions you find on $1,500 cars. Pick up the catalogue of any $1,500 car and see for yourself. The springs are semi-elliptic front, three-quarter elliptic rear. Each spring has six leaves. Tires are 32 x 3½ Q. D.

This model is superbly finished. The striking body is in dark Overland Blue. Battleship Gray wheels harmonize perfectly with the rich, dark body, which is trimmed in black and nickel plate.

How can we market this car at this price? By making 40,000 cars a year. Increased production brings decreased selling prices. There is the answer in six small words.

If we could bring you fully to realize the size of our huge organization, you would more fully appreciate and understand the value of this car and why we can do what others cannot.

The demand for this car has already swamped the entire visible supply for the 1913 season. It has actually simmered down to a mere allotment proposition. So if you want an Overland "69" get your order in quick.

Any man who pays over $985 for a completely equipped 30 horsepower, five passenger touring car of this type and size is just wasting money.

See this Model "69" at the Overland salesroom in your city at once. Order early if you want it early. Handsome catalogue request. Write today, addressing Dept. 118.

Questions and Answers

R. P., Lebanon, O. Have the Jews political equality in all countries, and are the higher offices open to them?

In Russia, Roumania and Galicia, which contain the great majority of Israelites, they still suffer social and political exactions and are under strict medieval restraint so far as their religious state is concerned. The revolution of 1848 completed the work of the French Revolution in assuring political equality to the Jews of Western Europe. Great Britain broke down the barriers in 1858 when Lionel de Rothschild was allowed to enter Parliament. Since then, Jews have held the highest offices under the British Crown. There have been a Jewish prime minister, several Jewish Lord Mayors of London and a Jewish Master of the Rolls. In Rome the ex-minister of war was a Jew, and the present mayor is a Jew. In this country, the Jews have full political rights, and stand high in finance, literature, science and art, with any and all offices open to them.

R. S., Lowell, Mass. Is our alfalfa crop increasing or decreasing and is it true it is not grown in England?

Largely increasing, and much attention is being given to improving it. The world has been ransacked for seeds of promising species and three expeditions have been made into Siberia for the purpose of obtaining ample quantities of certain forms to enable the breeders to work together in the creation of superior drought and cold resistant forms for the Northwest and winter-growing varieties for the irrigated valleys of the Southwest. Of course it is grown in England as a forage crop, but over there it is generally called lucerne. Alfalfa is a Spanish-American name.

W. H. S., Waco, Texas. 1. It is absurd to attribute the loss of the Titanic to any other cause than that which was announced at the close of the inquiry, viz.: reckless speed in the face of known danger, lack of sufficient lifeboats and life-saving appliances and lack of the prescribed emergency drills by the crew. 2. The fate of the people or nation that "forgets God" is foretold in Scripture (Ps. 9: 17) and is abundantly illustrated in history. 3. The passage in Rom. 8: 28 must be taken in conjunction with what precedes it. It describes the mutual attitude of God and the believer as a co-operative one, for the furtherance and completion of his high design for the salvation of men. The believer has the assurance of faith and "knows" that, happen what may, He will bring his beneficent purpose to pass, and will give the strength and courage to overcome all obstacles.

S. D., Yankton, N. D. Is there any difference between the magnetic pole and the North Pole?

There are two kinds of poles: the North and South Poles, which are the terminal points of the earth's axis, and the magnetic poles, which are the points on the earth's surface where the dipping needle stands precisely vertical; that is, where the dip is 90 degrees at the north magnetic pole, the north end of the dipping needle pointing vertically downwards, and at the south magnetic pole, the south end of the same needle pointing vertically downwards. Owing to the peculiar magnetization of the earth the magnetic poles are not diametrically opposite. A straight line drawn from one to the other would miss the center of the earth about 750 miles. The north magnetic pole is in latitude 70 degrees 5 minutes north and longitude 96 degrees 46 minutes west, and the south magnetic pole in latitude 72½ degrees south and 155½ degrees east.

G. S., Lebanon Junction, Ky. Please explain Matt. 5: 20, 29, 30; Matt. 8: 11, 12, 20-22.

1. Matt. 5: 20. The righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees was formal; it did not spring from the heart. Christ's plan of righteousness is that it should be the spontaneous fruitage of a meek, worshipful, affectionate spirit; that it should spring from an ardent, self-forgetful love to God and man. 2. Verses 29, 30. Righteousness and salvation are such priceless things that nothing in the world must be allowed to stop our pursuit of them. The eternal values are here contrasted with earthly values; better suffer any loss or sacrifice here than to miss eternal life. He wished to impress on his hearers the terrible importance of spiritual and eternal things; then they would learn that eyes and hands must be used, not for the gratification of self, but for service to men in the name of Christ. 3. Matt. 8: 11, 12. The Jews thought they had exclusive rights to salvation; Jesus says in these verses that many Gentiles shall enter the kingdom of heaven while many of the chosen people shall be cast out. It is another insistence that real religion must be of the heart; membership in the Jewish race will not save unless the heart is right. 4. Verses 20-22. Christ made the extreme sacrifice in coming to earth (see Phil. 2: 6-8 and II. Cor. 8: 9). His followers, therefore, must realize their obligation to make any sacrifice for his sake. Under ordinary circumstances he wants his followers to fulfil their obligations to households and friends, but in this case he probably saw that the man had not definitely made up his mind to put Jesus first in his life. If he could have trusted him he would probably have directed him to attend the obsequies of his father and then return; but he feared that if the man got back among his old acquaintances he would lose his determination to be a follower of Jesus. Christ everywhere insists that he must be first; then he directs his followers to fulfil their social obligations in his name, serving others for his sake.

J. H. T., Eugene, Ore. What was the time and what the probable purpose of the establishment of celibacy among Catholic priests?

It originated officially with the edict of Siricius, bishop of Rome (A.D. 385), who argued that the reason why priests in Old Testament times were allowed to marry was that they might be taken exclusively from the tribe of Levi; but as no such exclusive limitation prevailed in the Roman Catholic priesthood, marriage was unnecessary and inconsistent with the priestly office. The Roman bishops who succeeded Siricius sustained this contention and a long line of Popes confirmed it in their decretals. For centuries, however, there was a continuous struggle over it among the Romanist clergy and many lived openly in wedlock in spite of the decrees. Finally, about the sixteenth century it became a fixed rule of the Roman Church. It is a system which ever since its introduction has given rise to many abuses.

B. A. B., South Newbury, Vt., writes: "In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 2, N. H. B., Orangeburg, S. C., asks: 'What is the meaning of the Bible saying "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it many days"?' In the fifties of the last century I was visiting as a colporteur the people of what is now South Chicago with instructions to see that every family had by purchase or gift a Bible. A large portion were foreigners. I found one English lady who seemed to me a real Christian, and this is the story of her conversion: About five years before my visit a gentleman in the same business had called. She did not care enough about the Bible to buy one, but taking one with black cover and gilt edges said: 'If you will give me this I will read it.' Bowing his head on his hand he said, after a little, 'If you will read two chapters each day and five on Sundays, you will read it all through in a year. If you will do this and if you get so interested in the book that you finish it sooner, and if you will still read two chapters each day, the book is yours.' Her reply was 'I will do it.' She soon saw herself a sinner, and took Christ as Saviour. I think this story is a perfect answer to that question about bread cast upon the waters. I am not saying THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S answer is not correct, for it is."

E. N., Woodbridge, N. J. Please explain Josh. 6: 26.

It means that the man who attempted to rebuild Jericho would meet with calamity. His eldest son would die at the beginning of the work, which would take so long a period that it would not be completed till the birth of his youngest. Some interpret it as meaning that the youngest would die at its completion. It was a solemn injunction and warning against the restoration of a fortress (the walls of the city). See the fulfilment of the prophecy 550 years later, recorded in I. Kings 16: 34.

Miscellaneous

A. W. S., Livingston, N. Y. The terms "kingdom of God" and "kingdom of heaven" are usually held as interchangeable. In the New Testament in most cases where they occur, they are certainly so.

I. M. B., Olustee, Okla. Italicized words in the Scriptures indicate words supplied by the translator and which do not appear in the original. Parenthetical passages, with very few exceptions, are so in the original.

Any reader of this paper knowing the address of Wallace R. Seavey (last heard from two years ago at Glens Falls, N. Y.) will confer a favor by sending the same to Mrs. Mary R. Seavey, 130 Lumber Street, Allentown, Pa.

W. F. B., Perry, Mich. At no time during Jesus' life on earth could it be affirmed that he left off his humanity. In him the divine and the human were perfectly united, this union being more in evidence after the beginning of his active work, and increasingly so toward its close.

Reader, Bennington, Vt. It is true that there were specific promises to Israel; but there are many promises that are meant to apply to God's faithful people everywhere, in whatever country and age they may be found. The assertion of agnostics and advanced thinkers that we cannot claim the promises in these days is a familiar argument of unbelief. God's love is over all his children to-day as much as in earlier times and those who serve him and who walk in the light, as Jesus revealed it, are "inheritors of the promises."

SHALL ROME "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC"?

...eve themselves to be in possession ...the truth, they must desire to see ...truth universally accepted. To ...e up this desire is to give up their ...nt to exist.

When you come to think it over—

It isn't necessary or advisable to deal with an agent when you want to arrange life insurance.

From first to last, the agency way costs you extra money.

When you want to find out about a policy for any purpose—to protect the family, educate the young folks, for endowment, for business use—the rational way is to deal direct with the POSTAL LIFE.

You thus escape commissions, branch-office expense, collection fees and exactions by the various States; furthermore, you get full official information which is in black and white and binding on the Company.

guaranteed dividends go to Policyholders in subsequent years.
3d. The usual contingent policy-dividends, enhanced by Postal Life economies, still further reduce the cost each year after the first.

It is always good business to cut out the middleman when you can, but you can't always do it.

In arranging a POSTAL Policy, you can cut him out and save money for yourself just as hundreds have done and are doing in constantly increasing numbers.

A Complete Bible Library

PREPARED FOR EVERYDAY USE

EVERYONE knows that the Bible is the most interesting and fascinating book ever written. But in order to fully appreciate its wonderful charm and its wealth of hidden beauty, it is necessary to know more about the Holy Land and its people, to have the benefit of authoritative comments upon the text and some simple method of easily and quickly locating the different incidents and thrilling events of Bible history. There are many books based upon the Bible and Bible history, it is true, but the use of such a collection of books requires so much skill and labor in referring from one book to another as to make it impracticable for ordinary use. Realizing the great need for a simple yet complete and combined "biblical library" at a price within the reach of all, the Society has prepared and now offers the

Self-Interpreting Bible Library

Consisting of 4 splendid volumes containing the complete Authorized Version of the Bible with Commentaries and Study Helps on the same page with the text, History of the people of Bible Times, Bible Atlas, Life of Christ and the Prophets, Dictionary and Concordance, Cross Index—beautifully illustrated with a wonderful collection of photographs of the Holy Lands arranged in connection with the text. It makes reading the Bible a pleasure and a delight and opens up a world of beauty and interest that has been almost meaningless to the average reader. Edited by Bishop John H. Vincent. Indorsed by Bishop D. S. Tuttle, Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus, Gipsy Smith, and leading ministers of all Protestant denominations.

The 448 Actual Photographs

REALIZING how much easier it would be to appreciate the Bible if every one could visit the Holy Lands and see for themselves the places and scenes of Bible history, the Society equipped a special Expedition at a cost of $25,000 to tour Bible Lands and to secure actual photographs of all the places made sacred by the footsteps of Christ and the great events of Bible history. The result is a truly priceless collection of 448 wonderful 7 in. by 10 in. Biblical and Historical photographs, by means of which the Society now brings Bible Lands to us in our own homes.

The Atlas of Bible Lands

CONSISTS of one large folding map of Bible Lands showing route covered by our Expedition, together with full-page colored maps of Canaan, Babylonian Empire, Persian Empire, Kingdoms of Judea and Israel, and many others made expressly for the Society.

The Cross Index

PREPARED for the first time in connection with the Scriptures, by means of which every person, place and event recorded in the Scriptures is now readily accessible.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

THESSALONICA, THE CITY OF THE LIVING

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

PHILIPPI is to-day the city of the dead," alonica is no less em- hatically the city of ving. In following the teps of St. Paul we shall to few cities so large prosperous, so bustling modern" in every sense e word, so thoroughly as Salonica, the ancient alonica, to which Paul, d and sore from his re- hard experience in Phil- wended his slow way. ad, however, the com- of a good road over to travel, a comfort is denied to the mod- raveler who takes the route. This road was eat Via Egnatia, which, have seen, connected with Constantinople. undred miles or more Macedonia was one of est parts of this magni- highway. It is said to been paved with marble ooth as a house floor, onstantly kept in repair. s interesting to remem- at this was a continua- of the same road which postle trod years later he made his last jour- rom Pozzuoli to Rome. st when he reached Ap- orum and the Three ns he again struck into ia Egnatia, though called by a different name, the most magnificent high- of ancient times, and which has not its rival in any part of the world e first stage of his journey took him to Amphipolis, thirty-three miles Philippi. This was one of the most important cities of ancient Greece, ts strategic position in the past, commanding the highway from the coast Macedonian plains, added to its importance. In the earliest days it was l the "Nine Ways," because of the great number of roads that centered ; but when the Athenians established a colony at that point they called it nipolis, because it was a "city surrounded by water."

s interesting to note in what classic lands we find ourselves while follow- e footsteps of St. Paul. The chief interest to us in these articles, to be arises from the fact that over these roads the great apostle with his com- ns traveled, and in these cities they abode for a longer or shorter time, o the classical scholars as well, every road of this journey is of interest. ncerning Amphipolis, Thucydides wrote intimate knowledge, and, because of his e in an expedition against this city, he was l. Demosthenes, in one of his great ora- concerning the threatening power of Philip of Macedonia speaks of Amphipolis as of great importance in the struggle between Philip and the people of Athens. "It was also the scene," as a famous authority tells us, "of one striking passage in the history of Roman conquest. Here Paulus Æmilius, after the battle of Pydna, publicly proclaimed that the Macedonians should be free, and now another Paulus was here, whose message to the Macedonians was an honest proclamation of a better liberty without conditions and without reserve."

As Paul left Amphipolis, he saw, across a narrow stretch of salt water, Stagirus, the birthplace of Aristotle, and farther on among the mountains which he must cross, he passed the tomb of Euripides. Thus, almost every mile reminded him of some of the great men of antiquity. Another thirty miles brought the apostle to Apollonia, through the pass of Arethusa, whose mellifluous name conjures up to the mind of the classical scholar everything that is beautiful and picturesque.

In Apollonia Paul rested perhaps but one night, and then pushed on thirty-seven miles further to Salonica, the great capital of Macedonia. Here he found a city after his own heart, the center of a teeming population, a great political capital, an important seaport, the "Liverpool of northern Greece," as it has been called, its ships plying the waters of the Thermaic Gulf as they sail for or return from all the great ports of the world.

Here was a cosmopolitan population such as Paul most loved, for it gave him his greatest chance to proclaim the good news of salvation to all classes and conditions of men. Here were Jews and proselytes to the Jewish faith, Greeks and Romans, high-born and low-born, a heathen rabble whose prejudices could be readily excited, and "noble women" and men too, who gladly gave ear to the Gospel.

The city to which we have now come has had a continuous history for more than 2,500 years. Even before it was refounded and renamed by Alexander the Great, in the year 315 B.C., a city had existed on this beautiful gulf, facing mighty Mount Olympus. But its known history dates from this year, when Alexander rebuilt it and called it Thessalonica, after his sister, the wife of Cassander. It is said that Philip of Macedonia named his daughter Thessalonica because on the day he heard of

SAILORS AND MARINES ON PARADE

The Marines Passing the Reviewing Stand

ONE of the most interesting features of the great naval mobilization which recently took place in the Hudson River was the land parade of seven thousand sailors and marines from the fleet. Led by Rear-Admiral Frank F. Fletcher and his staff, escorted by a number of naval bands and drum and trumpet corps, the parade proceeded down Broadway from Ninety-sixth Street to Fifty-ninth, then through and down Fifth Avenue past the Public Library, where the reviewing stands containing Major General Barry, Rear Admiral Osterhaus, Mayor Gaynor of New York and many others, were located. A great throng of people witnessed the parade and voted it one of the most successful events of the entire naval di The ships of the various States were applauc along the march as the swinging lines of crews came in view. The Utah's crew att special attention and received special applau they brought their mascot, a little brown ashore to march with them her birth he won a victory over the Thessalians. Thus the victory of Philip and the name of his daughter, the half-sister of the conqueror of the world, are all embalmed in the name of the city which Paul has made more famous than all the conquerors and generals of the past because he abode there some five months, and wrote to the disciples whom he gathered there two of his most important letters.

Who would have suspected, as they saw this little Jew in his brown cloak, with his solitary companion, measuring off the weary miles from Philippi to Amphipolis, from Amphipolis to Apollonia, and from Apollonia to Thessalonica, that he would do more for the fame and perpetual remembrance of these cities than all the generals and rulers and philosophers and poets and historians who flourished in them during all the centuries of their greatness?

As Paul approached Thessalonica he saw a great city with its harbor full of shipping, its white houses rising in tiers one above another from the edge of the water to the summit of the acropolis behind the city, and around all a white wall five miles in extent. Through the heart of the city stretched forth the great artery of trade, the Egnatian Way of which we have spoken. At the eastern end it passed under a magnificent marble arch, which was built in honor of the victory of Octavius and Antony over Brutus and Cassius in the battle that took place on the plains of Philippi.

Fortunately for Thessalonica, she had sided with the Monarchists against the Republicans in this battle, and when it was over, both Antony and Cæsar visited the city and commemorated their triumph by erecting the Arch of Victory, which remains to this day. Under this archway doubtless Paul and Silas passed many times during their somewhat lengthy stay in the city.

It has been my privilege more than once to visit Salonica, to enter it from the sea as one journeys from Athens, and to leave by the route by which Paul entered it on his first visit. It is interesting to note the characteristics of the city, which are the same now as in Paul's time, as well as the changes which the centuries have wrought.

It was a beautiful day in February that we last entered the harbor of Salonica, the city whose name even has been less changed with the lapse of the centuries than have the names of most of the cities we shall visit in these articles.

We had just steamed by glorious Mount Olympus, the most famous mountain of all antiquity, that rises ten thousand feet sheer from the blue waters of the Ægean.

There it stands to-day, majestic in its isolation, cloud-capped and mysterious as ever. One cannot wonder that it was peopled with divinities, demons and spirits of all kinds, good and bad, by the simple folk of the elder time. Even before passing the mighty bulk of Olympus, the city of Salonica appears imposing in the distance with its glistening white houses and minarets.

We approached slowly and carefully, because the harbor had been mined by the Turkish authorities to prevent the entrance of Italian gunboats. A little pilot steamer came from behind a headland five miles from the city to lead the way, and at the slowest possible speed we approached the beautiful metropolis.

It must be said that, like all Turkish cities, distance lends enchantment to the view of Salonica, though it must also be said that Salonica is one of the cleanest and most progressive cities in the domains of the Sultan.

We see one conspicuous sight, which Paul did not see, and that is the gleam of the sunshine on the many minarets, which rise, white and glistening, from between the houses. Scores of these beautiful ecclesiastical towers add greatly to the charm of the city as we approach it. Though the worship of which they tell is a debased and sensuous one, yet it is far better than the religion of the heathen temples which greeted Paul's vision, for if they tell of Mohammed the prophet, they also declare that there is one God, and not a myriad of pagan deities.

As we land at the busy quay we find all the bustle and confusion of a great seaport. We were so fortunate as to find a friend patiently waiting in a small boat with his much-bedecked and be-pistoled kavass, who relieved us of all trouble in landing and at the custom house. We went with our missionary friend through the street that skirts the waterfront and that leads to his industrial farm school, some five miles out of the city. In this street Paul would have seen sights that would indeed have amazed him. Through the center of the street runs a track of the electric car system of Salonica, and the whizzing "broomstick trains" dart back and forth at a rate which would have frightened the leisurely camels and donkeys and their riders of the ancient days.

Close up to the sea wall, which prevents the waters of the bay from inundating the city, lie the black hulks of the modern steamers which call every great harbor in the world their home port. On the shore side of this fine street are large hotels, great business warehouses and office buildings, while further on it is lined on both sides with beautiful residences of modern Salonicans.

All these things would have looked strange indeed in Paul's eyes, but Olympus is the same now as then, towering gloriously to the clouds on the further side of the bay. The rippling waters of the Thermaic Gulf, which lie between the city and Olympus, glisten in the sunlight and ripple under the gentle breeze as in the ancient days, and the hill behind the city, crowned with its fortress now as then, tells that the days of war and bloodshed unhappily were not left behind with the advent of the Christian era and the teachings of the great apostle.

As we traverse this busy street, either on foot or in the electric cars, we see a motley variety o ple, for Salonica now, as in ancient times, is f for its cosmopolitan population. This is one meeting-places of the East and West. He Occident and the Orient jostle each other same narrow highway. In Paul's time the were numerous, and so they are to-day. The no synagogue in Philippi, in Amphipolis, or lonia, but evidently there was a large synago Salonica, and here the apostle first proclaim universal message. To-day it seems as if other person one meets on the street is a Jew. Jewish women are distinguished from the T ladies by their unveiled faces, and from the by the fillet around their heads and the gree headdress hanging down behind. Often, too, wear long green robes lined with fur.

But besides the Jews and Turks and Greeks are Bulgarians and Armenians, English and mans, Wallachians and Albanians, French Italians, and occasionally, very occasionall American. But the quality of the Ame makes up for any lack of numbers, since m those who make Salonica their home are en in mission work, and have for their chief pu the proclamation of the same Gospel that preached.

As we pass the guarded villa-prison of Tu deposed Sultan, Abdul Hamid II, and come ou the open country that surrounds the busy city, l us still looms mighty Olympus, seemingly a more grand and majestic from each new po view. To the left rise other hills, most of rounded and bare, and affording pasturage f numerable flocks of sheep and goats. And in a beautiful site, under the sheltering hills, the broad blue gulf in front, is a sight that do eyes good, for we see a genuine American built by an American missionary as a center Christian school, where poor boys of all races, all the country round, are received and taugh only the love of the school book, but the wo the farmer and of the mechanic, which will fit for their future life of toil, as well as the knowledge which is found in the Book of bool

This is an enterprise started by the Rev. H. House, a missionary of the American B who has given many years of his long life to for Macedonia, and who has crowned these fr years by establishing this important industria ter, which is already looked upon as a model Greek and Turkish neighbors. Surely this m apostle is following in the footsteps of his predecessor, who, when he came to Salonica nineteen hundred years ago, not only procl the message of the Gospel to all who would but wrought with his own hands, as these boy taught to work, that he "might be chargeable man."

What friends Paul found in Salonica, the a tures that he met, and the further impression this most interesting city makes upon the m traveler must form the substance of an article.

Balkan Patriots Preparing to Return Home

General Vucotitch

Montenegrin Infantry on the March

THE STRUGGLE IN THE BALKANS

SPITE of the firm convictions that were oiced by diplomats and distinguished stu-ents of international affairs, the first few ays of actual hostilities between Turkey and lontenegro were marked by a series of bril-successes for the sturdy little mountaineers. Montenegrin army began the war in highly atic fashion by attacking a strong Turkish on just across the frontier opposite Podgor-. With a flying of flags and playing of the negrin national air, Prince Peter, King las's youngest son, fired the first shot. n a short time the Turks had been driven their first strongly fortified position on t Planinitza. They retired to further forti-ons on Detchitch Mountain, and over the ter- surrounding it the battle continued for -two hours before the Turks were again dis-i and compelled to surrender. The Turkish ander and officers and, it is believed, about thousand soldiers were captured. Military ts immediately announced that there was e strong position left between the successful negrins and the important Turkish center, ri. This last position, Tushi, surrendered to lontenegrins after a sharp battle on the af-on of October 14.

e advices through Constantinople say that ghting continues around Berana, where the hostilities before the actual declaration of ook place. The Constantinople despatch minimizes the successes of the enegrins, claiming the display of great bravery by the Turkish troops. Northern Montenegrin army, under General Vucotitch, is reported to crossed the border into the district of Novibazar—that strip of Turkish ory that extends northwest between Servia and Montenegro—and gained thold by capturing Byelopolye, one of the most important towns of the nce. The town fell, it is stated, after prolonged fighting. The Serb in-ants welcomed the Montenegrins erators from the Turkish yoke. urch service was held and pray-ere offered for the Montenegrin ough up to October 16 there had no open declaration of war by the Balkan kingdoms, all the world fully convinced that a continua-f the struggle with all the Slavic ipalities against Turkey was unavoidable. That this feeling ntertained in many of the capi-of Europe was evidenced by the sing of war credits and the gen-though quiet, preparations which hand for the weathering of the should one actually break. Aus-though her movements have d considerable alarm lest they d drag some of the larger powers the struggle, cleared the atmos-a few days ago when she made fficial declaration that, in spite of enerally known deep interest in mbitions for the district of Novi-, she would, during the present st, keep her hands off it. The addressed by the Powers to the an principalities has not met with rkable success. From Belgrade, a's capital, came the polite ex-ion of regrets at that country's lity to comply with the terms of ote, because the proposals failed ovide guarantees for the execution of the long-talked-of reforms in Macedonia. Bulgaria, through her government at Sofia, said in reply to the communication that it is most anxious to do nothing which would aggravate the situation, and was desirous of leaving open every avenue for the maintenance of peace until the last possible moment.

Greece and Turkey, though they have not so far broken off diplomatic relations, have been exchanging rather heated correspondence over the seizing of several Greek merchant vessels in the Ægean Sea. The release of these ships within twenty-four hours was demanded by Greece on October 14, together with the payment of an indemnity to the owners of the ships. In reply to this the government at the Porte agreed to release those vessels which bore foreign-owned cargo, but reserved decision on the question of indemnity and the other ships. Greece has mobilized her navy and added to it, by purchase, a new cruiser, which was recently completed at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, for the Chinese Government. Reports from Athens state that she has now 130,000 men ready to take the field, and has already garrisoned those strategic points along her northern frontier where fighting took place in 1897.

The news from all the capitals of the Balkan States, as well as from Constantinople, Salonica, and Athens, is being so closely censored that it is almost impossible to tell from the veiled language of the correspondents what is actually taking place. Through the larger centers there has been as yet no report of hostilities along the southern borders of Servia, yet other despatches state that half the Servian army in three divisions is being transferred to Sofia to effect a union with the Bulgarian army for operations against Adrianople, where, according to all indications the greatest European battle since Metz and Sedan is likely to be fought. This is coupled with the report that a Turkish column has already entered Servian territory on the aggressive and opened hostilities with some of the frontier guards. A telegram to the London Daily Mail from Semlin, Austria, opposite Belgrade, says:

"Servia's note to Turkey, which contains the demands of the Balkan States for very radical reforms in the Turkish European provinces, has been speedily answered by the Porte in the most unambiguous language. At five o'clock this morning a considerable number of Turkish troops crossed the Servian frontier between Ristovatz station, on the Nish-Uskub Railway, and at Vertigask, twenty-five miles further west. The Turkish troops engaged with the Servian troops guarding the frontier, and heavy fighting took place. It is probable that the main Servian army has now passed through the long, narrow Morava defile and has emerged on the comparatively high plateau between Vranya and the frontier, where the concentration is finished."

Reports of fighting both on the Servian and Greek frontiers have been made public through London, while a suspicious silence veils the progress of events in Bulgaria. This, it is believed, may well mean that the Bulgarian army is now en route to the frontier in the direction of Adrianople, where, according to all indications the greatest European battle since Metz and Sedan is likely to be fought.

DISCOURAGED PEOPLE

A SERMON

BY

Rev. C. L. Goodell, D.D.*

TEXT: "And as he lay and slept under a juniper tree, behold, then an angel touched him and said unto him, Arise and eat." I. Kings 19: 5

DISCOURAGED! That is a good word with a bad prefix. And a word is known by the prefix it bears. What a sad and evil company this prefix leads out—Disease, Disgrace, Dishonor, Disorder, Distrust, Distress, Dissatisfaction, Discontent. The man who is discouraged is in a sad estate. Taking the word to pieces, we see that it means the man who has lost heart.

"Now, the heart giveth grace unto every art," and he who has lost it has lost the joy of life. If a man can do anything to hearten his neighbor he renders the greatest service which a friend can render. It will be a blessed thing for us all, if we can find that God has a cure for the "blues." There are discouraged people all about us. Some are discouraged about business. Times have been poor and they have lost heart in their work. They have lost confidence in their own ability. They are discouraged about their health, discouraged about their family. Dear ones are sick and boys or girls are going to the bad, and their hearts are like to break. The times are out of joint; the cost of living is too great; there is social warfare on every side. Political contentions fill the air and, altogether, it sometimes seems that the largest and saddest order on the face of the earth is "The Knights of the Juniper Tree."

Human Discouragement

How human it is for people to be discouraged! We roll into one all the evils we ever had, all we have now, and all we ever expect to have, and we worry about them. The Bible itself is filled with the sad plaint of discouraged men. Even Jacob, standing before Pharaoh at the ripe age of 130 years, was fain to say that his "days had been few and evil." Moses was discouraged, and cried: "I am not able to bear all this people alone. If thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, out of hand, and let me not see my wretchedness." Gideon was a man of faith usually, but he was discouraged one day and said, "The Lord hath forsaken us and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites!" But that was pure imagination. The Lord had done nothing of the sort. Job was a patient man, but he cried out: "My soul is weary of my life. I will utter freely my complaint upon myself. I will speak in the bitterness of my soul." Jeremiah, who made kings tremble, said: "Cursed be the day wherein I was born, for my days are consumed with shame." Solomon sounded the whole gamut of human experience, but cried at the last that it was all "vanity and vexation of spirit." Jonah was one of the charter members of the Knights of the Juniper Tree, and tried to convince himself that he did well to be angry with his fate.

How Others Have Known It

The fact is, the old kings and prophets were very much like the rest of us. The best of us at times grow weary and discouraged. It is true that John Wesley once said he had never experienced lowness of spirit for a quarter of an hour in his life. But he was a remarkable man, and left no descendants to inherit his patient spirit. The most of us see times when we are tired of life's struggle, and our defeats are so many and our victories come by so narrow a margin that we are seldom bold as we come into battle. All history and literature is filled with the plaint of discouraged men, and we share it with our brothers. In spite of all our toil we are not satisfied. The river runs to the sea, but the sea is never full. What we began with enthusiasm we prosecute at length with indifference. The flood tide is gone, and only the slimy beds remain with never a white crest of the coming sea. As you watch the flotsam and jetsam of our city streets, you are fain to say with the old Scotch woman, "It's a sair sight; a sair sight!" One of our English essayists has made a list of the exclamations of men in "the blues," and it is dismal reading for a rainy day. Byron sums up his experience by saying:

> Through life's drear road so dim and dirty,
> I have dragged on to three and thirty;
> What have those years brought to me?
> Nothing, except thirty-three!

Schopenhauer, the arch-pessimist, said: "Our condition is so wretched that utter annihilation would be preferable." Diocletian grew tired of his throne, and said he "would rather plant cabbages in Salona than rule the world in Byzantium." Servius said "he had been everything from peasant to emperor, and nothing was of any good." Abderrahman the Magnificent said he had had but fourteen happy days in all his life; and Franklin surpassed him in the shortness of his count, for he said he had had "but five fairly happy days," and if he were to live his life over, he doubted if he could reach a round half dozen. St. Bernard said life was "begun in blindness, continued in toil and ended in emptiness." Savonarola and Knox unite with Luther in saying that men were not worth the trouble they had given to save them, and prayed that God would come forthwith and take them home. Cromwell cried that his life had been a burden too heavy for a man to bear. The poets are not always hopeful and happy. Shakespeare says:

> Tired with all these,
> For restful death I pray.

Cowper longs for a "lodge in some vast wilderness," where "rumor of oppression and deceit may never reach him more." Shelley sings:

> I could lie down like a tired child
> And weep away this life of care.

Let us be thankful that God has a cure for discouraged people. Let no man go to his cups and produce sodden soul in the vain attempt to cure a wounded spirit. Do not go to the festivities of the fast set, the excesses of social life, the fascinations of gay surroundings and company. For these will only plunge you into the blackness of darkness. And, least of all, don't undertake to rid yourself of misery by rushing into the presence of God unbidden and unprepared.

God's Remedy

If you are disappointed or discouraged in any way, try God's remedy. What that is may be learned from the case of Elijah. Here he is under a juniper tree. You would never have thought it of Elijah; he who had locked up the cisterns of the heavens and carried the keys in his pocket for years; he who had overthrown the altars of Baal; who had been vindicated on Carmel by fire from heaven, and whose hand was even now blistered and stained from putting four hundred false prophets to the sword. "What doest thou here, Elijah?" Sure enough! I am surprised at thee! What has happened that a man of courage has become a coward? Nothing but the wagging of one woman's tongue. Jezebel sent word to him, "I will make your life like that of the prophets of Baal by to-morrow!" And Elijah ran away from a woman and did not stop till he was clear of the country and a full day's journey into the wilderness. Perhaps there is a lesson before we go any further. Are you discouraged? Are you not the man who sang not long ago, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits; who healeth all thy diseases, who redeemeth thy life from destruction"? Are you not the man who once cried, amid the shadows, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance and my God"? Are you not the same woman who had a great victory and set up a memorial saying: "Hitherto hath the Lord helped me; I will not fear what man can do unto me"? Was not your life so full of bounties that you sang long ago, 'The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want'"? What is you doing under the juniper tree?

But see what God did for a man who was so forgetful and so discouraged. First, he feeds him. There is no use to talk with a starving man. God satisfies his needs. An angel spreads the board. A frugal feast spread by angel hands is better than a sumptuous seasoned with the bitter spices of sin. Twice the angel feeds him, and to good purpose, for in the strength of that he goes forty days in the wilderness. God's manna will give you strength that will last. The devil may spread a great table, but there is no nourishment in his food. His apples are dead apples of Sodom."

The Message of the Wilderness

God takes Elijah into the wilderness to Horeb to talk with him. It has often happened that God has led men away where the voices of the world are hushed, and in the great silences he has spoken to them. After the tornado and the earthquake and the fire are past, there comes the "still, small voice," and he who was not in the mighty tempest comes in the whispered message. "What are you doing here?" says God, and the prophet answered, "I who have done so much, am now a refugee. What shall I do?" The answer is sharp and stirring. "Go back. Take up the work you have to do. You have a commission to make kings. Get out of your cave and go at it!" So God says to every man: "Take up your work." The chances are that you came into your despondency through lack of service. You were so busy about yourself that you forgot your neighbor. You have failed to realize that you are his follower, who "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." There is many a heart to help. There is much work to be possessed, and many enemies to be overcome. But God is with you and he will give you a victory.

> It may be the bitter future
> Is less bitter than you think;
> The Lord may sweeten the waters
> Before you come to drink;
> Or if Marah must be Marah,
> He will stand beside the brink!

If you are old and weak and the burdens of life are heavy, let your soul hark back to prayer. If you cannot man the lifeboat, help to launch it, remember, "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff." We are tempted, like the prophet, to think that we are alone, that no one will wield the sword or lift the spear with us. God told the prophet that there were seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal. So there are far more about you who are interested for you and for the kingdom of God than you can know. God is not dead. He who has cared for thee from the cradle will care for thee to the end. He is more interested than you can possibly be in the world and its work. Do not be alarmed. He and not you trundled it into space. He and not you gave its worn rocks a baptism of blood from his own heart. Pray for the touch of the angel that may open your eyes to see that the hills are full of the chariots and the horsemen of God. Get out from under the juniper tree. Gird up your loins for a pilgrimage with God. Israel will be won. The day is already dawning. Laughter and hope!

"Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him who is the health of my countenance and my God."

GRIEVE NOT

EVE not at close-shut doors, dear heart, or let thy weak hands vainly beat t these. Stand still, where'er thou art, wait with patience calm and sweet, ist God's voice, beloved, to hear, t calls thee closer to his side, her fields that lie more near,
ere other doors are open wide.
all to him, he knoweth best,
ugh drear the chosen path may be:
thou no more, in his will rest, fuller, sweeter, strong, and free be thy yielded life. He knows t where he needs thee, hour by hour, where thy spirit stronger grows;
knows thy strength, he knows thy power, where thy light will brightest shine, id life's mists and shadows dim,
ting all his love divine,
t where thou canst do most for him.

SCHEMERS AND PLODDERS

BREEZILY, and full of enthusiasm, the schemer entered the office of the plodder and greeted him pityingly, utterly heedless of every sign that work was pressing.

"Still on the same old job, I see; nose on the grindstone. Say, I've struck the finest scheme you ever heard of. If I can get it started before anybody else gets hold of the idea, it's ready money. At the very least, I'm sure of twenty thousand the first year"—and so on, with argument and proof to sweep aside all doubt. The next week he drops into the office again to borrow a dollar. He is working on a new scheme. Oh, no, the other is "all right," perhaps, but the new one is better.

Schemes and scheming may easily become the bane and ruin of an otherwise steady and useful life. Inventive genius, originality, initiative, are most excellent qualities and strong aids to success, but the passion for scheming is a thing apart from these. Usually the habitual schemer is lacking in real creative genius or effective initiative. He sees part of a plan, but only the seductive part. The flaws he does not see, or he does not rightly estimate. He expects some one else to remedy the faults and carry the plan through with the necessary brains, energy, and capital. He is surprised and offended when the hard-headed man of experience fails to enthuse and puts his finger instantly on the weak points of the plan.

Usually the schemer is carried away with the thought that he has discovered a way to get large returns for little effort or expenditure—an unsound proposition in business or personal life. Any habit or any plan which makes "how much can I get and how little can I give?" the rule of life is injurious, wherever it is applied. With this false relationship comes, as a natural accompaniment, the temptation to trickery and exaggeration. Scheming and schemers are seldom free from these two characteristics.

Fictitious exchange values, with unsound principles and methods of operation, render most schemes insecure and temporary. No solid or permanent success can be built upon such foundation. The schemer is always starting things, but never finishing them. Very often he has left some one else "holding the bag" while he chases on after another will-o'-the-wisp.

OFTEN I have watched a man pounding—swinging heavy blows with his sledge-hammer—on a rock and seemingly making no impression. He doesn't appear to mind that. One blow follows another on the same spot, again and again, rhythmically. All of a sudden, one blow, just like the rest, falls, and the rock is split through to the heart. It wasn't the last blow that did it, but all the blows. How easily the man might have been discouraged when the first blow, and the second, and even the tenth, produced no visible result! It takes faith and courageous persistence to be a plodder, faithful from moment to moment and day to day in efforts which seem to be profitless, but which we believe will bring the cumulated results in due season.

The plodder need not wait for all his profit, however. He may gather from his daily task increase of strength, as the man with the sledge-hammer grows muscle with each swing of his arms. The plodder gains in the very qualities he uses. He makes his own power while he expends it. In certainty of achievement he has the advantage over the schemer because he is building steadily upon a foundation of knowledge and experience which will hold up whatever superstructure of success he may erect. Sometimes, in the crowded heart of the city, you may see a valuable plot fenced off and vacant so far as can be seen from the sidewalk. Week after week, sometimes month after month, this empty spot seems to mock the surging crowds and the skyscrapers around it. Where a small plot of ground is worth a million dollars, why is this valuable space standing so long unoccupied? A glimpse the other side of the fence will disclose the reason. The plodders are drilling deep into the ground and preparing slowly and laboriously the foundation upon which the building is to rise, and that building is expected to be worth all the time, and all the labor, and all the valuable space given to it.

MEN of modest, inconspicuous abilities often outstrip their more brilliant and versatile rivals in the race of life. There is a law of compensation in all things. We find it in the more delicate sense of touch in blind persons, and often in the greater persistence, the more steady, unyielding purpose in men who lack inventive genius or superior intellect. Students in college, the sons of poor parents, working their way toilfully but eagerly through their course, have made for themselves places of power and influence in the world while their better-favored fellows have failed to grasp any prize worth while.

The greatest achievements of man have been won not by strength, nor by great cleverness, but by persistent, heroic plodding. The engineer does not scheme to send the express train by a single leap over the mountain chain, but by slow, plodding toil he bores tunnels and builds bridges, inch by inch, until the giant task is done. The scientist does not wipe out disease by the wave of a magic wand or the sudden compounding of a medicine. He studies and experiments through toilsome years, with countless substances, and organisms, and agents, while the world knows him not, until at length he gains his victory and humanity hails another savior of the sick.

Man is very little, and he is very great. The mightiest tasks are his, but he must be satisfied to do them slowly, patiently, bit by bit. He was commanded by his Creator to have dominion over the world and subdue it, but his conquest must be gained through the centuries, as he feels his way on and on into the great mysteries of creation. Not by a single stroke of the fist will the door of fortune open to the average man, but there is no door that man has any right to open but will yield to the persistent knocking of the determined applicant. There may be drought, there may be blight, there may be flood, there may be fire, there may be raids from the Philistines, there may be thieves in the night; but we have the promise, and we are content to work on, for as sure as dawn follows night, faithful plodding will earn its reward, and we shall reap in due season if we faint not.

MY CREED

A LOVING thought, a loving word,
Crowned by a loving deed;
These three revealed in one true life
Express my creed.

Quietly come, quietly go,
Quietly show in need
Sweet mercy to thy fellow man;
This is my creed.

Teach men to love, teach men to pray,
And watchful be to feed
The hungry sheep of God above;
Read here my creed.

With all thy heart, with all thy mind,
With all thy soul indeed,
To love thy God with these and strength,
Tells all my creed.

Refined by Suffering

YOUR article on "Euthanasia" brings back to my mind one of the most beautiful characters among God's suffering ones that it has ever been my privilege to know, Miss Mary Taylor of Wheeling. Miss Taylor, when a young girl of but eighteen years, was thrown by a horse and her spine was injured so that she lost the power to use the lower part of her body. She has lain in bed for more than forty-five years. During all that time she has not stood upon her feet nor sat entirely upright. Twice a week or oftener, she is lifted by her sisters upon a couch while her bed is made up, after which she is lifted back into bed again. Twice a year she moves: in the fall into a back room, which can be heated more easily; and in the spring into a middle room from which, when window and door are opened, she can see out into the street and see people passing. In all these years she has never been carried out of the house into which she was taken after she was hurt. She never saw an electric car or electric light or an auto until they came on the street in which her home is situated. She has spent her waking moments largely in reading, knitting, and such other work as she could do with her hands, while partially propped up in bed.

I visited her often during a pastorate of sixteen years. I never heard her murmur nor complain on account of her lot. She always had some blessing to tell of that had been hers. She frequently spoke of the goodness of God and of the many kindnesses that were being shown her and hers. She told me that for a year or more after she was injured she was very rebellious and unhappy; but when told that she could never expect to walk again, she asked God for Jesus' sake to have mercy upon her and give her grace to bear what he had seen fit to let come upon her. And she said that she was given the grace to quietly submit and to believe that the Lord would overrule her affliction for her good and for his own glory. From that time on she stopped complaining and began to count her blessings. And she has been blessed.

It is very hard for us mortals to explain why God permits such things. But are such lives lost? I think not. If one object of life is preparation for a higher life hereafter, then these lives are not lost, for they are ripening for heaven.

ULSTER MEN AGAINST HOME RUL

Sir Edward Carson, the Anti-Home-Rule Leader, Signing the Covenant

GOOD old Irish enthusiasm bubbled over at Belfast on "Ulster Day," September 28, when thirty thousand Irishmen took the oath pledging themselves to resist Home Rule. The day marked the culmination of a strenuous and dramatic campaign conducted throughout the province of Ulster by the former Solicitor General for Ireland Sir Edward Carson. Perhaps the most remarkable demonstration of the campaign was that of the great meeting held in Ulster Hall, Belfast, on the eve of Ulster Day. As Sir Edward Carson rose to speak, Colonel Wallace, Grand Master of the Belfast Orange Lodge, came forward bearing the flag which was carried before King William in the Battle of the Boyne, 1690. At sight of this historic flag, the audience broke into a frenzy of cheering.

Colonel Wallace declared, in presenting it: "This flag has lain quiet in the peaceful possession of the lineal descendants of that gallant officer, Lieutenant Watson, who carried it at the Battle of the Boyne. His descendants have thought that now is the time that it should come forth from its rest, and should once more take its place in the van of freedom." Sir Edward said in reply: "I accept this flag as a token of victory and religious liberty. I hand it back to you, Colonel Wallace, as representing the Loyal Orange Order. I ask you to keep it as a sacred trust until we have killed the conspiracy that confronts us at the present time." Later Sir Edward and Colonel Wallace exhibited the flag to the crowds outside the hall, where it was greeted with wild applause.

The protest made by these "men of Ulster" reads like a long ago chapter of history, but there can be no doubt of their tremendous earnestness. They have the same determination which fired the men who rallied round the dauntless William of Orange and won for him the Irish support for his throne, defeating and driving away King James II, who had returned from France at the instigation of Louis XIV in the hope of saving Ireland for Catholicism. It is this intense loyalty to Protestantism which is firing the men of Ulster in this present crisis. Fearing that "Home Rule will mean Rome Rule," they are defying the British Parliament which has taken the first steps in producing and passing a Home Rule Bill, and are declaring that they will not be bound by the acts of a Dublin Parliament. The exhibition of the ancient flag which led the Protestants to victory over two hundred years ago has intensified the sentiment of protest, and the men of Ulster are apparently determined to stop at nothing in enforcing their demands.

Crowds Surging Down Royal Avenue, Belfast, to Sign the Ulster Covenant

The flag itself is in a remarkable state of preservation and is indeed a beautiful banner. It measures seven feet by six, is made of silk, beautifully woven by Flemish or Dutch craftsmen. The ground of the flag is orange, with a five-pointed black star in the center; in the top corner nearest the staff is a white square with a crimson cross. It has been kept since its appearance on the ancient battlefields in an air-tight case, and has not entirely lost its first luster.

The ceremonies on Ulster Day proper were spectacular and significant. The great manufacturing plants were generally closed, and though the streets swarmed with enthusiastic partisans there was little or no disorder throughout the day. The first exercises were religious, Rev. Dr. M. Kean, former Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, preaching a sermon in the City Hall, being assisted in the services by Episcopal, Methodist and Cong... tional clergy... Sir Edward Ca... TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD —ON OCTOBER 9 JUAN J. ZAVALA, the Nicaraguan consul at New Orleans, made public a cable message from the Nicaraguan Minister of Foreign Relations at Managua announcing that peace had been re-established there. Although the message contained no elaborate details it was generally interpreted as meaning that normal conditions have been re-established.

—A NEW TURN WAS given to the development of revolutionary ideas in Mexico when it was learned definitely that General Felix Diaz, a nephew of ex-President Diaz, had taken the field with the avowed purpose of organizing the rebellious elements and overthrowing the Madero Government. It is believed by those who are familiar with Mexican conditions that this defection of Felix Diaz is one of the most serious blows which have yet been dealt the new administration.

—THE CRUISER Maryland, bringing Secretary of State KNOX from Japan and Secretary of the Interior Fisher from Hawaii, reached Seattle, Wash., on October 11. Secretary Fisher has been conducting an investigation at Honolulu, which has covered social, political and economic conditions in the islands. One of the chief results of his mission was the withdrawal of charges which had been filed against the present governor of Hawaii and the decision that the public utility corporations should be placed under the jurisdiction of a local commission. Of his trip to Japan Secretary KNOX said: "I have the pleasantest recollections of the kindly reception that was everywhere accorded me in Japan, both personally and as representative of the American people at a time of profound national mourning."

TRIED TO KILL COLONEL ROOSEVELT

E EX-PRESIDENT, SHOT BY A SUPPOSED CRANK AT MILWAUKEE, ADDRESSES AN AUDIENCE THOUGH WOUNDED

Col. Roosevelt Leaving His Train at Chicago after the Shooting

N OCTOBER 14 the whole country was shocked by the news that Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, the Presidential lidate of the Progressive Party the most picturesque figure in present campaign, had been shot dangerously wounded by an as- in in front of a hotel in Milwau-

At first the wildest rumors e in circulation; but as the details ie occurrence became known, and as learned that the wound was necessarily a mortal one, a great e of thankfulness swept over the on.

olonel Roosevelt, who was stop- at the Hotel Gilpatrick, was paring to go with a party of po- al friends to the Auditorium re he was to address a political ering. A little before eight P.M., mpanied by his cousin, Philip sevelt, his secretary, Elmer E. tin, Henry F. Cochems, Captain). Girard, and several other gen- ien, Mr. Roosevelt left the hotel, he entrance to which there was a l-sized crowd, who greeted him ially. He took his way through throng toward his automobile, h was waiting at the curb. In best of spirits and with no ght of danger, he exchanged tings with some, shook hands others, and had a pleasant d and a smile for all around

Nobody seemed to pay any par- lar attention to a short, round- d, stockily-built man, who stood he edge of the crowd and whom colonel passed as he went to the car. Mr. Roosevelt smiling his acknowledgments and had his hand upon door of the car when this man, who had pushed up as e as possible, suddenly raised a pistol and fired point- nk at Mr. Roosevelt's breast.

was all the work of an instant: the murderous atti- e, the crack and spit of the revolver, and the sudden ering of the victim. For that single instant, the crowd apparently stunned and incapable of action; but the e of the shot had hardly died away when Secretary tin, who is an athletic six-footer, sprang forward, and, hing the would-be assassin, who was trying to fire an- r shot, bore him to the ground, where, with one arm nd the man's neck, he held him down, while with the hand he wrenched loose and secured the loaded pistol. man fought like a demon, but Martin, aided by Chair- Cochems, quickly subdued him. The muscular secre- picked the man up and carried him over to the side of car. Colonel Roosevelt stood gazing, with a strange, tified look on his face, while the crowd, which had now un to realize the situation, was angrily howling against assailant and crying: "Lynch him!" "Kill him!" onel Roosevelt looked steadily at Martin's prisoner, who ned likely to be torn to pieces. Then, with a wave of hand, he motioned to the excited crowd to fall back. Don't hurt him! Poor fellow! Stop! Stand back!" came in command- tones from the ex-President. Reluctantly they gave way and allowed Martin and Girard to take their struggling prisoner into the hotel, where he was turned over to the police.

Secretary Elmer E. Martin

It is a question whether at this juncture Colonel Roosevelt really knew that he had been hit at all; certainly the crowd did not know it.

"Were you hurt, Colonel?" cried out a chorus of eager voices.

Roosevelt smiled back at them—the old familiar smile. "No," he said, "not a bit. He missed me that time; but we had better go on or we shall be late at the Auditorium."

Satisfied with this personal assurance of his safety, the crowd thinned out, and the Roosevelt party entered the car which made its way toward the Auditorium. In the party was John McGrath, another of the colonel's political secretaries, who sat opposite to Mr. Roosevelt. They had only proceeded a few blocks when McGrath suddenly leaned forward with a cry, and pointed to Colonel Roosevelt's big brown overcoat — an army overcoat it was. "There's a hole in your coat, Colonel," he said huskily. "Better look at it, quick!"

Mr. Roosevelt gleamed at him through his glasses, then turned his eyes down, and there, on the right breast, was a hole. He undid the buttons of the big overcoat and put in his left hand beneath it. A moment later, when he pulled the hand out, the fingers were ruddy with blood.

There was a shudder among the occupants of the car and several endeavored to persuade the wounded man to give up the meeting and have his injuries attended to at once.

"No," was the grim reply. "I'm going to the Auditorium and I'll make this speech or die! I'm not seriously hurt." He pressed his left hand against his right breast as he spoke, and the bloodstains could be seen.

On reaching the Auditorium he was told that his determination to go on the platform and speak might endanger his life, but he smiled at such warnings and remained resolute in his purpose. In the dressing-room, some of his clothing was removed, and a hurried examination was made. The manuscript of his speech—about a hundred loose leaves —was blurred and blood-soaked, and in parts illegible. It was perforated by a bullet. The bunch of pages had been carried in his right inside coat pocket, and had so checked the bullet that its force was largely spent before reaching the skin. The manuscript had apparently saved the colonel's life.

Drs. Terrell and Stratton of Milwaukee and Dr. Sorenson of Racine, who were in the audience, were summoned to the dressing-room and made a superficial examination of the wound. They would venture no guess as to the extent of his injuries, but urged him to go to a hospital instantly. But the colonel's mind was made up. Bullet or no bullet, he would keep his appointment. And when the bleeding puncture in his right breast had been stanched and temporarily dressed with the aid of a handkerchief, he walked out of the dressing-room upon the stage, the audience in front (wholly unaware of the shooting) greeting him with cheers. Then Chairman Henry F. Cochems of the Speakers' Bureau stepped forward, and, in a shaking voice, told them that Colonel Roosevelt had been shot and was wounded. A cry of horror went up from the great audience. Many rose and called out: "Tell us, Colonel, are you hurt?" For answer, Mr. Roosevelt walked to the edge of the platform, and drawing back his coat, the excited gathering saw the blood-stains.

"It's true," he said calmly; "but I'm going to ask you to be very quiet. I'll do the best I can, but you see there's a bullet in my body. But it's nothing. I'm not hurt badly. It will take more than that to kill a Bull Moose," he added, with a touch of the old humor and the Roosevelt smile.

He proceeded with his address with the grim determination of a man who had a message to deliver even if it cost him his life.

While these events were taking place at the Auditorium, the assailant of Mr. Roosevelt had been turned over to the Milwaukee police, after a narrow escape from lynching at the hands of the crowd around the hotel. He gave his name as John Schrank, and made no attempt to deny his crime or his deadly purpose. He is of medium height, weighs about 160 pounds, is light complexioned, and partly bald. His mouth indicates peevishness, craft, and a certain kind of determination. He has a shifty, wandering eye and a manner that indicates mental disorder. Dr. Spitzka, the distinguished alienist, says the man is insane.

Schrank said he belonged to no political party, but had a "great reason" for his wild action. A written "proclamation" found in his pockets stated that he had a dream in which President McKinley appeared to him in

The Attack on Mr. Roosevelt

THIS nation has cause for profound gratitude to God in the fact that Theodore Roosevelt's life has been spared, and that the attempt of a monomaniac to assassinate him in Milwaukee has failed. Present indications justify the hope of his early and complete recovery, although a bullet in his breast and a broken rib will still be the reminders of an episode which the merest fractional divergence might have transformed into a national calamity. We have learned by sad experience that one of the penalties of public prominence is personal danger. Any notable American is a shining mark for cranks and irresponsibles of the class of which Schrank is evidently a type. To guard against such enemies is a practical impossibility. Like the mole, they burrow in the dark, revolving their malign plots in their own disordered brains and disclosing them to none. Schrank had no accomplices; men of his type rarely have, and this fact makes them all the more dangerous as hidden foes against whom even the strongest can have little defense.

Now that the pressure upon the public mind has been somewhat relieved by the reassurances of the doctors, we may look back with glowing appreciation on the manliness of Theodore Roosevelt in those trying moments when he stood face to face with death. Stout of will, resolute of purpose, in confronting a danger that would have appalled most men he showed himself to be of the stuff of which brave men are made. Americans forget the politician in such a crisis and see only the man standing calm and unafraid amid the storm of excitement that followed the murderous attack, and even pleading for his assailant. They see him wounded and bleeding, delivering his message to the crowded Auditorium, as, with the grim courage of a Cromwell, he vowed he would do even if it cost his life. It is a scene that will be long remembered—a story that will be told wherever the deeds of "men of heroic mold" are spoken of in the years to come.

Meanwhile the nation hopes and prays for the recovery of Mr. Roosevelt, that he may be spared to his own dear ones and to render further useful service to his country. It is a welcome sign that political antagonisms are usually superficial and do not strike down to the roots of character. It is astonishing how little they begin to seem at such a time. When the heart is touched, all trivialities and conventionalities are brushed aside and we look behind the mask at the real man. Ex-President Roosevelt is one of the chosen few whom Americans love to honor, and his recent experience has given him, if possible, a warmer place in their hearts than before. Political suns may rise and set, but as an independent and arousing factor in the national life of our time, he occupies a very special place from which he would be sorely missed.

Concerning Rewards

DO THE Scriptures teach, and where, that some persons will receive more reward in heaven than others? Do any passages teach that some will enjoy heaven more than others?"

These questions, coming from a reader in Pennsylvania, awaken a quick response of interest and longing in every Christian heart.

The most comprehensive passage on the subject of rewards is found in I. Cor. 3: 10-15. St. Paul clearly shows here that the question of rewards is quite distinct from the question of personal salvation. All who have faith in Christ will be saved. But the work done is of differing qualities and values, and a man will be rewarded according to the value of his work. Jesus taught the same thing in the parable of the pounds (Luke 19: 12-27): the man who had gained ten pounds received ten cities to rule; the one who had gained five pounds received five cities. Our mansions in heaven are prepared for us; they are God's free gift. But we have the furnishing of them in our own hands. We can "lay up treasures in heaven" by the thoughtful, worthy, self-sacrificing things we do on earth.

Yet, after all, the finest attitude of mind about rewards is to work without thinking of them.

"What guerdon will ye?"

"None! For the deed's sake have I done the deed."

So spoke the youthful Gareth to Lynette.

"Who thought upon reward?" asks Colombe's brave lover in Browning's poem. All he asked was an opportunity to serve, unknown, unrecognized, unrewarded, the woman whom he loved.

What is the reward for speaking a kind word? The reward is simply to have spoken it; to have said or done a kind thing is greater in itself than any reward one could win for it. The good done, the souls saved, the lives cheered, these very things in themselves are the richest rewards.

Again, good deeds done bring the power to do more good. Margaret Sangster prayed: "Give me the wages of going on." The greatest possible reward will be the opportunity and power of doing still greater tasks for Christ. And these will be assigned according as we have fitted ourselves on earth for the higher tasks of heaven.

The answer to the first question also answers the second. If there ever be a regretful moment in that better land it will be because of neglected opportunities. The consciousness of having done much or little for Christ and for others in his name will doubtless bring varying degrees of happiness in heaven. Every time we make any one else happy we are made happy ourselves; so that those who have made many others happy will themselves be happier than those who have made few happy. But in this connection it is helpful to bear in mind the fact that, after all, the intensest soul happiness comes from direct communion with Christ. Even those saved late in life, who have missed the opportunities for service, may be richly blessed by loving him and being with him. But surely those who know that through their work others have been made glad must themselves have a greater gladness than they could otherwise have found. Perhaps there is no passage stating distinctly that some will be happier than others, but this is implied in all the Scripture statements about rewards, and in all the facts of experience.

Tumultuous Days

THESE are discouraging days for the Peace Dove. What with the war fires blazing in the Balkans; with Russia and Austria lining up their vast armies for emergencies; with France swept by a sudden wave of patriotic militarism; and with Germany, England and the United States hot in the race for sea-supremacy, there isn't much consolation anywhere on the horizon for the Bird of Promise. In Mexico and Nicaragua, too, the guns are still roaring and the air is heavy with battle-smoke. One lone crumb of comfort the Dove may find in the peace pact just negotiated between Turkey and Italy; but it is a very little one, as both combatants had fought over Tripoli to the point of exhaustion.

And now that the day of the war aeroplane has arrived, even the air itself will be monopolized for military purposes. No "piping times of peace in sight. From present indications many moons will wax and wane ere the poor little Bird of Peace will get good flying weather around this turbulent old world again.

How You Can Lend a Hand

AS EVERYBODY knows, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD keeps open house at all seasons for the Family of readers, who have the privilege of doing pretty much what they please, while we always take pleasure in granting it, if within our power. We have we ourselves any hesitation in making request of our friends, knowing that, in pure goodness of heart, they're always ready to grant it if they can. It's a delightful thing to have such mutually pleasant terms, especially in our Family Circle as big as ours. And it's constantly growing, too.

We've been seed-planting and sowing for months, so that our readers and all their friends might have an exceptionally fine garden of things to wander about in and pick and choose from this fall. You have seen something of the harvest we prepared for you in our Annual Premium List, which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD October 23—just a week ago. These splendid premiums were specially chosen for you and for acquaintances whom you may choose to bring into our Family Circle as regular subscribers. There's a big enough variety to suit every taste, and it gives you a chance to lay in your stock of gifts ahead of the rush and crush of the holidays. Besides they are put at figures ridiculously low, contrasted with the high prices that are always asked later in the season.

And now for our request, to which we ask your give kindly consideration: This year, God willing, and with your help, can be made the banner year for extending our field of service. We want you to help us make it so, and the way to do it is place THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in a hundred thousand homes where it is not now taken. Will you, dear friend who read this, send in along with your own renewal one new subscription? These liberal Premiums should win over almost any one you may approach on the subject. And besides there's a host of new attractions to appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the coming year—but that's another story and we'll tell you about it by and by.

We know that many of our readers feel like ing their favorite journal a service, in recognition of all its loving labors in their behalf. Now, if you do what we have asked, you'll really be doing triple service: You will help and encourage us; you'll introduce your friend to the delights of Family Circle and our Open House, and you will enlarge the scope and influence of the journal you love, for more efficient world-wide service.

Just another word: Don't linger over your list of Premiums but decide now. Send in your renewal as far ahead as possible. This is a great assistance to us at this season than you might imagine, because it relieves the pressure on our Subscription Department, which is liable to be overworked when the big volume of renewals begins to pour in later on. Renew this week, and your subscription will be extended one year from present expiry date, so you won't miss a single number.

General Notes

—COLONEL ROOSEVELT'S remarkable recuperative power, no doubt to his exceptionally fine physique, but also to measure to his normal and healthful manner of life, furnishes good illustration of the value of moderate living and exercise.

—RUSSIA HAS NOW over 120,000 political prisoners in penal establishments and is contemplating the erection of more prisons for the accommodation of the same class of offenders. We question whether in any other country in the world such a record can be paralleled.

—OUR READERS WILL find on another page of this issue the second instalment of our remarkable symposium on the plan to "Make America Catholic." These letters, from representative Americans of various religious denominations, are to be widely read and well considered. They present a case against Rome without bias and in temperate terms, which do not fail to appeal to the judgment and patriotism of every American.

The effects of the amputation on the newsboy have proved more serious than they were at first supposed to be, and there is now some doubt of his recovery. There is no more genuine heroism than that of this crippled newsboy who willingly risked his life for one who was a complete stranger to him. He had the spirit of Christ, who gave his body up to be nailed on a cross, that even his enemies might be saved.

For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be

Petrified Potatoes

AS THE excavations for the new subway on Lexington Avenue in New York City were being made, some rocks that looked enough like petrified potatoes to be real ones were thrown out. The boys watching the work, thinking them to be real potatoes, gathered them up in their hands, and the urchins, thinking they would have some fun, went along the street for a block, dropping them into the open barrels of potatoes standing out in front of the grocery and vegetable stores. The merchants, not discovering the tricks of the boys, sold the stone potatoes innocently with the good ones. The next day the housekeepers of that neighborhood who had made purchases came to the stores in great rage, and some of them assumed the rôle of the militant suffragette with rock in hand and eye on head of merchant. When the facts of the boys' mischievous trick were learned the anger subsided, and there was a good laugh all around. It might be known that merchants would not undertake to practice such an unblushing fraud as to sell stone for food. The Saviour's words are here recalled:

What man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? (Matt. 7:9.)

A Paradise for Birds

MRS. RUSSELL SAGE has just bought Marsh Island in Louisiana for $150,000, and donated it to the Federal Government, the State of Louisiana and an association organized for the purpose with the conditions attached to the gift that there shall be no settlements allowed on the island and that a special government permit be required to secure even a look at it. The island is on the Gulf Coast southwest of New Orleans, and is famous as a winter feeding ground for the mallards, canvasbacks, teal, black ducks, blue geese, snow geese, bitterns, herons, loons, rails, and shore birds of many kinds. This bird paradise is eighteen miles long and nine miles wide, and contains 75,000 acres. The provision of the refuge will be the most pleasant news the birds of North America have heard since the reading of the will of David Wilcox, which made possible the formation of the National Audubon Society for the study and protection of the feathered tribes. The use of birds as food is proper, but the wholesale destruction of wild birds even for food is bad economy. In Louisiana alone in the hunting season of 1909-1910 there were killed 4,265,585 game birds, which slaughter continued would mean their speedy extermination, and the end of the sport itself. Then there has been the barbarous destruction of these beautiful songsters for purposes of adornment of women's hats, etc., which cruelty fortunately many of the States have forbidden. Mrs. Sage has always had a love for birds and an interest in the preservation of their life, and she has manifested a beautiful benevolence in this paradise for them which she has created, and in so doing has copied her Master in God's care for the birds.

Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. (Matt. 10:29.)

The Hydroaeroplane to the Rescue

A HYDROAEROPLANE was used the other afternoon for the first time in history to save a man from drowning. From Hempstead Harbor, off Sea Cliff, Long Island, Walter Strohbach and Elwood Sawyer of Flatbush went for a row in the Sound. The former fell out of the boat, and his friend at the oars tried in vain to reach him. Some one on the shore noticed the plight of the young men, and hurried to Aviator Wald, who was tuning his machine for his day's flight. He jumped into his hydroaeroplane immediately, and putting on all speed possible headed straight for the drowning man, made the distance of half a mile to him in one minute, but only to save him after he had come up the second time. The aviator dropped a life-preserver to him and then hauled him up into the machine by a rope and took him to the shore. Strohbach was carried to the Country Club, where a physician revived him. Sawyer was enabled to get back to the shore in the boat. Wald then circled around the scout ships that were to take a part in the great parade of the United States navy. Thus the new invention that claims such a toll of lives in the mastery of the air is used in the saving of life on the water. The companions of Christ awoke him out of his slumber to save them from drowning, which he did.

And they awoke him, saying, Master, Master, we perish. Then he arose, and rebuked the wind and the raging of the water; and they ceased, and there was a calm. (Luke 8:24.)

THE WORLD'S TEMPERANCE LESSON*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

A WORLD'S temperance lesson from a chapter in which the only reference to intemperance is part of a verse about the hurtfulness of wine to the princes of Israel may seem an anomaly. But this single reference to intemperance comes in the midst of a word picture of a whole train of sins and sorrows of which alcohol is by no means the least. In the words of Dr. George Adam Smith, this "obscure passage on obscure events" is yet so "lurid with the passion of that fevered people in the flagrant years 743-735 B.C. that we can make out the crimes described—a king surrounded by loose and unscrupulous nobles; adultery, drunkenness, conspiracies, assassination; every man striking out for himself; none appealing to God."

The real temperance lesson comes to us not from the single verse upon which it is hung but from the whole prophecy of Hosea and from the whole period which he has portrayed. A long period of almost unequaled prosperity had had terrible effects upon the people of Israel. It has been said that the period of Kings Uzziah and Jeroboam were the golden age of Israel. Conquest and commercial enterprise were greater than at any other time except the reign of Solomon. The rich lived in true Oriental luxury, and many were rich. In addition to the wealth of their fields and their legitimate commerce, they enjoyed the spoils of the nations they conquered. They gathered in the flocks and herds of other lands. Such wealth as this could never be other than a curse. Riches and its attendant luxuries accumulated, but, as in ancient Rome, as they grew the people degenerated both morally and physically. Irreligion and idolatry came as the natural accompaniments of this state of affairs, and when Hosea began his work toward the end of the period of great prosperity, the results of these things were becoming more and more apparent in the life of the nation. Political weakness was following hard on the heels of moral degeneracy. The prosperity of the kingdom was rapidly declining. The Jewish nation, as a whole, was a volcano ready at any moment to burst forth with disorders and crimes and anarchy.

There is perhaps no more romantic figure, from our modern point of view, than Hosea in all the Old Testament. His own life had been marked by a tragedy in his loss of his wife. Out of this bitter experience he came, while still a young man, with a message of God's infinite love for this people who had forgotten him and neglected his teachings and his love, even as the prophet's wife had deserted him. In the midst of his bitter arraignment of his people, Hosea gives us the one verse upon which this lesson hangs. Alcoholic indulgence again appears as a large figure in the passage from which we get the Golden Text (Isa. 5: 11, 12, 22, 23).

In this case it is a picture of Judah, the other branch of God's chosen people. Because of intemperance and the vices and crimes that accompanied it, Hosea and Isaiah proclaimed that both nations would go down the three steps which lead to the graveyard of nations, from moral to physical and political decay. Having become captives of sin in "God's country," despite God's persistent warnings, they would become easy captives of a foreign foe. Both chapters and both countries should be studied as parts of this lesson.

There are many national evils and many personal sins to which the warnings in the lesson and Golden Text might appropriately be applied, for nearly all the wrongs and woes of the world grow out of the three chief roots of evil, which this lesson lays bare, namely, ungoverned appetites and passions and greed. But we cannot teach effectively, in the time allowed for one lesson, more than the one truth which may most appropriately be singled out on this "World's Temperance Sunday," that love of alcohol, like love of money, as described in the revised Bible, is "a root of all kinds of evil." The lesson shows alcohol as (1) a root of "sickness," verse 5, first clause; (2) a root of sin and sorrow, verse 5, second clause and Golden Text.

HOSEA

From Sargent's frieze of The Prophets, in the Boston Public Library.

"On the day of our king the princes made themselves sick with the heat of wine." The sickness of the princes from wine-drinking at the king's banquet may have been no more than the seasickness on land to which President Lincoln referred in declining to take brandy for seasickness on the war. But to-day we know the effect of alcohol on health goes far beyond temporary nausea. Science testifies through a great host of the world's foremost medical men and through official utterances of French, British, German and American governments that "the continued use of alcohol, even though not to the extent of drunkenness, often leads to chronic poisoning." This statement, in the very words, appears in British posters on "Alcoholism and Physical Degeneracy," such as have been put up in a hundred cities of Great Britain and Australia "by order of the city government." The quoted declaration itself is borrowed from the report of an official commission of medical men appointed by the British Parliament. Earlier, the French Republic posted an equivalent utterance from its national board of health.

In Alcohol and the Human Body, by Sir Victor Horsley and Dr. Mary Sturge, tables are given of scientific form of seven "diseases due to alcohol alone," and of thirty-nine "diseases of which alcohol is frequently a determining or contributing cause." On these diseases the scientists are almost entirely of one mind. They agree that alcohol complicates and aggravates all acute maladies. "Typhoid fever, pneumonia, erysipelas, which would be mild in the case of a temperate man, quickly carry off the alcoholic drinker."

In the March, 1912, issue of the Scientific Temperance Journal of Boston, it is shown by citations from The Mortality of Alcohol, 1911, by Edward Bunnell Phelps, editor of the American Underwriter, on the basis of American insurance records, that "alcohol is a factor in 106 different causes of death" and that "sixty-six thousand deaths this year are due partly or wholly to alcohol."

From the death goal of alcohol, let us come back to the unquestionable initial fact that alcohol is a drug, and when sold undiluted must bear the skull and crossbones warning of poison. Sir Frederick Treves, physician to the late King Edward, declared that "alcohol should be subject to the same strict limitations as opium, morphia or strychnia." We marvel that people will become enslaved to cocaine and to opium and its derivatives, morphia and heroin, but these things are hedged about with protections to save the ignorant and the unwary. It is generally agreed that no government should allow any of these narcotic poisons to be used except under direction of a qualified physician; and many are convinced of the wisdom of surrounding alcohol with the same restrictions.

* INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for November 12, 1912. HOSEA, chapter 7. GOLDEN TEXT: "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that tarry late into the night, till wine inflame them!" Isa. 5: 11, R. V.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—AT ONE TIME Mr. D. L. Moody was superintendent of the Illinois Street Sunday School, Chicago. The school numbered about twelve scholars, and they were of the mission type. Next to the Spirit of God in his heart, Mr. Moody's power as a superintendent was in his personal contact with his scholars. He certainly knew every one of them by name, and smiled upon each one in a peculiar way, as he inquired about the folks at home, including the baby, and that was before the day of cradle rolls! He said to his primary teacher one day: "Get up some parties for your children, have them come every week, and do for them just as if the only happy times they ever have is when they are with you." To a young lady who had just commenced work in his Sunday school, he said one Sunday morning: "Go down and meet the class of young believers." "What shall I do with them?" she asked, for it was not the Sunday school hour. "Let them teach you," was his sagacious reply. When she reached the Sunday school building, she found fourteen boys and girls from twelve to fourteen years of age assembled, and eagerly waiting to be given bundles of circulars that they might go out on the streets and distribute them, inviting people to come to the church services and to Sunday school.

—MR. B. F. JACOBS was superintendent of the First Baptist Sunday school, Chicago, which was considerably larger in size than Mr. Moody's school, and was not a mission school. There was a fountain in the Sunday school room, and a large number of bouquets were piled about it every Sunday morning (provided by the superintendent) to be sent to absent scholars who were sick. One Sabbath in June Mr. Jacobs gave by his own hand a rose to every scholar. The teaching was very carefully supervised by Mr. Jacobs. He employed a skilled teacher belonging to the faculty of a Normal College to instruct his teachers "how to teach." During the week Mr. Jacobs frequently looked over the teachers' class books to see how matters were going. He noticed in one book a teacher had marked a scholar "absent" for six Sundays, and then had written "left." Busy business man as he was, he took time to go and see why that scholar had left. He found a very sick boy, whose head had been terribly cut by being run over by a heavy wagon. Mr. Jacobs wrote after the word "left" in the teacher's class book "by a careless teacher to die with a hole in his head." The feelings of that teacher can better be imagined than described when she opened her class book the next Sunday and saw what her superintendent had written.

—"THE WORLD'S Sunday School Superintendent," Mr. Frank L. Brown, of Brooklyn, N. Y., certainly deserves this title. In a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a brief account was given of his work as a superintendent of one school, which we now briefly summarize. From ten to twenty-five new scholars a Sunday in the Bushwick Avenue school without offering a reward. From a membership of 80 in the beginning to a roll of 3,600 in twenty-six years, and in addition three missions with a membership of 1,500. Between four and five thousand decisions for Christ have occurred from the school membership. The ways of working have been as follows: Increasing the interest and taking care of the membership already on the books; large attention to the week-day life of scholars; classes well organized; trained teachers; good program; wholesome recreations; employment department. Mr. Brown as the commissioner of the World's Sunday School Association, says: "The first Sunday School Convention of the Philippine Islands was held at Manila, February 24-26, 1911. One man traveled seven hundred miles to the convention; two men came nine days on horseback! On convention Sunday a model Sunday school was held. Over 1,100 members and onlookers were present. The Filipino took it in with wide-open eyes. At the closing meeting of the convention 2,000 were present. In China Mr. Brown conducted thirty-six Sunday school rallies at Hongkong, Canton, Savatow, Amoy, Swatow, Soochow, Nanking, Soochow and Shanghai. These rallies numbered from a thousand to twelve hundred persons present. Consul General Wilder said: "Give these Chinese boys and girls an education, and they will turn out as well as your children and mine." From China Mr. Brown went into Korea, and there he found a wonderfully developed Sunday school movement. In one school, for a sample, he found an Honor Roll of twelve scholars who had learned from 400 to 3,000 verses of Scripture; several girls about elven years of age had learned the entire New Testament, excelling the book of Matthew; eighty-seven of the boys had held meetings in villages, 3,052 conversions resulting. "And these young people are to become the Sunday school leaders of the future," says Mr. Brown. Japan was next visited. He reports: "Japan is well organized; has normal teacher-training courses and five hundred studies; a substantial library."

THE BRINGING OF THE LIGHT

BY ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

ILLUSTRATED BY HANSON BOOTH

THE picture was turned to the wall, exposing to view only its brown paper back and the time-darkened wood of its frame. The reversed position hinted of mystery, and Gordon was interested in a moment. He silently promised himself that whether opportunity offered or not, he would not be laggard in seeking the reason for the unusual arrangement and what it signified. Something more than strange certainly lurked about such a picture in the parlor of such a man as Mr. Graves.

Opportunity proved to be slow of approach as usual; and finally, when Graves was out about his farms and Mrs. Graves was busy in the center of her universe, the kitchen, Gordon slipped into the parlor to verify the solution of the mystery that his own mind had evolved. With careful hands he turned the picture and brought to view a girl's face—a sweet, sensitive face from which dark eyes looked out with that indescribable expression that is sometimes seen in the eyes of those gifted with an esthetic temperament—the eyes of a dreamer seeking forever the transient beauty that flashes in everything from flower to star in gleams which few of us ever see. The picture itself was simply an enlarged photograph such as is often found in New England homes, but the workmanship was better than usual, suggesting that more than customary care had been taken by the one who worked upon the picture, perhaps because touched by the wistful beauty of the face which was his subject. Gordon in rapt study did not hear the soft approach of Mrs. Graves' felt shoes, but he did hear her low, startled exclamation as she discovered him. His heart throbbed and a flush was on his cheeks when he realized the situation in which he had placed himself. He turned calmly, trying to appear unconcerned, to see her standing white-faced and almost cringing near the door. The change in her gentle face shocked him. It was perfectly evident to him that in her heart was a memory and a longing that linked itself with the face in the gaudy frame. The hurt in the woman's heart was reflected in her face, and he knew that he had stumbled upon the tragedy of a mother soul torn hourly, daily, yearly by anguish, the cause of which he could not fathom.

The portieres parted, and the face of the girl in the picture turned to the wall, looked in Gently he turned the sweet face back to the wall. He asked no question, but said simply: "This is a beautiful face, Mrs. Graves, a very beautiful face."

Her fingers were knotted and it seemed difficult for her to frame her words. "Yes—it—is—I—"

He hastened to help her. "I have made many studies of faces, for I am an artist in a small way, though please do not let Mr. Graves discover it; and to me this face is exceptional."

A soft light burned in the motherly eyes. "Indeed, I am glad—to have you say so. She was—"

"Mother!" Sharp and curt came Mr. Graves's voice, and his cold keen face appeared. "You'll find your bread burning in the kitchen if you don't stop this visiting sudden!"

She left them with a little cry of dismay and disappointment. Graves came further into the room. His gray eyes were stern and hard. "Mr. Gordon, I am glad to have you here in my home, and I want to do all I can to make your stay pleasant; but there is one thing that is never spoken of by any soul under this roof, and that is—the girl in that picture. Make no mention of her before me, my wife, or my neighbors. If you do, you are no longer wanted as my guest. That"—he motioned to the picture—"belongs to a part of our life that is shut away—tight! Kindly remember."

The grim figure stepped from the room, and left Gordon staring in astonishment and perplexity, but not in doubt as to the final meaning the old farmer had in mind. Needless to say, thereafter Gordon had plenty of food for thought. He had not expected to meet such an icy nature as Graves evidently possessed when he engaged a room at the house, nor had he expected to find such dark shadows as these that lay in the inner lives of his hosts.

He had been told that Graves's home was a place where it was quiet, and where he could recover from the fatigue induced by the continuous work he had been doing in his city studio. He had, also, been warned from other sources not to mention that he was an artist, for, as his village informant had said: "Graves is death on such things as playing, singing, painting—calls 'em tom-foolery." And Gordon in the little time he had been there had found the statement true.

Born of a Puritan race, bred in its rigid atmosphere and trained by its coldest precepts, it was natural for Graves to look upon amusement, music, and art as breeding influences that led to undesirable ends. Into the narrow range of his life had entered none of the softening influences of contact with minds that can see and make plain to others the glorious work done in the world by the very things he despised. Mrs. Graves, on the other hand, was not so constituted. Her life reflected the mellow gentleness that goes with a soul sensitive to the light and shadows of life; the soul that sings in answer to the birds and quivers with the sunbeams at the kiss of the sun. Gordon could see, too, that under the overshadowing nature of her husband, the high lights had been subdued and the music in her heart made but echoes of songs heard long ago.

Tragedy it was—nothing more or less—that they should live their uneventful years under the spell of something that chilled the love between them, laid a silence on the lips of both, building a grim reserve in the heart of one, leaving a stifled cry in the heart of the other. The condition must have resulted from a long process; swift anger, then the missing of a cheery girlish voice, and the absence of a sweet girlish face; after that the deadening influence of an iron will and the firm determination to forget, ever checked by the heart's plea to remember.

As he pondered the situation, feeling sure he understood, Gordon evolved a final plan of action that necessitated making changes in the earlier plan with which he had come. If he could touch the last dying bit of love and mercy in Graves's heart with the water of friendship, he might be able to woo the man's sere nature out into abundant life. This scheme involved the taking of a deep interest in Graves's beloved farm, in the thousand phases that go to make up the work of a skilfully managed estate of many acres. He was certain that he had entered Graves's heart by the only avenue when it was reported to him later that the old gentleman had said to a group in the village post office that "that Gordon was one fine fellow."

In spite of all his careful planning Gordon's scheme came very near going the way of plans that never grow up as a result of a sudden and entirely unexpected turn of affairs. While chatting with Graves at the barn door one evening, Gordon stepped just outside instinctively, as if in answer to a summons, to hear a vesper sparrow singing in a treetop below the hill. Graves, stepping out too, looked at him sharply.

"My word! Graves," Gordon began enthusiastically, "that's heaven's own music! Do you know the old legend—" Then he paused, remembering.

The grizzled old New Englander stood on the step, a silent and ominous figure. After a moment he spoke. "So you are one of them! I thought so at first, then I changed my mind. Of all the foolishness on earth, the biggest is this mooning over such things. My girl," he hesitated as if to say no more, but thought flooded over his lips into speech, "used to sneak out and listen to those birds. I used to find her out here when she ought to have been in the house working. She'd leave her mother, leave her duties, just because some bird happened to sing near the window." He stopped abruptly, and the little feathered minstrel filled the silence with meaning. The grim voice went on. "She got it into her head that she could sing—a dangerous thing for a farmer's girl. I told her her place was in the kitchen doing a woman's work. But—no! Ever since she was a little thing I had been trying to take it out of her, and train her so she'd like the work such as her mother does, and my mother, and their mothers before 'em. She kept it up. I vowed I'd tame her and teach her. Then she got it into her head she wanted to go away and learn to sing. I heard her and her mother plotting it up one day, and I faced 'em. She was set, and she spoke to me as no daughter should—said I was ruining her life. I told her to go and never show her face. . . . She went. . . . I haven't seen her for five years, nor heard a word from her or about her.

"I thought I'd burn everything of hers, but . . . well, all I did was to turn that picture, so that her mother could see it and remember, and know what was the result of letting a girl harbor such ideas. She liked to have the girl sing and play and gad around. She's come to see things as I do now. It's all foolishness—this getting daffy over birds' singing, common ordinary sunsets, flowers—all tommyrot! They don't pay your bills or fill your stomachs. You're a good sort of a chap, but don't get such ideas in your head. If you get them here on my place, I'll be sorry—that's all. I didn't mean to

MORE LETTERS FROM PASTORS AND COLLEGE PRESIDENTS ON THE ROMANIST PLAN TO "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC"

IN THIS issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we print another instalment of the letters received from leading educators and ministers throughout the country in response to our invitation for an open discussion of the avowed purpose of the Roman hierarchy to "Make America Catholic." In these communications, the writers indicate what they consider to be the duty of Protestant America in the present emergency. While Romanism has been incessantly active, the forces of Protestantism have been strangely indifferent and only now are they awaking to the gravity of the situation.

Publicity is the first important step toward a right understanding of the significance of Rome's aggressive course in American politics. These letters let in a flood of light on this subject and should be read everywhere:

A Campaign of Education Needed to Defend Our Religious Liberties, Writes a Brooklyn Pastor.

THE power and influence of the Roman Catholic Church must be considered either from a political or an ecclesiastical viewpoint, and the two must be kept distinctly separate in any discussion of the subject, lest we become guilty of the same offense which we charge against the Church of Rome, namely, the failure to separate church and state as to the purpose and the sphere of duty of each in this world.

The complete separation of church and state—this Biblical doctrine and fundamental principle of the Constitution of our country—has not yet, in its various aspects and in its importance, been fully understood even by a large number of people in the Protestant churches of our day. It is right here where a campaign of education must begin, if we are to arouse our people to retain and defend the nation's priceless heritage of religious liberty. When this fundamental principle has been understood, we must then proceed to teach the people that, neither in the light of past nor present history, the Church of Rome, neither in theory nor in practice, favors the complete separation of church and state, but expressly denounces it as a condition which under circumstances must be tolerated, but which it can and will never sanction, holding that the Church (thereby meaning none other than the Church of Rome itself and exclusively so, more specifically the Pope), should not only be heard, but should dictate and shape all matters pertaining to civil government.

As loyal citizens of this country, we must oppose this wrong principle of the Roman Catholic Church as in direct opposition to our country's Constitution, and one which, if recognized, would rob us of the blessings of religious liberty which we value so highly. In opposing this wrong principle of the Church of Rome as citizens, we are not in any way opposing the Church of Rome as a church, as though we did not grant unto it, as a church, the very same rights which we grant to any church. Let this be distinctly understood and kept in mind. As members of the Protestant Church we may and do oppose the false teachings of the Church of Rome, but as citizens these do not and should not concern us at all. As citizens, we should discuss the question of the complete separation of church and state purely from a political and patriotic point of view. As citizens we should contend for the religious liberty assured us by the First Amendment of our Constitution, whether we be Protestants, Roman Catholics, or Jews; and as citizens we should, and as loyal citizens we must, quite as readily oppose Protestants and Jews who offend against the First Amendment of our Constitution as we oppose Roman Catholics when they offend against it; in fact, a citizen's religious belief does not in this matter enter into consideration at all. The failure on the part of many to understand this clearly has caused much confusion. It has given to the discussion of the matter an entirely wrong coloring, has frustrated efforts made in the right direction, and has unnecessarily engendered bitter feelings.

I most firmly believe that the false teachings of the Church of Rome have been and are a curse and not a blessing to the world, as the Bible teaches us and experience amply proves (Italy, Spain, France, Portugal, South America, etc.), and as a member of the Lutheran Church I must therefore oppose the false teachings of the Church of Rome and do so at the proper time and the proper place; but as a citizen of the United States, the false teachings of Rome do not concern me at all, as long as Rome teaches these as a church and remains within its sphere and does not interfere with my right, granted me by the country's Constitution, to worship God as my conscience dictates, nor with any of the rights and privileges which the country's Constitution gives unto me and all citizens alike. As a citizen, I ask not what a man's religious belief is, but whether or not he subscribes to the Constitution of the country. As a loyal citizen he must do so. If he does not, and I must oppose him, I oppose his wrong principles inasmuch as these conflict with good citizenship in this country; but I am thereby not opposing his religious belief, which as a citizen does not concern me. A Metropolitan Pastor Tells How Catholics Cultivate Power and Influence.

THE danger of Roman Catholic domination is evident. Inflowing foreigners quickly and easily given power to vote; a vast and compact organization cemented by matchless loyalty and a systematic inculcation of the necessity of giving money, together with a persistent activity in gathering it, from the penny to thousands of dollars, is making the Catholic Church impregnable. Chief sites in every section of the West are early purchased for church and school sites. Their hospitals and orphanages appear first in mine and frontier regions, and through sympathy and early impress, they render stable old, or make new adherents.

Protestants expect one pastor, often even without secretarial help, to run an important church. The Young Men's Christian Association give a general secretary as many as thirty paid associates. It is time for Protestants to give more money directly to our local churches, so that they can carry on a propaganda of some power and persistency. Many individual members are now supporting Y. M. C. A. secretaries or giving thousands to associated charities. If a few would give the pastor money for a boy-specialist, or an assistant to work with young men, vast results would follow. Protestants must recognize the indispensable necessity of supporting their own churches first, as do the Roman Catholics, and other things afterwards.

One of the New York commissioners, with thousands of men under him, told me that every Roman Catholic Church official of prominence in New York had visited and dined him, while not a single Protestant clergyman had shown him friendly attention. We must fearlessly and heartily cultivate public men. They will then recognize Protestants, and our members will take courage. It is reported that one Presidential candidate will get the mass of the Roman Catholic vote. Why? By attention he has been led to give them many favors. We must be wise in our day and generation.

An Episcopalian Pastor's View of Rome's Political Encroachments and Her Claims of Temporal Supremacy.

NOT for a moment would I abridge one jot of the religious freedom of any Romanist. I would fetter no man's conscience; I would restrain no man in his religious opinions. Nor would I curtail any man's civil freedom in any point in which his principles do not restrict my own liberties, or come in collision with the constitution of the country.

But the Church of Rome is not merely a religious institution. She is a political organization and assumes political prerogatives above all other powers. She claims absolutism and supremacy, and claims to exercise them universally. She comes between the subject and the sovereign, and assumes the right to depose the one from the throne and release the other from allegiance; and the prerogatives she thus assumes she has often exercised, and determines still to exercise whenever she thinks proper to do so, and to give it effect by stratagem and blood.

Now I say that the man who gives his allegiance to the Pope can yield but a subordinate and conditional allegiance to a Protestant government. He is by principle intolerant in respect to Protestant liberties, and therefore disqualifies himself to legislate for Protestants in a Protestant country.

When once there is a collision between the allegiance to the government of the United States and the Pope, and between obedience to American laws and obedience to the laws of the Pope, Romanists tell us plainly they do not hesitate to trample on American law and government and display their fealty to the Pope. I ask, are men of such principles fit to be our legislators; to make our laws, and mold the destinies of our country, sworn as they are to overturn everything which stands in the way of papal dominion? And yet we have opened wide the doors of our legislation for their admission; and not only so, we have all too long winked at "papal aggression," which defies the authority and tramples under foot American law. We have, indeed, in some instances been more indulgent to the arrogant assumptions of Rome than papist monarchies on the European continent, for we are allowing the land to be thickly studded with monastic institutions, though Italy, France and Spain have practically abolished them. These institutions, moreover, are exempt from salutary inspection, and allowed to work without legal control. We have no law against the publication of papal bulls, which France and even Spain have refused to allow in their dominions without examination and approval by the State. Men call this liberal, and liberal it is to papal stratagems and purposes, though it is forging chains for ourselves and posterity, and preparing the way step by step for papal ascendancy. Meanwhile, no concessions satisfy, but each in its turn becomes a precedent for further demands; and lake the Printing Press the Agent of Our National Emancipation from Rome's Threatened Domination.

TO MY mind there can be only one way to meet the situation, and that through the Christian press. How id Luther and the other reformers ght the battle for evangelical truth nd human liberty in their day? hrough the printed Word, which the eople could read and meditate upon n their workshops and homes. Let ur Protestant press of to-day follow he same tactics.

How many of our evangelical Chrisians are so well versed in Scriptures nd history that they are able to reute the specious claims of Rome? low many of them could prove conincingly from the Bible how unounded, erroneous and destructive Rome's doctrine is on the primacy of he Pope, transubstantiation, worship f saints and the like? While Rome s scattering her nefarious doctrines roadcast through the land by means f her servile press, our Protestant, ur patriotic press securely sleeps and loes nothing to enlighten and fortify ur citizens against this danger. Thank God that at least THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has awakened to its duty. Now I, for one, Mr. Editor, would like to see you or some other write and publish in the HERALD a eries of short articles under the title: "Bible Answers to Romish Presumptions and Superstitions." These articles I would like to see issued in cheap pamphlet form and advertised in all of our Protestant church-papers. Then our ministers, Sunday-school teachers and other church workers would have a ready weapon to put into the hands of young and old, and our Protestant Christians would be able to defend their faith, which so many are not able to do, as their religious education has been so badly neglected.

It was the Gospel in the hands of the common people that won the fight against Rome in the days of the Reformation. It is the only way to win the fight to-day. Will you not, as a Christian and a patriot, help to win that God-commanded battle also through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? READER.

"The National Peril of Romanism," as Dr. Josiah Strong Viewed it in His Prohibited Book.

IN the letter of Dr. Josiah Strong, president of the American Institute of Social Service (which we printed last week) the writer gave permission to print in this symposium the views on Romanism as a national peril, which he had incorporated in his famous book entitled Our Country. That chapter was the occasion of the book being officially condemned by the Vatican, which placed it on the forbidden list of publications known as the Index Librorum Prohibitorum. We give below a few brief extracts from the chapter referred to:

"There are many who are disposed to attribute any fear of Roman Catholics in the United States to bigotry or childishness. Such see nothing in the character and attitude of Romanism that is hostile to our free institutions, or find nothing portentous in its growth. Let us, then, first compare some of the fundamental principles of our government with those of the Catholic Church.

"The constitution of the United States guarantees liberty of conscience. Nothing is dearer or more fundamental. Pope Pius IX in his Encyclical Letter of August 15, 1854, said: 'The absurd and erroneous doctrines or ravings in defense of liberty of conscience are a most pestilential error—a pest, of all others, most to be dreaded in a State.' The same Pope, in his Encyclical Letter of December 8, 1864, anathematized 'those who assert the liberty of conscience and of religious worship,' also 'all such as maintain that the church may not employ force.'

"Another foundation stone of our free institutions is free speech and a free press. But in his encyclical letter of December 8, 1864, Pius IX anathematized 'all who maintain the liberty of the press,' and 'all advocates of the liberty of speech.' He calls it the 'liberty of perdition.'

"Again, free schools are one of the cornerstones of our government. Catholic opposition to our public school system is general and well known. . . . Said the Vicar General of Boston, in a public lecture, March 12, 1879: 'The attitude of the Catholic Church toward the public schools of this country, as far as we can determine from papal documents, the decrees of the Council of Baltimore, and the pastorals of the several bishops, is one of non-approval of the system itself, of censure of the manner of conducting them that prevails in most places, and of solemn admonition to pastors and parents to guard against the dangers to faith and morals arising from frequenting them.'

"Bishop Gilmour in his Lenten Letter, March, 1873, said: 'Nationalities must be subordinate to religion, and we must learn that we are Catholics first and citizens next. God is above man and the church above the state.'

"When the Jesuits were driven out of Berlin, they declared that they would plant themselves in the western territories of America. And they are there to-day with empires in their brains. Expelled for their intrigues even from Catholic countries, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Mexico, Brazil and other States, they are free to colonize in the great West, and are there gathering and plotting to Romanize and control our Western empire. Lafayette, himself a Romanist, was not wholly blind when he said: 'If the liberties of the American people are ever destroyed, they will fall by the hands of the Romish clergy.'"

I CANNOT refrain from commending you for the attitude you have assumed toward Romanism within recent months. This, more than anything else, you have done in recent years, has appealed to me.

A Thousand Million Dishes Will Be Served

This winter, in a dozen countries, folks will serve a thousand million dishes of these Quaker Oats.

Some of these people send 10,000 miles to get this particular brand.

In England—next door to the Scotch oats—Quaker Oats outsells all other brands.

So it is the world over, where live the lovers of oatmeal.

Why this amazing fact?

Because for 25 years we have purchased for Quaker just the choicest of the crops.

And from those choice oats we have always picked out just the most luscious grains.

We pass them through 62 siftings and two-thirds of the bulk is discarded.

From a bushel of choice oats we get only 10 pounds good enough for Quaker.

We prepare these plump, richly-flavored grains by a very careful process.

Year by year folks have found this out. From home to home, and from country to country, has spread the fame of Quaker Oats.

And Quaker Oats has become, through the verdict of millions, the leading oat food of the world.

Quaker Oats

The Oats With the Wondrous Flavor

Lesser oatmeal may be just as nutritious, but it never is half so delightful.

Puny grains lack flavor.

And, if you wish the children to enjoy oatmeal, flavor is of prime importance.

For Breakfast and Supper

Quaker Oats isn't expensive. Despite our selection, the cost is only one-half cent per dish!

Lesser grades with half the flavor cost one just as much.

It is worth your while to take the pains to get the Quaker brand.

Regular size package, 10c

Family size package, for smaller cities and country trade, 25c.

The prices noted do not apply in the extreme West or South.

THE BRINGING OF THE LIGHT

speak of a few things I have, but you can see how I feel, and you're warned in time."

Gordon nodded, and without another word Graves strode inside to his work. Though this unexpected confidence was far from encouraging, Gordon did not give up hope of reaching the old Spartan's heart. He could now see plainly that any attempt to teach him that there was a beauty on earth and in the things of the earth which he had never seen would mean the combating of the formidable strength of heredity and environment.

Very cautiously one day he broached his wish that his host would accept an invitation to visit him in his city home. Graves hesitated, then said slowly: "I don't know but what I can stop and see you. I go up once a year on business. I've enjoyed having you here mightily. You're solid and sound, and have got an uncommon amount of good horse-sense. Yes, I'll let you know when I'm coming."

The next day Gordon departed after a hearty good-by from the farmer, and a shy lingering farewell from Mrs. Graves. Back once more in his studio he painted busily from sketches he had made at odd moments. By the time notice of Graves's coming reached him, Gordon had decided definitely just what he should do in the attempt to win the grim old man over.

On his arrival, Gordon met him and piloted him through the crowd to one of the side entrances of the station, where he led him to a low-built, powerful-looking motor car resting at the curb. Graves stared at it. "So you own one of those things, do you? You must be pretty well fixed. First ride I ever had in one of them—can't say I like 'em. They cost a sight o' money."

"Oh, they do a bit, but I have a little. The machine is one of my main pleasures," Gordon answered, smiling. "When I'm very busy it's about the only way I get a breath of clean air."

He watched the old gentleman narrowly as the powerful car threaded the busy streets, silently, surely, as obedient as if endowed with life. The scowl slowly faded from Graves's stony face, and a slow pleasure crept in. Gordon took a roundabout way, and by the time their destination was reached, the last stormy sign of displeasure had vanished from the wrinkled face; and been routed; the wedge had entered.

When finally they sat at ease in the young artist's cheery living-room, Graves opened the conversation by saying: "That was a sure enough treat for me. I've hated the things when I've seen them, but I do like the feeling—it's a new one for me. You've got a pretty swell place here, but homelike. By the way, Gordon, what's your business? I see what I thought was a lot of pictures in one of the rooms as we came in."

Quickly Gordon shifted the whole conversation, and saved himself from answering a troublesome question by pretending not to hear, and rapidly stating his plans for the next day, Sunday.

Very carefully that night, though it was not the last step in his plot by any means, Gordon arranged in one of the rooms connecting his with Graves's a group of pictures, all of places about the familiar farm. There was one of the meadows that were valued so highly, one of the buildings, and one of Graves's mother, which he had painted from a daguerreotype he had purloined for that very purpose.

The next morning when he heard his guest stirring in his room, Gordon slipped behind the portières of the room in which he had placed the pictures and waited to see what would result when Graves discovered them.

The pictures were in a prominent place, arranged for the very best light, and as Graves entered the room he

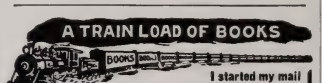
A TRAIN LOAD OF BOOKS



I started my mail order book business ten years ago, and during the last eight years I have sold more than a train load of books each year—more books than any other man in America. Why? Because I buy so I can sell cheaper than the others, and every book is shipped subject to return at my expense if not satisfactory.

Publishing books is a precarious business. Many publishers and booksellers fail. I make a specialty of buying bankrupt stocks of new books at my own price, and regular stock in quantities so I can retail at wholesale prices. I now have a big stock of over 6,000 different fine library sets of the works of standard authors and single volumes on every subject, which I offer to close out this season at 10c to 50c on the dollar.

Be fair to yourself. I can save you money. Drop me a postal card and get my prices before buying.

This Water Sealed Heat-Tight T[op] Makes Fireless Cooking Perfect

UNTIL we invented the "Water Sealed" Top of the "Ideal" Fireless Cooker a perfect Fireless Cooker did not exist. You have only one question to consider in choosing a Fireless Cooker—which one best retains the heat? Right out of the top—the hottest part—the first steam away from the ordinary Fireless Cooker—and with it that precious heat, which is the one thing needful.

Imprisoned heat is what does the cooking in a Fireless Cooker. When you examine your "Ideal" Fireless Cooker, you will see that less of heat simply cannot take place through its "Water Sealed" Top. This means that the "Ideal" Fireless Cooker Cooks Faster, Cooks Better and Keeps the Food Hot Longer than any other Fireless Cooker. It will Roast, Bake, Steam, Stew and Boil, and saves 50% of the fuel and reduces work and worry to a minimum.

"Ideal" Fireless Cook Stoves are Lined With "Pure" Aluminum

You want a Cooker lined with a metal which will not rust, pit, corrode, chip or crack. "PURE" Aluminum is the only insurance against these things. Separate cover over each compartment. Equipment of "WEAR EVER" Aluminum Utensils.

Try the "IDEAL" at our risk. Use the COOKER 30 days and if it is not all we claim, money refunded. You can pay for an "IDEAL" Fireless Cooker a little each month if you desire. Write today for illustrated catalogue and details of our easy payment plan.

pped and stared at them. Gordon v him start, rub his eyes, then stand rigid as a statue. He was looking the picture of the meadows he loved.
e furrowed face eased. Suddenly walked up to the canvas, and one ck finger shot forward and traced course of the brook in the picture.
e clever touch of the artist had put o it every curve that the old man d known from boyhood. Then he ned to the picture of the buildings, d he gazed at it long and fixedly.
nally he turned to the picture of his ther. For a moment Gordon thought would fall; his lips moved as if with familiar name, and the shaggy ength of his features softened and axed still more. Before Gordon's es was bared the longing, the loneliss, the yearning of a man from hom death and time had taken away ecious things they can never give ck. A mother's face links manhood th boyhood and the memories of boy-od, the dreams and hopes of childod with the bitter-sweet realizations d disillusionments of age. The man's ul was in turmoil. He backed away d sat down weakly, staring at the tures that had brought to him vis-ns and thoughts and memories more enly than mind unaided ever could call, and through the medium of the t he despised.

Not a word did Graves say of the ctures when they met at breakfast, it his manner was subdued. He was idently thinking, and thinking hard.
ordon expected him to mention them question him later, but still not a ord was said regarding them. But hen Gordon, missing him in the early fternoon, found him again before the ctures, it was evident to him that the fort had not failed to reach home; at into the cold, hardened mind had me the first dawning of the knowldge that life held values which he had ever reckoned into his scheme of ings—values he could not figure into is account books or add to his bank alance.

As the last step in his scheme—a ep he hoped would prove an effective imax to his efforts, Gordon and raves a little later seated themselves one of the beautiful churches of the ty for the vesper service. A few ghts glowed softly and made little aths of reflections on the polished acks of the pews; at the far end were he shining pipes of the great organ; he golden light of sunset illumined the eauty of memorial windows and lost self in the dimness of the tall Gothic rches. Graves's attitude showed that e felt the wonder and the holy spell f the place.

A man appeared at the organ; the oft murmur of the opening music reathed through the great building; he service was beginning. After the rgan prelude, the full clear voice of he black-robed minister fell mellowly n the silence in the reading from the Bible. Then a slim girl rose in the hoir loft. The distance and the twi-ight rendered her features indistinct o them, but she made a beautiful pic-ure silhouetted against the warm ight from the window high above her.

The organ tones sang sweetly hrough the introduction to her song o meet her voice in close companionship, and sweep on into full harmony. The crowded church grew quiet, nervous fingers and faces ceased from motion; it was as if a great silent will had whispered: "Peace—be still."

Gordon studied Graves's lined face beside him. The man was listening intently. His rough hands were folded tightly in his lap, and he, too, was motionless as if hearing music such as he never dreamed could be voiced by human lips.

After the service Gordon intentionally drew Graves into a corner where he could watch the great congregation leaving. Here and there comments came to them, referring to the singer and the song. "Her voice is angelic!" "It is a sermon, and a good one too, just to hear a song like that," and a white-haired, distinguished looking man who passed them remarked to his companion, "That voice in our church is a victory for all that's good."

Gordon attempted to lighten the silence between them as they turned homeward with a careless word or two, but he was soon conscious in some intuitive way that the man beside him preferred the silence. Not a word was spoken until they were seated once more before the late October fire; then the grim old farmer looked across at Gordon soberly, and said: "You've done all this a-purpose. I'm no fool, but your coming to my place, the things you said and did, the pictures you painted, and that singing to-night—they've hit me hard. I've thought things in this last twenty-four hours that I never thought before. I begin to see things differently, and I'm beginning to feel—to feel sorry—for some things I did—and said. . . . Take that singing there to-night. I tell you—I've worshiped in the old meeting-house at home for fifty years and I never felt Him so near as I did while that girl was singing." He paused and clasped his hands thoughtfully. "I tell you, it hits a man like me—hard, and—it hurts—to hear a girl sing that way. Now if my girl Bess had had that voice—"

Gordon jumped, and Graves paused in the act of fumbling for his handkerchief. The climax of all the plotting had come at the perfect moment.

In the adjoining room a soft piano chord was struck, and the same voice they had heard a little before sang the song again with the same sweetness, but this time with a yearning that made the young man bite his lips to keep the tears back.

The old man had half risen from his chair. The song ceased. There was a soft sound of steps that drew nearer; the portières parted, and the face of the girl in the picture turned to the wall looked in, the same wistful face now touched with the fuller beauty of womanhood. Her dark eyes were smiling through tears, watching in an evident agony of suspense the welcome of which she was not quite sure.

The old man's hands shook as if with palsy. Gordon saw that he was being torn by the lightning revelation of the truth; that the old beliefs that sheathed his soul were being rent and cast aside even as the butterfly rends the gray trappings of its winter tomb. Gordon rose trembling a bit himself, but he did not need to fear. The arms opened and she fled into them to have them close tightly around her in one eager, convulsive motion.

All unnoticed the young man slipped silently out of the room. After a time she called him and he went back. The face of Graves was transfigured. "Wayland—my dear lad, what a deal you have put up on me! Marry Bess—then come up to win me over—you rascal! But you've done it! you've done it! Bess, we must go back right off to the old place—to mother—won't she be—" He found no words to voice his thought, and he fought for mastery over his emotion. Then he took both of Wayland's hands in his. "You have brought the light into my heart and life and into the lives of those I love. May we all live in it!"

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

Awards for Bible Students

WE ARE getting near the end of the first complete year of the Bible Study Course. Two more lists of questions will round out the year. Awards are to be made to those who have won a perfect score the greatest number of times. Two classes of awards will be made: the first class will go to those who have sent twelve correct answers the greatest number of times; the second to those who have sent twelve correct answers the second greatest number of times. The awards will be in the form of books, books practical, helpful, interesting.

Interest in the Bible questions themselves does not wane. "Now that vacation days are over and the world is settling down to business again," a lady writes in the early part of October, "you may expect better things of me. I have my questions and answers arranged in a book for that purpose, called: 'CHRISTIAN HERALD BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.' These questions have brought much pleasure to my friends and myself while hunting the answers."

One dear lady who is an invalid, after sending her answers, all of which were correct, continued to study the "overcomer" question and prepared a more comprehensive answer. She writes: "Whether or not it is what you have in mind, it is interesting. I have enjoyed making it out even more than I did the other. I have kept all the questions with their answers. I find THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class a splendid way to study the Bible, along with being a member of the Sunday School Home Department of our church. In trying to answer all the questions correctly I have read and searched whole books and many chapters and passages in others."

One energetic lady begins: "I don't believe you have another Bible scholar with half the work I have to do. I haven't a minute's time to spend, but—" Whereupon she proceeds to write down eleven correct answers.

These 70 sent 12 correct answers:

"Winter Suits Like Ne With Diamond Dyes"

"I think I ought to tell you for the benefit of others about my success with Diamond Dyes. Before I learned the magic of Diamond Dyes, I used to scrimp and worry every Spring and Fall about how to get new, fresh clothes for my daughters and myself.

"I guess the two snapshots I enclose will show you that I don't worry much now. They are two Winter suits I made over from a light tan serge suit and a brown broadcloth dress and coat. I got two of the latest——suit patterns, ripped the old suit and dress with coat up carefully and they are just like new.

"I also dyed some old ostrich plumes and ribbons and we made three hats with them.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home U

Our experience for over thirty years has proven that no dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics, vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Li are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are to Silk or Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fi another and radically different class of dye. As proof—I call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen go use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond D for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another cl of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you n obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in color Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manuf tured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

This is one of the many reproductions of burning moments in history.

The Curtain Lifted Upon The Drama of History

No drama ever was more brilliant or crowded with human interest than this actual drama of the world's unfolding. No romance ever written so pulsates with real flesh and blood as this masterly story of real men and women. To read it is to feel the thrill of human action, to build within one's mind the abiding knowledge of history. No man or woman can know the present, nor build for the future without clear knowledge of the past. Here is a veritable library of history depicted with the charm of a great narrator, Dr. John Lord.

Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, Harvard University: "No other man of the country has done more to advance historical studies."

Fifteen Exquisite Octavo Volumes

"One seems to hear again the sharp and stirring voice of the animated speaker sounding through these crisp and vigorous sentences. It cannot be doubted that Dr. Lord, by giving these lectures in most of the cities and educational centers, has incited many to the study of history in the broad and generous spirit so characteristic of all his own work." —Jas. B. Angell, LL.D., Late President University of Michigan; U. S. Minister to China and Turkey.

ARE YOU INTELLIGENT? THEN CAN YOU SAY YES TO THESE QUESTIONS?

Have you ever watched history's procession from its starting point? Have you seen Egypt rearing her pyramids and other world wonders? Have you looked upon Assyria, Babylonia and Persia rising to their zenith, pour forth their radiance and then sink again into oblivion? Have you marked Greece, her chiseled temples crowning a thousand hills, her genius endowing the world with culture? Has Rome risen before you pre-eminent, her laws supreme, her army invincible, her science mature, her oratory faultless and then under the fever of luxury, greed and sensuousness sunk into decay? Have you lived through the cruelty and superstition of the middle ages? Have you thrilled over the romance and adventure of the age of chivalry? Have you watched the ennobling influence of the Renaissance spread over Europe? Have you stood by as France received her baptism of Blood? Have you seen that God-guided group of patriots draft the American Constitution? If you have not, then the pages of this work hold much in store for you.

If you would quicken your pulse, enlarge your horizon, cultivate your imagination, stimulate your patriotism, study the world's story — Beacon Lights.

SUMPTUOUS BOOKMAKING In every particular the books themselves are worthy the treasures of literature they contain. William H. Maxwell, Supt. of Public Instruction, New York City, says: — "Beacon Lights of History, are the result of a life-time spent in historical research, and are characterized by graces of style that can come only from constant practice in writing and lecturing. They are not mere compositions of facts like the ordinary text-books of general history—books that are as a rule dry and uninteresting to the general reader. They omit the petty details and present the great events of history in a way to fascinate and impress even the most unimpressionable. To read and comprehend it cannot fail to broaden the mind, increase the store of knowledge and elevate the understanding and the moral tone."

Oyster Omelette and how to serve it.

THERE is no omelette that is quite so tasty or delicious as the oyster omelette. Here's how a famous chef recommends that it be made:—

Stew a dozen oysters in a very little water; roll two or three lumps of butter the size of walnuts in flour, put them in the stew and let them come to a boil; season with pepper and salt. Take out the oysters and chop them. Put them back in the stew and if the sauce is not quite thick enough add a little flour. Beat 4 eggs very light and add 2 tablespoonfuls of milk or cream. Fry in a well buttered frying pan. When done remove to a hot platter and pour the oyster sauce over the omelette. Serve hot and you've a wonderfully delicious yet remarkably economical dish.

TRIED TO KILL COL. ROOSEVELT

monk's attire and urged him to the murder. Other notes equally wild and incoherent seemed to indicate that Schrank was either a violent lunatic or had become a dangerous monomaniac on certain subjects. "I am willing to die for my country," he wrote. "God has called me to be his instrument." It is believed that Schrank has been dogging Colonel Roosevelt for a long time, awaiting an opportunity for his assassination. Certain it is that he belongs to no political party, though he is believed to be an anarchist. He says he was born in Bavaria, and is a Roman Catholic. He once kept a saloon in New York City. He owns $25,000 in real estate, which he inherited. He came to this country thirty-five years ago, when he was a year old.

As soon as the colonel had finished his speech he was rushed to the emergency hospital, where the operating-room has been placed in readiness, and six of Milwaukee's leading surgeons were awaiting his arrival. While the surgeons were removing Mr. Roosevelt's clothing and making the examination he insisted that he was not badly hurt and that the doctors were taking it entirely too seriously. The examination of the wound showed that it had been made by a bullet of large size, which entered the fleshy part of the right breast half way between the collarbone and lower rib. The physicians found that an X-ray examination was necessary to determine to what depth the missile had penetrated. While he was waiting for the X-ray machine, Col. Roosevelt sat up on the operating-table and talked politics and joked with the doctors.

As soon as the X-ray photographs were developed it was decided to take Colonel Roosevelt to Chicago for further treatment. He was taken back to his private train that night and the following morning left his train at Chicago to go to the Mercy Hospital. Here Drs. John D. Murphy, Arthur D. Bevan and Scurry L. Terrell made a still more thorough examination of the wound and issued bulletins every few hours giving the patient's temperature, pulse, respiration and white blood-corpuscle count. The greatest difficulty of the doctors during the day was to keep their patient quiet. He insisted upon seeing a great number of visitors, and though no new manifestations arose to cause added apprehension, the doctors were greatly worried by their patient's continuous activity.

Mrs. Longworth, the ex-President's oldest daughter, arrived from Cincinnati late that afternoon. The following morning Mrs. Roosevelt and Miss Ethel arrived from Oyster Bay and immediately took charge of the entire situation. The doctors were highly delighted at this, for they found that Mrs. Roosevelt could accomplish what they had found impossible. The colonel twisted uneasily under his blankets and remarked: "I've maintained all along that this was an unbossed campaign and that the people ruled. It's not unbossed and the people don't rule. Nobody rules but Edith." That the colonel was not mistaken in his statement was proved by the events of the day, for Mrs. Roosevelt immediately reduced her husband to subjection, and, as one of the reporters from the hospital remarked, "The moment she arrived a hush fell upon T. R. After that he became as meek as Moses." Mrs. Roosevelt remained in her room, but she inspected every card and letter and telegram, and, although the colonel pleaded for the privilege of passing on the missives handed in, the Boss was inexorable. Although he smiled indulgently as Mrs. Roosevelt passed in and out, he was overheard to say: "Ethel, I do not see why your mother won't let Jack come in. This thing about ours being a campaign against boss rule is a fake. I was never so boss-ruled in my life as I am at this moment."

The last reports from the bedside of the ex-President up to the time of this issue's going to press state that the colonel is recovering rapidly, due to his splendid physical condition; that though it was finally found that one rib was fractured by the bullet, this injury will knit without other attention than complete rest, and the wound is healing rapidly.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS

[We shall be glad to answer questions sent us in regard to this department.]

Paint or Paper?

One of the principal reasons that large and dark patterned wall papers have been used on the lower parts of walls as wainscoting in living houses in the past, has been the difficulty in keeping the marks of everyday wear and tear from showing on the delicate tints that can be used on the higher parts of walls and ceilings. The inartistic effect produced from such wall paper combinations has been overcome by a manufacturer of wall decorative materials, who now, in addition to making a soft tone water color in all shades much superior to kalsomine and no more expensive for the upper parts of walls and ceilings, has also produced a material in the same rich and delicate tones to be used on the lower parts of walls as wainscoting, which can be cleaned with soap and water and a sponge and cloth. The washable paint made in beautiful water color tints, may be used along stairways, the nursery, on the lower parts of bath room walls, where water is splashed, and below the plate rail or chair rail in dining-rooms. It enables the housekeeper or maid to erase all traces of smudgy fingers, pencil marks and other disfigurements. The economy of this combination of water and oil colors in house decorating is very great, owing to the fact that those parts of the walls that usually get discolored first can be kept fresh for long periods so that the entire decorating need not be done over because of discolorations of parts of the wall exposed to the most wear. While economical, this combination oil and water color decoration is becoming very fashionable, as it is quite as artistic as the exclusive use of oil colors. In fact, many artists and architects prefer the perfectly flat color effects produced by these materials. It also entirely overcomes the unsanitary effects of some wall papers and the chipping and peeling of kalsomine.

A Few Simple Oyster Recipes

Oyster Croquettes

Take the hard ends of 1 pint of oysters, scald and chop fine and add an equal weight of potatoes rubbed through a colander. Add a tablespoonful of butter, a teaspoonful of salt, ½ teaspoonful cayenne, the same of mace and ½ gill of cream. Make up into small rolls, dip in egg and rolled cracker crumbs and fry in deep lard. The parts of the oysters left over may be used for soup or stew.

Little Pigs in Blankets

This old recipe has been used for a number of years by many American cooks. The oysters are drained and dried and each one wrapped in a very thin slice of bacon, the whole fastened with a small wooden skewer or toothpick. When ready to serve have a large iron baking pan well heated; throw in a few oysters at a time, and as soon as they are browned and the gills curled, take them out, drain in a colander, and continue the frying in the same pan.

Deviled Oysters

Take 1 pint of oysters and chop fine. Put into a saucepan with 1 teaspoonful of melted butter and a gill of cream. Season with cayenne and salt and add ½ cupful of rolled cracker crumbs. Put on the stove and allow to simmer 5 minutes, stirring gently. Then put in a baking dish, sprinkle bread crumbs and bits of butter over the top and bake until the top is a rich golden brown.

Sauce for Raw Oysters

Take 1 dessertspoonful of Tarragon vinegar, 1 tablespoonful olive oil, ½ teaspoonful Worcestershire sauce, the juice of half a lemon, and ½ teaspoonful Tabasco sauce. Add a little salt and ½ onion grated fine.

Questions and Answers

R., Quincy, Ill. 1. Name the principal cities in which Jews are most numerous, and give the population of the race in each. 2. What is the estimated number of Jews in the world?

New York, 1,100,000; Warsaw, 260,000; Posen, 190,000; Vienna, 150,000; London, 150,000; Odessa, 140,000, and Berlin, 100,000, round numbers 12,000,000.

F., San José, Calif. Some time ago we had quite a debate in our Bible class as to who is God's "chosen people." Some maintained that it is the Jews. I claim that it is the true followers of Christ.

You are right. The Jews were and still are the chosen people"; but with the incoming of the Gospel dispensation, and the preaching of the truth as it is in Jesus, the saved from among all nations and races have been included among the chosen. In a large sense, as your letter states, the "vineyard" has been given to others. Your contention throughout is therefore sound, according to the Scripture and to spiritual experience of God's people.

W., W., East Durham, N. C. 1. In I. Cor., 7th chapter, the apostle was replying to various queries concerning marriage and dealt with them with an explicitness that carries its own explanation. The general principle which he lays down is that, in his judgment, the individuals should abide in their stations, "for the time is short." Paul himself (he may or may not have been married) preferred individual service, in order that he might be able to devote his entire time to the Lord's work. 2. In Luke 8: 39, which records the raising of Jairus' daughter, the last clause of the verse is interpreted to mean that, while the child was dead, the breath out of which she was to be so soon recalled was no more than a sleep, quickly followed by the awakening, and that consequently there was no cause for their lamentations.

S., Selma, Miss. 1. Please explain Luke 23: 29, 30. 2. What is meant by the "Miscellaneous" column? We are always glad to receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It affords us much pleasure, and we have long since learned to expect the best of information from its pages. Have been a subscriber over ten years in succession.

Jesus here foreshadowed the coming conquest of Jerusalem and the fate in store for those who, with their little ones, fell into the hands of the invaders. They would pray for death to deliver them from their sufferings. This is a column devoted to the disposal of questions of a minor character sent in by our readers.

M. D., Hamilton, Miss. What is the best test to determine the purity of drinking water?

One of the best and simplest tests is to put a pint of the water in a flat earthen vessel, evaporate it quickly and scrape the receptacle for any residue. If such residue is white powdery, it means lime or gypsum, hence the water is hard, but safe. A whity-green or dirty-yellow gummy residue is suspicious. Taste it, and if it turns black, giving out the smell of burnt feathers, the water is contaminated with animal refuse and a likely breeder of typhoid. There are many other tests, more or less complicated and too chemical to be given here.

J., Parker, Ind. Please explain Matt. 6: 34.

Jesus, concluding the Sermon on the Mount, showed the sinfulness and folly of undue solicitude over the future and urged his hearers to have faith in God (who takes thought for all his children), and to seek first the kingdom, and all other things would be added to them. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," is practical maxim, and means that every sunrise brings its own cares and responsibilities, and to anticipate them by worrying is only to double them.

D., Baton Rouge, La. In the code of wireless telegraphy, what do the letters "C. Q. D." represent?

They mean "Come quick; danger."

A. B., Fredericksburg, Pa. 1. Was Judas Iscariot still with the other disciples at the time Christ washed their feet and broke bread and gave wine, or had Judas left them before or between these two acts? 2. Where is the Garden of Eden supposed to have been located? Where is the location mentioned in the Bible?

1. The narrative in the four Gospels would indicate that the Supper had begun, that Jesus washed his disciples' feet to reprove their mutual rivalry and enforce condescension to one another by his own example, and that then, while they sat at table, he declared his own betrayal, and Judas, after receiving the sop, left without the others suspecting his purpose. The breaking of bread and the institution of the Sacrament came at the close of the meal. 2. The location of Eden is described in Gen. 2: 10-14. There are many conflicting opinions as to the identity of this location, some holding that it is north of the Persian Gulf, at the junction of the Euphrates and the Tigris (which are claimed to be the Hiddekel and Perath of Genesis), others in Armenia, and still others in Ceylon, in India and in Syria.

R. M., Cranfield, N. J. What must be the length of a clock pendulum in order to beat seconds?

In the latitude of New York a pendulum must be 39.1 inches to vibrate every second. Nearer to the pole such pendulum would vibrate more rapidly, and nearer to the equator more slowly, for the reason that the pull of the earth is less, since at the equator the pendulum is farther from the center of gravity of the earth.

J. W. S., Latta, S. C. God is to-day as much as in the past the hearer and answerer of prayer. Our own personal experience, combined with that of thousands of others who write us every year on the subject, convinces us of the efficacy of prayer. But not all prayers are answered, for the reason that we may pray amiss and ask unwisely. Possibly the pastor to whom you refer had this fact in view. If he laid down the broad principle that praying for rain or succor of any kind in a time of great emergency was useless, he was speaking against all recorded experience, and taking an indefensible position. But you may have misunderstood him.

E. C., Cocoanut Grove, Fla. Please explain II. Cor. 12: 2-4. It has been a subject of discussion in our Sunday school for the last fortnight.

The man in question was Paul himself, although he speaks of himself in the third person. He was describing an experience fourteen years earlier, or about the time of his second visit to Jerusalem. He refers to a trance or rapture, in which his spirit was "caught up" and he heard "unspeakable words," which were designed for his own consolation and encouragement, and not as a general communication. This, he tells us, took place in the "third heaven." According to the early theology, the first heaven is that of the clouds and the air; the second that of the sky and the stars; the third is above both, where God's glory continually shines. See Eph. 4: 10.

Mrs. E. A. A., Chandler, Okla. In Sunday school a teacher asked, "Why did Jesus come to John to be baptized?" The answer was given: "He was sorry for his sins and had repented." The answer was accepted. He being sinless, how could that be?

Jesus (in his humanity) was "in all things as we are, yet without sin." When Jesus came to John for baptism, he did so for reasons that are clearly set forth in Matt. 3: 15 and John 1: 30-34. This preliminary ordinance was of the nature of "an initiatory rite, received at the hands of the only acknowledged living prophet who was empowered to administer what should be the equivalent of the holy anointing oil of the kingly and priestly offices." It was a part of John's duty as the Forerunner. See Luke 3: 16.

J. H., Lake City, Fla. 1. Simon, who bore the Saviour's cross on part of the way to Calvary, was a native of Cyrene in Africa (Matt. 27: 32). There were others from the same place dwelling in Jerusalem, and it is worthy of note that among those who contributed actively to the formation of the first Gentile church at Antioch were a number of converts from Cyrene (Acts 2: 10). The fact that Simon was from Africa does not necessarily imply that he was a negro, nor is it so stated in Scripture, although some commentators have taken that view. Cyrene was the commercial rival of Carthage and its people were cultivated and refined, with a Greek strain dating from B.C. 600, when the place was settled by Hellenic colonists. 2. The scourging of Jesus took place presumably in the forenoon, before the procession to Calvary. It was the usual terrible introduction to crucifixion—the "intermediate death," as Edersheim denominates it.

B. D. M., Linden, Pa. 1. Why do so many take the step of acknowledging their willingness to accept Christ at evangelistic meetings, and go away unbelieving and still feeling unforgiven? 2. Does one need a special call from God to be a missionary, or can the decision be made in one's own mind from the simple desire to lead souls to Christ? 3. Give some names of schools for the training of missionaries.

1. The trouble with the people you mention, of whom there are unfortunately a great many, is that they do not persevere in their seeking until they really find Christ. Raising the hand, or signing a card, or standing up, or even going forward to the altar, is but the first step toward the new life. The seeker should not consider that he has found what he wishes until he has in his own soul the assurance that Christ has received him and pardoned his sins. Of course, the Saviour is willing to do this at the first sign of the desire to come to him, but it is

Sanatogen—
Restorer of Exhausted Nerves

FEW men and women escape trouble with their nerves—many suffer, perhaps to the verge of complete breakdown, without knowing the true reason.

The warning appears in sleeplessness, in loss of appetite, disturbed digestion, weakened powers of body and mind, in "low spirits" that are all too seldom attributed to their actual cause—impoverishment of nerves and tissues.

Sanatogen recognizes the true nature of these conditions and scientifically meets them. Sanatogen carries to these nerves and tissues the tonic food demanded by their exhausted state—the particular natural nourishment quickly and eagerly assimilated by the starved centres. The system rejoices in getting the specific food it has needed, and an aroused and sustained vitality is shown in the return of new power, new buoyancy, new courage and efficiency.

If you feel the need of bodily renewal, consider seriously the remarkable fact that 16,000 practising physicians have enthusiastically endorsed the reconstructive, rejuvenating power of Sanatogen.

Prof. Thomas B. Stillman, M.S., Ph.D.

The well-known research chemist of Stevens' Institute writes:

"The chemical union of the constituents of Sanatogen is a true one, representative of the highest skill in the formation of a product containing phosphorus in the organic phosphate condition, and so combined that digestion and assimilation of Sanatogen are rendered complete with the greatest ease."

C. H. Stockton.

Rear-Admiral U. S. Navy and Pres. Geo. Washington University, writes:

"Some time ago my physician recommended Sanatogen to be used in my family. After giving it a fair trial, I am thoroughly convinced it is most excellent for the nerves and an invigorating food tonic."

The Right Rev. the Bishop of Chichester, England, writes:

"I have found Sanatogen most beneficial as well as pleasant."

Prof. C. A. Ewald.

Berlin University, Doctor honoris causa University of Maryland, states in his contribution on "Typhus abdominalis":

"I can say that I have used Sanatogen in a great number of cases (that is, in those disturbances of metabolism which were mainly of a nervous or neurasthenic origin), and have obtained excellent results."

We ask you earnestly to get acqnainted with Sanatogen. Investigate our claims first if you like and we are only too glad to have you do so. Ask your doctor about it, and in any case write us at once for our book "Nerve Health Regained," written in an absorbingly interesting style, beautifully illustrated and containing facts and information of vital interest to you. This book also contains evidence of the value of Sanatogen which is as remarkable as it is conclusive.

Sanatogen is sold in three sizes, $1.00, $1.90, $3.60 only as the seeker definitely trusts the Saviour that the consciousness of forgiveness comes and the new life is implanted in the soul. While all of the methods mentioned are helpful in making the decision to accept Christ, yet it is possible that these very methods may obscure the simple act of faith; none of them can, unaccompanied by positive, definite faith, bring the joy of the new birth, and the act of trust by which that joy comes to the soul can be made without any of these outward signs or agencies. 2. The call to be a missionary has come to many. Indeed, when that call comes there is often added an almost equally definite call to a certain field of missionary activity. It is, however, not at all necessary to wait for such a definite and supernatural call. It may truly be said that the need is the call. Wherever people have need of Christ there is the call to his followers to go and win souls. The need is so much greater in the foreign field than at home that many missionary workers have said that every Christian who has been called to distinctly religious work should go to the foreign field, unless he feels a definite call to work on the home field. 3. The Moody Bible School at Chicago, the Moody schools at Northfield and Mount Hermon, Mass., the Bible Teachers' Training School at New York are among the best institutions for missionary training. Some colleges, also, such as Ohio Wesleyan and Yale, have special departments for the study of missions in which some missionary training is given. For further information write to the Student Volunteer Movement, New York, or the Missionary Education Movement, New York, or the Missionary Board of your own denomination.

S. T., Renrock, O. Please explain Paul's letter to Philemon.

Onesimus, a slave of Philemon, had run away from his master and fled to Rome. Here he became converted, through the teaching of Paul. He was serviceable to Paul at Rome, but the apostle would not retain him without Philemon's consent. So he persuades Onesimus to return to his master, and sends with him this letter, which has been included in the New Testament canon, in which he asks Philemon to forgive his servant and to receive him "not as a servant but as a brother beloved."

Mrs. J. P. A., Crawford, Ga. In I. John 4: 20 what is meant by "brother"?

It is not used here in the sense of blood relation, but rather of friend, neighbor, acquaintance, fellow man. He is speaking also of our spiritual brethren. If we do not love the brethren whom we see and know, how can we love the invisible Father? By faith in Christ we learn to love both God and man. Besides, it is the Saviour's own commandment that we should love one another.

W. R. C., Dalton, Mass. 1. How can one recognize the polar star? 2. Is it a fixed star?

1. Any clear night look at the Dipper or Great Bear and in a direct line from the two first stars in the quadrilateral of this constellation measure with the eye about five times the distance between them in a straight line and you will locate a luminary a little brighter than its neighbors; this is the Pole Star. 2. Astronomically speaking, there are no fixed stars; as we explained in a recent issue the so-called fixed stars are supposed to be the suns of other systems of worlds, themselves performing immense revolutions through the fields of space. However, of all the bodies which scintillate in the starry night the only one that remains motionless or seems motionless is the Pole Star. At any moment of the year, day or night, its station remains unchanged. All the other stars, on the contrary, turn in twenty-four hours round it, taken as the center of the mighty vortex. For this reason it is the most important star to navigators in determining their course.

E. W. R., Los Angeles, Calif. The tabernacle, which the Israelites under Moses's instructions built in the wilderness for the glory of God and as a movable temple, is described in the Bible and also at great length by Josephus, the Jewish historian, in his Antiquities. It was the first sanctuary of the people, their place of meeting and the place wherein the divine glory dwelt in its peculiar manifestation to the nation. It was less a place of worship in the ordinary sense than a place where Jehovah met with or dwelt among his people. Ex. 29: 42-46. "Tent of revelation" has been suggested as the best equivalent for the Hebrew description.

Mrs. M. D. E., Whitewood, S. D. 1. Please explain John 8: 58. 2. Also third chapter of John, 13th verse. 3. Also third chapter of John, 18th and 36th verses. How and by whom were the prophets and others in olden times saved?

1. The more literal rendering is: "Before Abraham was brought into being, I exist"—implying that he existed before all creation, or from eternity. 2. This passage has caused much dispute, as it sounds like a paradox. Its manifest meaning, the best commentators hold, is: "The perfect knowledge of God is not obtained by any man's going up from earth to heaven to receive it, no man having so ascended, but He whose proper habitation is [illegible] (in the bosom of the Father) hath, by taking human form, descended as the Son of Man to disclose the Father." It has no reference to Abraham or Lazarus. 3. These verses emphasize the great fact that the object of Christ's mission was to save and that those who, having received his message, wilfully rejected it remained under condemnation. God had his witnesses in earlier times: prophets, patriarchs and holy men of old, whose faith was accounted to them for righteousness. James 2: 23; Rom. 4: 3; Gal. 3: 6 and other passages.

C. A. B., Dry Branch, Ga. The first Sunday school was organized by Robert Raikes in Gloucester, England, June 5, 1784.

W. E. D., Ossian, Ind. According to tradition, John was buried in Samaria. The Vulgate account of the burial does not make any mention of the head of the Baptist. See Matt. 6: 29. It may have been recovered afterward, but there is no record of the fact.

W. K., Hamilton, Mich. Psalm 115 omit verse 9 to close is an exhortation to praise and blessing and gratitude to God for all his benefits. The last three verses remind us that life is short and that we should fulfil his will and bless his name continually while we live.

Mrs. L. M. J., Glenwood, Ind. The custom of wearing mourning has been much modified in recent years. The rule at present is that a widow shall wear black for one year and then white the next year. After this, the life, if she chooses, may resume the wearing of colors.

F. H., Parkstown, S. D. The description in Ezek., chapters 40 to 47, is an ideal picture of the restored Jewish temple. At the very outset (chapter 40, verse 2) it is stated to be a vision. The temple he describes is to be built after restoration, and will be a perfect manifestation of God's love for his covenant people.

In the Table of Contents of a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Mr. C. H. Kilmer, of Mecklenburg, N. Y., was credited with an article entitled "In Africa's Black Republic." This was due to a mistake in the compositor department, the matter which made up that article having been compiled from letters sent from missionaries in Liberia.

Mr. Edmund Eitel, James Whitcomb Riley's private secretary, has called our attention to the fact that the story of "The Hoosier Boy," which appeared in the October 2 issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was rather unfair to Mr. Riley, as in it he has been confused by our correspondent with another poet, who Mr. Eitel believes was Richard Realf. "For something like that which was described in our article did take place between Don Piatt and this poet, 'When the Frost is on the Punkin and the Fodder's in the Shock' was written in Indianapolis and given out first under the name of Benjamin F. Johnson of Boon," Mr. Eitel concludes.

A Dandy Sled

I Made It Myself

I TOOK two pine boards for runners 3 feet 6 inches long, 5¼ inches high, and ¾ inch thick. From both boards I sawed off a three-cornered piece (Figure 1). Six inches from the back of each runner on the top edge I whittled out a block 1 inch deep and 1 inch wide and 11 inches apart, sawed out two other blocks of wood, then took three sticks of hard pine (old stair rods will do) 1 inch square and about 16 inches long, placed the rods in the cuts, adjusted the runners, saw that the runners stood plumb, then nailed the cross rods fast to them. Nailed two stout sticks along the projecting ends of the cross sticks for handles, now made a seat-board to fit, fastened on a little forward of the middle, smoothed the bottom of the front runners with a knife and nailed strip iron an inch wide off an old barrel and nailed along the bottom of each runner, bored holes in the front ends for ropes, and the sled is a winner.

This Boy Is a Hero

GEORGE CARROLL, age six, was playing on the railroad bridge which crosses the millrace by a big flour mill in North East, Md., and fell in. The water was seven feet deep and the little fellow was going down the second time when William Johnson, the ten-year-old son of the proprietor of the mill, attracted by screams of the drowning boy's twin, who had seen his brother fall into the water, plunged after the drowning child and was twice pulled under by the struggles of the little boy. But young Johnson, with George Carroll quite unconscious in his arms, was pulled out of the race by other boys on the shore.

William Johnson

William Johnson is a Boy Scout, and, like the hero that he is, administered first aid to his unfortunate little playfellow and brought him to consciousness, never thinking of himself or of the part he had played in the rescue of his friend. It was not long, however, before plenty of grown-ups arrived on the scene, and the brave boy, even against his will, was carried through the village streets and proclaimed a hero. William Johnson is a very successful CHRISTIAN HERALD salesman in North East, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has awarded him a special prize for bravery. He deserves a Carnegie medal.

Kindness

KINDNESS and manliness are great virtues," says an old Spanish proverb. "Oblige without regarding whom you oblige," is another, and it means, be kind to every one, great or small, rich or poor.

When the Russians were besieged by the Japanese in 1905 in Port Arthur, the Japs got close up to their forts by digging long deep trenches, into which the Russians were unable to shoot. At one time they were so close that a Russian soldier was able to throw a letter into the Japanese trench. The letter was a message to his mother in Russia; but as Port Arthur was cut off from all communication he begged that some one would send a message for him, and he enclosed a gold coin to pay the cost.

The Japanese soldier who found the note took it to his officer and the officer telegraphed the Russian soldier's message to his mother and threw a note back into the enemy's lines to tell him it had been done.

Do not hesitate to wear your fine laces, nor to buy those you admire, for fear they will not stand washing. It is true that they will not survive ordinary washing methods, but when washed carefully with Ivory Soap, they seem to grow more beautiful with use.

Those who make lace, and those who sell it, know the value of Ivory Soap for this purpose. They find that it cleanses perfectly even the most badly soiled pieces, leaving them like new in texture and clearer than ever in color, without weakening a single thread.

Ivory Soap does this because it is made of the highest grade materials, pure and mild—and because it contains no "free" (uncombined) alkali, nothing to injure anything which water itself will not harm.

To Wash Real Lace Collars and Other Fine Laces

Baste the lace to a piece of clean white muslin so that each point and picot is held firmly in place. Make a good lather of Ivory Soap and warm water and let the lace soak for thirty minutes. Then alternately press between hands and dip in the water until clean. Do not rub. If necessary, use a second clean suds of Ivory Soap. Then rinse in clear waters, next in blue water and lastly in a thin starch. Tack on a board, stretching the muslin evenly. When nearly dry, remove from the board and press thoroughly through the muslin. Do not put the iron on the lace. When dry, cut the basting threads and you will find the lace like new.

CARRYING THE WAR INTO MACEDONIA

AS IF in preparation of a mighty amphitheater for some gigantic spectacle, the armies of the five nations of the Balkans marched and countermarched, maneuvered and ght petty engagements for positions all through first weeks of October. Not since 1870 has pe witnessed such spectacular warfare as that h is now taking place in Macedonia. A million are under arms in the conflict; three kings and crowned princes are leading their national es in the field. The greatest war that Europe known since the Franco-Prussian has opened r conditions which make the struggle likely to ne of the blood-thirstiest and bitterest in mod- history. The area covered by the military ations is enormous, as it stretches all way from the Black Sea across northern edonia to the borders of Montenegro the head of the Adriatic Sea. Along line of mountainous and broken country Bulgarians are reported to have mobil- four hundred thousand men; the ians about fifty-five thousand, and the tenegrins nearly forty-five thousand. ece, who is attacking the Turk from the h, has between thirty and forty thou- l men in the field, and against all these key has now arrayed nearly half a mil- soldiers and is rushing more to the t as rapidly as possible. It is believed she can make the number seven hundred fifty thousand before reaching her limit.

o close is the censorship that is being cised over the news despatches that it ost impossible to decide which shall be pted, the censored version of an engage- t as it comes from Constantinople or as omes from Sofia or Belgrade. In Lon- most credence seems to be placed in Constantinople versions of the reports, gh Vienna and Budapest fortify the thern versions with their confirmation. thing, however, is true beyond a doubt: Balkan allies have successfully carried war into Macedonia. Whether they can p it there is a question yet unanswered. m the borders of Montenegro practically the way across to Adrianople, which is y close to the Black Sea, the allies have wn great masses of troops over the tiers into the Turk's own territory of edonia, while on the south the Greeks, er the leadership of their Crown Prince nstantine, have pushed across the border and in two engagements driven back their ancient enemies, captured their artillery and finally occupied the important town called Servia, about twenty-five miles north of their own borders. Captain Butler, the British army officer who is accompanying the Greek army in the capacity of correspondent for one of the London daily papers, has telegraphed of the last movement as follows: "The enemy's forces were composed of twelve battalions with six field batteries. They suffered great losses, and in full flight they abandoned twenty-two guns with a large quantity of ammunition and stores.

"A heartrending sight was witnessed when the Greeks entered the town of Servia. The Turks before leaving had massacred seventy Greek women and children who lived there. Greek mothers were lying dead across doorsteps and in courtyards in every kind of position, indicating that they had tried to protect their offspring. There had been a systematic house-to-house massacre. The indignation of the Greek soldiers is intense, but the troops are well in hand, and no reprisals are feared."

The Montenegrins, after two days' hard fighting, took possession of the Turkish town, Berana, and are rapidly advancing toward the important military center, Scutari. Further east along the border the Servians have successfully crossed into Turkish territory, and, fighting almost every inch of the way, have possessed themselves of the important towns, Pristina, Kratovo, Kotchana, Kumanova and Novi-Bazar. The surrender of the last town took place only after three days' severe fighting, during which there was terrible slaughter both among the Servians and the Turks. Stories of hard-fought encounters with the Arnaut tribesmen and the Turkish regulars are being told by wounded soldiers who have been taken back into Servian territory for treatment. It is very difficult to arrive at any definite idea as to the actual numbers killed or wounded. It is a fair example of the tone of the despatches to quote that from Belgrade, which stated regarding the battle at Novi-Bazar: "The Turks lost over a thousand killed, while the Servian casualties were also considerable." The Constantinople version of this engagement states that the Turks, having held the city as long as possible for the purpose of delaying the Servian advance, retired in good order, losing some killed and wounded, but inflicting terrible loss upon their enemies.

Undoubtedly the greatest success of the campaign so far has fallen to the Bulgarians. The conformation of the country over which the fighting was doomed to take place was such that military experts had worked out beforehand a great many of the possible movements of the troops. The Turks had a great military center in the strongly fortified city of Adrianople. From this splendid position lines of carefully constructed earthworks stretched northeast toward the Black Sea almost thirty miles to the town of Kirk-Kilisseh, which was claimed to be almost as important from a military point of view as Adrianople itself. These two fortifications form the protection for the Adrianople to

BUMPER CROPS MEAN BETTER TIME

ACCORDING to the reports received from all parts of the country, the crops of the present year are of phenomenal proportions and furnish a presage of lower cost of living and better times all around. These figures give an approximate idea of the tremendous size and extraordinary value of the crops of 1912:

Crops of 1912.	Bushels.
Corn,	3,000,000,000
Wheat,	750,000,000
Oats,	1,500,000,000
Barley, Rye and Buckwheat,	250,000,000
Total of the Cereal,	5,500,000,000

A writer in the New York Times gives some suggestive calculations covering this gigantic outcome of our agricultural industries. He shows that in handling this bumper crop, the farmers of the country have a task before them contrasted with which the movement of great armies seem like child's play. Hired hands—not regular employees—engaged for the harvest number 860,000, and this single division of the workers draws over $10,000,000 in pay for the short term of service. Then there are 1,130,000 farm laborers who are kept busy the year round. In the great Western States the men who own or rent grain land and who help in the harvest number some 2,240,000 more, thus bringing up the total of the harvest army to 4,230,000 men—greater by far than the biggest army the world has ever seen.

If the Nation's Mammoth Grain Crop of 5,500,000,000 Bushels Were Dumped on Lower New York, It Would Make a Pyramid 1,400 Feet High, With a Base Nearly a Mile Wide

This giant working force uses in the field 9,500,000 horses and about 4,500,000 carts, harvesters, and other apparatus. If this vast train could be put in a single line, horses and machines, carts, wagons, etc., would string out over 25,854 miles, or considerable more than around the entire globe. As to the wheat crop alone, it would make a river of grain 100 to 125 feet wide, four feet deep, and reaching from New York to Chicago. All the ships in New York harbor, working steadily, would take two years to handle it.

If we take the entire crops of six cereals, the dimensions of the problem are simply astounding. The writer makes this picturesque calculation:

"If the attempt were made to store it all in downtown New York it would make a solid mountain more than 1,500 feet in height with sharply sloping sides and a base nearly a mile wide. The Stock Exchange would be buried under it. The peak of the thirty-nine story Bankers' Trust Building would be more than 700 feet from the surface. Wall Street and every building in it, every foot of lower Manhattan from the City Hall to the Battery sea-wall, would be buried under the sloping heap. The forty-one-story Singer Building, four blocks north of the top of the pile, would be hidden, in spite of its 612 feet of height. Lower Broadway and all its buildings, Bowling Green, the Custom House, the Battery, the North River piers, the docks of South Street, would all be swamped. Only a part of the Whitehall Building on the south and the new Woolworth tower at the north, with one or two neighboring skyscrapers, would show above the mass. The peak of it would overtop the Woolworth tower by over 500 feet. It would make a grain mountain higher than any other hill or headland within thirty miles of the Atlantic Coast south of New Hampshire.

"To move such a mass at one time would, of course, be impossible. Its weight would be 150,000,000 tons. It would require 7,500,000 freight cars of the large twenty-ton size to carry it, and 186,650 locomotives would be required to haul them."

On the farm, the value of the wheat crop is placed at $625,000,000, while corn, oats and barley bring up the total to $3,500,000,000. This is $250,000,000 more than the entire cost of the Civil War. The railroads handle it gradually. They receive $5,000,000 for freight in carrying the crop to the primary markets—the central selling points (Chicago, Duluth and Minneapolis) alone. Thence it is transshipped in the shape of flour, cornmeal, etc., to all parts of the country and to the ports for export. This means millions more in payment for freight.

How does the farmer fare in these enormous transactions? He has borne all the heavy initial expense of cultivating and harvesting; he has patronized the bank to borrow money on his crop, and he has had to pay $10,000,000 to extra hired labor as we have already shown. But, when all has been done, when the bumper crop is marketed, moved and the returns come in, the farmer can pay all his bills out of hand, have his new piano, automobile, or furniture; lay in his stock of goods at the stores, paying cash for everything, and have a substantial balance to put away in bank. It is then that the county and township banks are overflowing with money which they can send westward again. Local stores find business booming and the whole country, especially the agricultural sections, bask in the prosperity which the bumper crop has been the means of bringing to pass.

How the general public is affected by these conditions is partly shown in a report issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor which compares the prices of the principal foodstuffs in years of light crops and years of agricultural abundance. In that report, it is shown that on the nine great crops of the country, viz.: corn, wheat, oats, barley, buckwheat, potatoes, flaxseed and hay, the abundant supply will probably result in an average reduction in price of about 6 per cent. The aggregate saving is about 2 cent. la than it been in r years. W shows 100,000 bus more than year, an costing ei cents a b less at mills tha year ago. owing to abundance already s cents lowe bushel. Ha $2.74 lowe the ton, and this ought to reduce the price of milk, butter and cheese. The oats crop, which is largely used as food for stock, is nearly double that of last year, which ought also to make meat and livestock products cheaper. Potatoes, which last year averaged 38 cents a bushel, are now 51 cents. Finally, cotton—this year the biggest crop on record—is two points lower, and when the crop is finally harvested its magnitude and the reduction in price may give lower figures for all cotton goods.

Thus, through the goodness of Providence in giving us so plentiful a yield from the soil, the farmers, the workers and the whole country will share in the resultant benefit. This gift of abundance, coming straight from the hand of God, and for which none of the political parties have the slightest excuse for taking credit (although they may try to do so), is one which should awaken the warmest gratitude in our people everywhere. When Thanksgiving day comes, our churches, public societies and other bodies will have a rousing theme for the expression of the popular gratitude to God for his goodness.

Constantinople Railway line which is one of the two great arteries of travel in European Turkey. Toward this important position the Bulgarians threw the great mass of their army. As the various divisions passed through the defiles on the Turkish frontier the world looked with astonishment on their petty victories, expecting at almost any moment to learn that the Turk had finally sallied forth and annihilated them. It was with a good deal of joy in America, considerable disappointment in England and lots of surprise everywhere that the news was received on October 25 that during the first days of that week the Bulgarians had successfully attacked and captured the outlying stronghold, Kirk-Kilisseh. The London Daily Chronicle correspondent at Bulgarian headquarters telegraphed in part as follows:

"Under cover of a heavy artillery fire the infantry attacked on two sides, and the positions were finally carried at the point of the bayonet. The Turkish losses were heavy. Twelve hundred prisoners were taken, besides Krupp guns, quick-firing guns, wagons, and a large quantity of ammunition. The Turks are now in full retreat toward Visa on the main road to Constantinople. They fought a rear guard action, but in this the Bulgarians were again victorious."

From Constantinople comes the usual euphemistic version of a defeat, admitting that a severe engagement was fought between the Turkish and Bulgarian armies, but explaining that the Turks had advanced from Adrianople to Kirk-Kilisseh with the object of making a reconnaissance in force to oblige the Bulgarian army to deploy and disclose its strength; then announcing that as the Ottomans were not in sufficient force to press home the attack, they evenually retired in perfect order, deciding to evacuate Kirk-Kilisseh and fall back—nearly thirty-five thousand of them—to the main body of the army that is guarding the railway line.

The Greek fleet practically commands the Ægean Sea. This is by all odds a most important position, as it controls all communication by sea, and from it, with military assistance, the Salonica Railway may easily be destroyed. It is admitted, even in Constantinople, that the Greeks have possessed themselves of the Island of Lemnos at the mouth of the Dardanelles. This is a commanding position, and from it as a base Greece has every opportunity of keeping Turkey's ships bottled up in the Sea of Marmora and the Black Sea. Military and naval experts were astonished by Turkey's move of sending some of her ships into the Black Sea and bombarding the Bulgarian ports of Varna and Kavarna. The reports of these engagements state that the Turkish fire had little or no effect and that the most serious damage done was the destruction of an old monastery and one of the king's summer residen

It is impossible to conjecture as yet what final outcome of this terrific struggle will be. early laurels of the campaign undoubtedly g the Christian allies, but what the Turk may do fore the end has come is beyond all imagin That the war itself will be terribly bitter is a f gone conclusion, for all those who are now al against the Crescent have felt the iron heel Turkish oppression and listened through gen tions to suave, but always unfulfilled, Mohamme promises. The warriors on both sides are impe to the fighting by the bitterest hatred, and now t the flame of war has been kindled. there will be stopping it until one side or the other is reduce subjection either by physical defeat or by the l of funds wherewith to prosecute the fight. O side the actual ranks of the fighters the distress suffering will be appalling before the winter over. One of the Constantinople corresponde inserts the following paragraph in the midst o despatch dealing with the whole situation:

"Fugitives from the country near the front who have come into Adrianople for safety decl that there is an absolute famine in Eastern Rur lia and that the prospects for the winter, wh would be gloomy enough in ordinary circumstanc are simply appalling. The neighboring villa are deserted by the peasants, who are afraid being shot or captured."

proximately 2,500 cities, of 2,500 inhabitants ver, have been communicated with by the cen- ffice, and the churches in these larger towns, es being coached in their own preparations, been asked to help the churches in smaller and rural districts to plan their work for the week. The program, which will be followed taneously throughout the land, is as follows: ay, November 17, morning, Our Country's Debt to Christ; evening, Units in Making Our Country God's Country; Monday, November 18, American Indians, Africans and Asiatics; Tuesday, November 19, The Frontier and the Island Possessions; Wednesday, November 20, The Immigrants; Thursday, November 21, The Rural Regions and the Cities; Friday, November 22, American Social Problems; Saturday, November 23, Prayer and Fellowship; Sunday, November 24, morning, Our Country's Opportunity for Christ; evening, Unity in Making Our Country God's Country. "Our Country—God's Country," is the campaign motto.

Rev. Charles L. Thompson
President Home Mission Council

The movement has been conducted jointly by the Home Mission Council, composed of twenty-seven general boards engaged in national Home Mission work, and the Council of Women for Home Missions, representing nine constituent boards. These two bureaus represent practically the entire Protestant Home Mission force of America. The plan has included a three months' study of the economic, moral, and religious problems of America, culminating in the week's celebration, during which the pastors and workers will discuss the situation with a view to further practical work. For these services suggestive programs and exhaustive and illuminating material are being sent out from the central office.

One city has outlined the following campaign: from September 1 to November 17 will be regarded as the educational period, when the various aspects of Home Mission work will be presented. Home Mission Week will, of course, be observed from November 17 to 24. From November 24 to January 1 there will be a "Go to Church" campaign. Beginning January 1 there will be simultaneous evangelistic meetings in the churches, followed by a personal work campaign until the first of April. This outlines a pretty thorough winter's work. It is of interest to note in this connection that in this particular city the Men and Religion Movement had a most effective campaign last year.

A booklet entitled America's Greatest Task Democratized, which has been widely distributed in the interests of the campaign, quotes as a foreword the thrilling statement of the great philosopher, John Stuart Mill: "The political and economic struggles of society are, in their last analysis, religious struggles, their sole solution the teachings of Jesus Christ." The pamphlet proceeds: "The American Home Mission enterprise is the biggest, broadest, bravest movement in the United States, because it stands for the physical, social, economic, intellectual and religious emancipation of all the people."

Dr. Charles L. Thompson is president of the Home Mission Council; Mrs. George W. Coleman, president of the Council for Women.

A SHORT-LIVED REVOLUTION

THE revolt of General Felix Diaz, nephew of the exiled ex-President of Mexico, came to a sudden end when, on October 23, the city of Vera Cruz was retaken by the federal forces and the revolutionary general and his staff were made prisoners. This came as a great surprise to who had become convinced that, after General Reyes, Felix Diaz wield a greater influence with the Mexican army and the can populace than any other man alive. President Madero ted several days ago that the new uprising was not of great rtance and would soon be put down. The despatches the various Mexican centers, however, expressed the est fear that the organization of the formidable utionary movement with General Felix Diaz at its would make very uncertain General Madero's e of the presidential chair. Felix Diaz entered ity of Vera Cruz on October 16 with five hundred seized the arsenal and the defenses and placed in charge of the two gunboats, Tampico and o, which were lying in the harbor. It has ys been believed that the possession of Vera is the keystone of the arch of Mexican Gov- ent, and on this basis the despatches from co City assumed a general aspect of discour- ent. Some went so far as to prophesy the of the Madero administration. Business at came practically to a standstill. Foreign ents of Vera Cruz prepared to leave if such a became necessary. The United States ship Moines, which was lying about five hundred s from the American consulate, was placed in iness to be of such assistance as might be neces- in the case of a great battle. It seemed as if all in readiness for the first fight of a revolution as us as that which placed Francisco Madero in the which Porfirio Diaz had occupied for so many s. In the manifesto which Felix Diaz published he ised peace to Mexico and honest elections to his fellow ens. He also named his cabinet, and in the list were the es of some of Mexico's most able men. Such eminent and table men as Alberto Grandos and Francisco de la Barra were ned portfolios. General Bernardo Reyes, who is now in prison consequence of his unsuccessful attempt to engineer a revolu- last December, was named by Diaz as Minister of War. In Washington, D. C., it was difficult to obtain any expression of opinion on the outcome of this new revolution in Mexico. There was, however, no hesitation in predicting the result of the first battle at Vera Cruz, when it became known that the State Department was in possession of reports as to the strength of the contending forces. It was believed that, as Diaz was outnumbered nearly three to one, and as General Beltran, the commander of the federal forces, had sufficient artillery to reduce any position Diaz might attempt to hold, the result of the fight would be decisive. On October 22 General Beltran made a formal demand for the surrender of the city of Vera Cruz. This note was couched in the most polite terms and concluded with the intimation that if surrender was not made immediately the federal commander would be compelled to use force. In reply General Felix Diaz thanked General Beltran for the form in which his communication was put, and expressed his regrets that the situation and state of the national affairs of his country obliged him to offer forcible defense. Copies of both these communications were forwarded by General Diaz to the foreign consuls of the city, asking that the foreign residents be requested to make inventories of such effects as it might be necessary for them to leave behind on moving out. With this request was coupled the promise to indemnify them in the shortest possible time for any damage or loss which might result from the battle. Commander Charles F. Hughes of the Des Moines also received a note from General Diaz, saying that the situation would be handled according to international law, and adding: "It is unnecessary to disembark American marines on my account." On the morning of October 23 two federal columns under the commands of General Joaquin Beltran and Colonel Jiménez Castro entered Vera Cruz from the north and south. Instead of the pitched battle which had been expected, they took possession of the city with little or no resistance. The actual casualties were few. Colonel Castro, with less than fifty men, captured General Diaz and his entire staff at the Vera Cruz police headquarters. General Diaz and the rebel officers were disarmed and imprisoned. General Beltran has summoned a court martial, and it is believed all of these men will be dealt with as military traitors.

TEXT: "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Luke 12: 32

THREE worlds are packed into these words: the world of the Shepherd, the world of the Father, and the world of the King. It is a triune world, for the same God is Shepherd, Father and King. Out of these three worlds have come to me four triplets of truth, which I should like to pass on to you.

First of all, a triplet of spheres: the sphere of the sheep, the sphere of the child and the sphere of the subject. The word which defines the sphere of the sheep is dependence, the word which defines the sphere of the child is love, and the word which defines the sphere of the subject is loyalty.

The sheep is utterly dependent upon the shepherd for supplies, safety and guidance. The 23d Psalm is the unfolding of this dependence. "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters." With such a Shepherd, the sheep has every need supplied. There is need of rest in repose, and God gives it by making us lie down. The sheep are rather frisky; they sometimes prefer to gambol over the fields; but the Shepherd, in his loving wisdom, often compels us to lie down and be quiet, and when his hand is upon us for such quiet repose, it is always in green pastures. Then there is need of rest in activity. "He leadeth me beside the still waters"—rest in movement, as we follow the Shepherd.

There is, however, a more intimate relation between the child and the father than between the sheep and the shepherd, and that relation is expressed by the word love. The father loves the children; while the children love the father and each other. The ideal home is the haven and heaven of love.

The subject-citizen is under all circumstances loyal to his king, ready to give up his life, if need be, in his defense. Scholars tell us that there are three words in the Greek which are translated "minister" in the English Bible. The first word means a private servant, who waits upon his master, eager to do his bidding. The second word means an official servant, who represents the government at the court of another nation. The third word, which Paul delighted in using, means an under-rower. The figure is taken from the ancient trireme, in which the captain, standing before the oarsmen, gave them the stroke; and as they struck with him, they, of course, struck with each other. Paul's ambition was to be an under-rower to Christ, to take up the stroke from him, to find out what he was doing in the world, and then come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

So a loyal subject in the kingdom of Christ takes the stroke from his King. He looks to him for guidance, and is ready to go at his command. If we find that our King is leading a great campaign for the evangelization of the world, we should take the stroke from him and join in the campaign. If he is leading a movement for the disestablishment of the church in Wales, we should take the stroke from him again and join in the movement. If he is leading for total abstinence and the destruction of the liquor traffic, we gladly take the stroke from him again and follow his leadership. "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" is the attitude of mind in every loyal citizen.

"Ownership"

We have next a triplet of relations. The relation between the sheep and the shepherd is expressed by the word "ownership." The sheep belongs to the shepherd; it is his property, and therefore safe. An old negro man in America was asked whether he felt secure in his hope of heaven. He replied, "I have my doubts and fears, and many troubles, but when the devil gets after me I simply go to my Master and say: 'Lord, you had better look after your property,' and he always does it!" Paul rejoiced in the fact that he was a bond-servant of the Lord Jesus Christ. He was glad to recognize his ownership, because he had been redeemed, "not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ."

With this ownership should go possession. "What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them—" He has the sheep, but he has lost it. He owns it, but he does not possess it. It is quite possible to own what you do not possess, and to possess what you do not own. I am quite sure that I own ten or a dozen umbrellas in London, while I possess only one or two. Some time ago I owned a good overcoat, but some one came into my study and took it out. I still own it, but he possesses it. It is possible for God to own us, while the devil possesses us. The ideal Christian is the man who recognizes the ownership of Christ and realizes full possession through the Holy Spirit.

The word which expresses the relation between the child and the father is kinship. The sheep is not akin to the shepherd; it has not the shepherd's nature. But the Christian has been born from above; he has become a partaker of the divine nature. "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God." "If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ."

The word which expresses the relation between the subject and king is citizenship, a citizenship which extends beyond the bounds of earth. Paul gloried in the fact that he was a citizen of heaven. But his citizenship in heaven made him all the more conscientious in using his citizenship on earth. We pity the man who has no better citizenship than England or America can give him, good as that is. He is called in Christ not only to a citizenship which is world-wide, but universal, taking in both earth and heaven.

A Triplet of Unities

We come, in the third place, to a triplet of unities. In the flock of sheep there is a unity of assembly. They go together as they follow their shepherd. The sheep in his nature is gregarious. I can think of nothing more pathetic than a lone sheep on the mountainside, unless it be a lone Christian, who refuses to join the church, and seeks to build up a Christian character and do the work of his Master without association with his brethren.

In the unity of the family there is fellowship and co-operation. Every member of the family works with every other member for the good of all. This co-operation is based upon kinship, a very much deeper thing than simply the gregarious spirit. Sheep herd together, but they do not live together in any co-operative way. In some great emergency, caused by danger, as in a cyclone, the sheep may herd even with other animals. I remember seeing in my boyhood the picture, in the old family Bible, of a group of men, women, children, sheep, lions and tigers herded together on the top of a hill, trying to escape the waters of the flood. Each one was so intent on self-preservation that it did not regard the presence of the others. Such miscellaneous herding, however, is not the ideal in the Christian Church. There must be a unity of spirit, of nature, of kinship, if there is to be real fellowship and co-operation.

In the unity of the kingdom there is organism. Of course there is organization, but a kingdom is a real organic unity, which expresses itself in various organizations. This organic unity comes from recognizing the king as head, while every citizen is obedient. Our Lord Jesus Christ is the head of the body of which we are members, and every member in healthy condition is obedient to the will of the Head. The spirit of democracy is in the air, which is both the hope and the menace of the age; the hope if it ripens into a democratic theocracy, in which Christ is enthroned; the menace if it rots into a democratic anarchy, in which liberty is license.

Let it be remembered that a New Testament church is not a democracy, but a theocracy, in which Jesus Christ is King, and every member a loyal subject. Heaven is that; and the nearest heaven on earth of which I know is a church that realizes this ideal. I was once seeking to carry forward a movement, in the church of which I was pastor, which was strongly opposed by a good brother, not a member of the official board. He argued at length against it, giving very plausible reasons; and in a spirit of apology for thus opposing the pastor he said that every church ought to have an "opposition bench," in order to preserve the proper balance of things! This "opposition bench" idea, however, he had gained, not from the Scriptures, but from Parliament and the democratic which has two contending parties. When an opposition bench" develops in the human body need a physician. It shows that something has gone wrong, that disease is doing its work. And when an "opposition bench" develops in a church course it is a symptom of disease, and not of he A majority vote, I must confess, is my pet a rence. If Christians will follow the apostolic ample of continuing in supplication and pr waiting patiently upon God for guidance, he sooner or later, give them the unity of the Spi the bond of peace.

The Appeal of Weakness

In the fourth place, we have a triplet of n The greatest need of the sheep is courage. " not, little flock." The sheep is the most cow animal alive. When it is badly frightened, it i even brave enough to run, but stands and tren When it seeks to escape danger it is apt to run some corner where its foe can easily reach it. both cowardly and silly. It is not courage, how to fight which the sheep needs, for it has no wea of offense or defense. Its need is courage to de to trust, to commit itself unreservedly to the ance and protection of the shepherd.

Such is the primary need of the Christian. W he realizes that he has no strength in himself all his help must come from God, and then ha courage to commit himself unreservedly to grace and power, he becomes invincible.

Weakness always appeals to noble stre Hence Paul could say, "When I am weak, the I strong," for his strength was in God. He even rejoice in weakness, that the power of C might rest upon him.

A friend of mine in America was very fond c chase, and lived in a country where the v abounded with wild deer. One morning, as he walking across his field, he heard the sou hounds in the distance, and as they approa looking through the cracks of a high fence he a little fawn, very wearied, its tongue hanging and its sides lathered with foam. The little had just strength enough to leap over the and stood there for a moment, with its great eyes gazing about in a frightened manner. it saw a hound leap over the fence not far a its first impulse seemed to cause it to run again instead of running away, it came and fell do a heap at the feet of my friend. He said: "I there and fought the dogs for nearly half an I just felt that all the dogs in that county coul capture the little fawn, after its weakness ha pealed to my strength."

So the Christian's weakness appeals to strength of God. Time was when, chased b hounds of my sins, I was full of fear. I a ashamed to say now that I was afraid of hell, my father preached because he believed the to be true and accepted the testimony of his Bewildered and weary, I stood not knowing way to fly, until I caught a vision of Jesus C on the cross, dying and rising from the dead. a sense of utter helplessness, I fell at his feet his omnipotence, linked with his love, has pro me ever since.

If you had gone to that Southern farm t twelve months afterward, you would have fou beautiful deer playing with the children o lawn; for my friend, after he had beaten o hounds, took the fawn on his shoulder and ca it home, to make it a pet in the family. Yes our Shepherd taketh the sheep on his shou limp weakness resting without holding on, or able to hold out, upon the shoulders of omnip love.

The need of the citizen in Christ's kingdom captivity. "It is your Father's good pleasu give." He would therefore have us possess ity to receive. He would give us a kingdom, before the King should appear in his glory to s

MY BROTHER'S KEEPER

WHERE shall we find a training school in the business of being a guardian? On all sides we are beset with teachers of personal efficiency who offer sure systems for self-improvement and for gaining success in the battle of life. The institution or the instructor who best can equip the youth to meet competition, to rise above his fellows, to win victories over his rivals, is sure of eager pupils day and night.

Prizes for the winners in the race; positions for the men who excel in their trade; big profits for the captains of industry who crowd and trample their way to the front; triumph and power and honor for him who by superior skill or aggressive force has captured the highest place. Such men the world applauds. Such men are said to have achieved success. And so they have, even as you and I are trying to do.

The world is rightly grateful to the successful teacher of personal efficiency; we need more of it in every branch of business and religious work, but we need something else with even greater urgency. We need more earnest attention to the study of relationship and to the business of guarding the interests of others. Individualism must be merged into brotherhood. I am my brother's keeper. If I am faithful to my charge he will advance with me. If he goes down to defeat, or to a life of littleness and ill favor with God and man, it is partly my fault.

"No! I protest!" exclaims the "self-made" man and the man whose days are strenuous with effort to make himself. I want no guardianship, and I deny that it is my business to play the guardian to any other man. This is an age for forceful, independent personality. Every man must fight his own way and win his own achievements. No one will accept responsibility for me if I fail. I shall have no one to thank but myself if I succeed. I must struggle for every advantage I gain and I shall snatch it when and where I can. The other fellow is doing the same thing." Such is the law of "self-help," a law greatly exalted by many teachers, but a pitiless law, which, when it operates alone, creates a savage individualism, destroys fellowship, forces some men up and many men down, and postpones far into an unknown future the era of "peace on earth, good will to men."

NO ONE of us is independent of the guardianship of our brothers and sisters. If they are faithful to us we prosper and rejoice. If some one of them forgets his obligation, immediately we suffer. The strongest man in the community, with unquestioned credit and large balances in the bank, may be ruined in a day if some humble brother, careless of the result of his gossip, spreads a rumor which causes a run on the bank and a sudden failure when a better sense of his responsibility to others would have kept him silent.

We are guardians of our brother's reputation as well as of his fortune. Freedom of speech gives us the right to express our own views and to spread our own beliefs; it does not give us the right to destroy our brother's reputation. Why is it that everywhere we find so many men and women who unhesitatingly denounce the integrity and the motives of those whom they do not know, but who, they believe, must be guilty because they have not submitted incontestible proof to their unknown detractors that they are innocent? Is it more popular to condemn the absent brother or sister than it is to praise? Is it more interesting? Is it pleasanter? Does it satisfy some inward lust for destruction? When our words have stabbed the absent brother or sister through and through and left a reputation bleeding and stricken down, can we go on our way, guiltless and indifferent, saying, with Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

Give us an increase, in these days, of splendid personal efficiency. Give us masterful teachers of "self-help." Give us the inspiration of those who have succeeded greatly—who have won glorious victories in their onward march—that we may be helped by their example to win our way upward. But do not stop there. Self-help, personal efficiency, victory over difficulties, successful achievement, power, reputation, wealth, influence—all these good things can never form a worthy goal. They are but the needful equipment to advance us toward the only goal worthy our aim. We are, and we must be whether we will or no, the guardians of our brother's weal. Splendid personal equipment used only for selfish gain is worse than wasted. If it be used in service to others it reaches its highest value and pays its righest dividends.

I AM my brother's keeper, therefore I will make myself strong that I may lend him a hand when he is weak; that I may carry my own burden unfalteringly and lift a part of his when he is weary.

I am my brother's keeper, therefore I will cheer him on the way; I will show him that in storm and darkness I am unafraid, so that he may be emboldened to walk through his own valley of shadow with a brave heart and head erect.

I am my brother's keeper, therefore I will be true and clean in my life, that as his life touches mine he may not be soiled; that he may find in me some example and incentive to keep his own life clean, and his dealings with men honorable and kind.

I am my brother's keeper, therefore I will cherish his fame, and never, if I can help it, cast a slur upon his motives or his acts. I am not his judge, I am his brother.

I am my brother's keeper, therefore I will try to solve the problems of life with a view to his welfare, knowing that in the rightful adjustment of business, and society, and life in its truest expression, my brother's welfare is my own, and mine is his. When perplexing questions must be answered by my voice, or my pen, or my vote, I will seek the answer which means my brother's good, not merely because such answer will mean also my own good, but because he is my brother.

I am my brother's keeper, therefore I want to know more and more about my relationship with him and how to aquit myself as a brother should; because I shall hear, some day, a voice calling to me in the garden: "Son, son, where is thy brother?" and I shall want to answer, "Here, Father, here is my brother, with his hand in mine; we have come home together."

BABYLON

REMEMBER thy captivity.
The night of feast and song comes on;
The golden night to comfort me
Within the walls of Babylon.

Here are her jeweled gardens hung
(Dear God, my blossom-time is done,
Who fear to lose my soul among
The asphodels of Babylon).

My dazzled eyes before, behind,
See no strong hills to rest upon,
But turning, turning, ever find
The brazen gates of Babylon.

God of my fathers, grant a sign
Ere my last memory is gone,
Whose lips are sated with the wine—
The purple wine of Babylon.

Her towers from wall to wall are set,
A wide and glittering diadem;
O God, be near, lest I forget
My quiet place, Jerusalem.

Fanny Crosby Still Singing at Ninety-Two

HEARING by the way of Boston that Fanny Crosby was ill with pneumonia, Mr. W. H. Doane proposed that we go up and see her, which we did recently, and thought the result of our visit might be acceptable to your readers. We found Fanny in bed, looking about the same as she has for the past two years. Her voice was strong, and not once did she cough in the half hour that we were in her company. Fanny says she has had some pretty sick days, but she is much better now and thinks she will soon be able to be out and come to New York again. When we arrived at Bridgeport we asked a man on the street which car would take us to W—— Street. He replied, "I suppose you are going to see Fanny Crosby. The car on Main Street, two blocks up, will take you there all right."

We took the car named, and as we entered I said to the conductor, "This car goes to W—— Street?" "Yes, 226," he replied; so we concluded that Fanny Crosby and Bridgeport were synonymous terms.

Fanny was cheerful, happy and glad to see us, and more talkative than usual. We sat at the piano and played for her, songs which were adapted to her hymns, namely: "Pass Me Not, O Gentle Saviour"; "Safe in the Arms of Jesus"; "I Am Thine, O Lord"; "Take the Name of Jesus with You"; "Hold Thou My Hand"; "Blessed Homeland," and "The Bright Forever," to which Fanny joined in with her voice and clapped her hands and exclaimed: "Praise the Lord, it is like heaven upon earth to be here."

She said she was "ready to go if it was the good Lord's will, but she thought "the Lord had work for her yet to do on earth." Truly it was a happy meeting which will never be forgotten by either of us.

Fanny has the best of care at the hands of Mrs. Booth and her daughter, and seems to be perfectly contented with her surroundings. Her friends are numberless; but it is hoped they will allow her to rest quietly and not be disturbed by overmany calls.

Fanny Crosby was born March 24, 1820, and is now rounding out her ninety-second year.

THE WOUNDED EX-PRESIDENT

COL. ROOSEVELT is rapidly recovering from the effects of his bullet wound. He left Mercy Hospital in Chicago on Monday morning, October 21. Avoiding the crowds, he was taken to his car at Twelfth Street, a half mile from the station. Early Tuesday morning he reached New York, where the car was switched to the tracks of the Long Island Railroad. His fellow townsmen had gathered to give him a welcome at Oyster Bay, but his physicians insisted that he avoid this excitement by alighting at another station.

The train stopped at Syosset station, from which he was taken in an automobile to Sagamore Hill. He greeted the members of his household, who were on the porch to welcome him, with the characteristic salutation: "Hello, people! I'm glad to get home again."

The doctors who accompanied him from Chicago announced that he had stood the journey well. There were no delays or inconveniences during the ex-President's return home. Along the way crowds were gathered at the stati watch the train pass, but he w course, unable to greet them. D the whole of the journey he lay bed in the Pullman stateroom c private car, in which he was acc nied by Mrs. Roosevelt, Miss Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., Philip velt, Col. Cecil Lyon, Drs. Lambe Terrell, and two detectives who gu the doors.

Upon reaching home the colone able to walk up stairs unassisted rested well, remaining in bed fo eral days, endeavoring to carr the order of the doctors that he t week's complete rest. They we first unwilling to state that there possibility of his taking up any paign work, but later agreed that would rest completely for a week was some probability that he mig able to address the New York m at Madison Square on October 30.

It is hardly likely that the bulle be recovered, as its location is suc there is little fear that it will Colonel Roosevelt any discomfort.

ELECTRICITY'S THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY

JUST thirty years from the day on which the first station for the distribution of electrical current was opened in New York City, Mr. Thomas A. Edison, to whose efforts practically all the marvelous development that has since taken place is due, pressed a button which caused the new Grand Central Palace in New York City to burst into a blaze of electric brilliance. That was the opening of the annual Electrical Exposition and Automobile Show, and it followed immediately after a complimentary luncheon which had been tendered Mr. Edison. Men prominent in all branches of business were present to pay their tribute to the inventor's contributions to twentieth century development.

Mr. Edison himself was the first to inspect the thousands of electrical appliances which made up the show and most of which, directly or indirectly, owe their origin to his genius. During all the week that followed, thousands upon thousands of people passed up and down and looked with open-eyed astonishment at the wonders that the mystic fluid, electricity, has wrought. Huge generators bearing great danger signs warning the observer that there are 100,000 volts of high tension current within arm's reach added to the attraction. Miniature lightning flashes, eighteen or twenty feet long, jumping from coil to coil, were evidence enough to convince the most skeptical that the signs were telling the truth. Among the five thousand devices and appliances that were exhibited one might find everything to which the electrical current has been applied for the lightening of household work and the saving of time and labor in the manufacturing arts: everything from an electrically cooled refrigerator and a washing machine that was labeled "guaranteed fool-proof" to an electric toaster, an electric chafing dish and an electric piano that reproduces the playing of great masters. In the electric tea-room one might be served with tea or coffee cooked in five minutes by electricity. Electrically heated hot-houses extended their own invitation to come in and see the beauties they had produced.

One of the most interesting and most popular exhibits in the whole show was that of a gentleman who is familiar to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers for an entirely different reason. This was Mr. Emilio Olsson, the South American traveler, missionary and scientist, who is the inventor of an overhead irrig system which produces an electrically charged rain. This summer he down at Goodground, L. I., a little demonstration farm with his syste stalled. Mr. Olsson laughingly said that as far as this particular piece of was concerned it was badly misnamed, for it was the poorest soil on Island, yet under the electrical rain it produced remarkable crops of g truck. Mr. Olsson had at the electrical show a miniature glass-enclosed and at intervals, after the more daring of the crowd had dipped their har the electrified water to feel the tingle, the spray was turned on to sho system in operation.

This year the United States Army and Navy were well represented a exposition. This year, as last, they had the wireless room of a batt reproduced in the navy section and the men of the army—the coast artill showed how the great coastal defense guns are fired by means of elec signals to the gunners. One of the most amusing exhibits was that o Dictagraph Company. Here one might sit on the lower floor and hear p the comments which were being made about the machine by those who standing before the exhibit away up on the balcony with the band playi between. Another striking exhibit portrayed the industrial developme Brooklyn by a panoramic painting of a long section of its front. The painting was supplemented by miniature reproduc of the docks and factories along the river, and as the lighting e changed one saw the city in a blaze of sunlight, at twilig with all its electric lights burning after the moon and had appeared. On the topmost gallery of the Central Palace was a very popular exhibit of el storage-battery automobiles. These ran abo miniature exhibition track and carried as of the hundreds who besieged the atten for rides, as could be jammed in. Hun of thousands saw all these things enjoyed a few hours of combined educ and amusement as the guests of the trical company that supplies their h with current. The show ran th the entire week, and all, when the light went out on Saturday night, it a huge success.

"DAD" OF D-X CROSSING

HERE wasn't much of Dad—just a handful of little old man with vaguely troubled blue eyes that brought a gulp of nameless pity to the throats of those who first beheld him, thin gray hair that straggled over his head, and a ier beard straying off uncertainly down over aded black tie and immaculate shirt. Bancroft d him one morning waiting in his office with a r from Holcomb to see what he could do for him. e then there has been a legend that the chief atcher put him to work out of sheer gratitude at ng a man who was smaller than he, but jokes it Bancroft's size are more numerous than orous. G. S. from the center the cut on the north to the bridge over the creek the south, and the equally bright steel of the & O. from where it gleamed far down the valley tward to where, all too near the crossing, it dis- eared abruptly around the hill on the long Bent untain grade to the north. Below the K. & O. ck were the water tank and pumping station, latter half-hidden in the willows along the eam; and beside the tank was the spot to which d's gaze wandered oftenest of all. It was to the le frame house built of company lumber, with the sameness of company architecture, and nted with the company hues of yellow and white, t was home for him and the cheery old lady who led him Robert and whose love-dimmed eyes still w in him some likeness to the straight, vigorous ng fellow she had married forty years before. e house was part of his salary, and, as to the size that salary, there is still the classic comment of n Reagan, of Winchester, that he "hadn't never seen them have to double-head the pay-train en they paid off the operators."

Between trains Dad satisfied his hunger for read- as best he could with a battered copy of Our tual Friend, until he almost knew it by heart d the characters were as real to him as the switch ers before him. Books and magazines in plenty crews would have given him for the asking, but accepted no favors for which he could not pay. e passing years had taken from him all of youth ept its imagination and some of its dreams, and, although a little deprecatingly at what he felt was the childishness of it, he amused himself as the trains halted at the tank by peopling them with such persons from the book as his fancy found resemblance to among the passengers. His simple, kindly heart went out most of all to the two travelers whom he saw most frequently, "the boofer lady," as he called her, and the man beside her that, though his big frame and weathered face belied it, he said must certainly be "the mysterious secretary," John Rokesmith. Several times each month they went by, all unaware of the gentle old figure who beamed affectionately down on them over his spectacles from the telegraph tower at the crossing. Daily he watched for them, and when occasionally he missed them for weeks at a time a thin cloud of disappointment settled over his spirits that would not wholly lift until once more he caught a glimpse of their faces.

In the evening, when the night man came down on his railway velocipede from the next station beyond, where he boarded, Dad would trudge slowly across the tracks in the soft dusk to where the light shone through the moonflower vines rioting over the front of the tiny yellow-and-white house. As he stepped on the porch he would straighten a bit in what he fondly believed was a successful effort to show the old lady in black with the white ruching at her neck who met him at the door, that he was not tired at all. Then there would be just time to brush the wispy gray locks and put on the other coat, with which he honored her dinners, before the silver bell of other and better days called him to a table that with its thin china, its few pieces of old-time silver, or its carefully darned tablecloth that the old lady might have greatly strengthened the division's suspicions. And while she poured his tea for him into the cup that had a handle he told her of the day's happenings. Some time during the meal their conversation reached the whimsical question on her part, "And were the Boffins or Mrs. Wilfer aboard this afternoon?"

On his red-letter days his face lighted up at his reply of "No, Mary, but you should have seen 'the boofer lady' and 'the Secretary!' She is undoubtedly a girl whom any one would be proud to own as a daughter. I must confess to an unusual interest in her; almost as great a one, in fact, as I have in 'the Secretary.' I am sure he is a most excellent young man, and, I think, very much like—" Here Dad would check himself with suspicious suddenness to comment with a great show of indignation on the hazards of his crossing, as though he feared to disturb old memories in their uneasy slumber. Yet the crossing worried the old man. Imperceptibly, strengthening and deepening day by day, the feeling had crept over him that some time—far in the dim future he hoped and prayed—the hour would come when he should have to stand at his levers and decide which train should have the right of way, and which should take the derail. And of what could happen then he preferred not to think.

One day in August, Oliver McCullough came up into the tower to find Dad on his knees at the base of the levers, busy with an oil-can. There had been complaints that Dad was getting too old and slow for the tower. Trains had had to stop and wait for the "clear" at times until some of the more reckless engineers had taken to running by his signals, risking the chance that it was the old man's slowness and not a K. & O. train. Dad had been grieved and perplexed by it, but said nothing for fear of causing them trouble. Now, as he oiled about with his trembling fingers, he glanced up and caught sight of the engineer. "They work harder than they used to," he explained pathetically. But neither was deceived—the trouble was not in the levers. Oliver had noticed for a month the change that was coming over Dad. The dreaminess in the old eyes was slowly giving way to something very akin to pain. It was more difficult for him to straighten that extra inch as he went up the three steps of his porch in the evening. A few weeks later he fell twice on his way across the tracks to the little house, and the conviction was forced upon him that something must be done or the weakness that he kept so carefully hidden from Mary would reveal itself in spite of him. So the following afternoon the local passenger paused at the tower long enough to let off Dad's substitute and take on Dad himself in his scrupulously brushed other coat, with a pass in its pocket to Damascus Junction. "Some business that requires my attention in the city," he had told Mary, and she bade him good-by with a brightness which gave no sign that she had seen for many days that he was failing. Back in the parlor car of his train were "the Secretary" and "the boofer lady," but the old tower-man had no heart for fancies as he sat through the two hours' ride in the day coach on his way to a doctor's office.

Dad found himself adrift once more in the clamoring streets with his brain in a confused whirl. Everything frightened him—horses, trucks, autos, clanging cars, the whole hurrying life of the city; and through it all ran disjointed fragments of the sentence that had been passed upon him. "Operation—should have been done several years ago—only chance." The words had come to him as through a fog. Then, his own voice striving to be brave, "The cost, sir?" And that staggering blow, "Two hundred dollars!" Next he was out in the busy thoroughfare with the hazy memory of his reply, "Very well; I shall return to-morrow."

As he wandered on, scarce conscious that he was moving, he caught himself once or twice trying to calculate how long it would take him to save the amount out of his forty-five dollars a month. Then at the thought of seeking outside aid the troubled faded eyes flashed with some of the pride that he had not relinquished with the ending of those better days. He discovered a park bench and through half a summer's day sat trying to reconstruct his world, a wearied, bent, old man who turned over and over in his benumbed brain the hopelessness of his position. But gradually one thing grew out of it: Mary should not know. He would make a great effort to carry himself erect, to appear less tired when he came across the tracks at evening. Through will-power alone he would fight back the unseen hands that were daily drawing him down. But, even as he resolved, the pain and weakness gripped him afresh and he sat until far into the night before he was able to make his way to the obscure hotel that sheltered him. The next morning he was again at the four levers and four telegraph keys, and all that day he lived in a dream with a black shadow ever at his elbow. What would become of Mary without him was the question that recurred with increasing frequency, and as the hours wore past they brought no answer. He could not even know how much time he himself had left.

Big Crops and Prosperity

ON MORE than one occasion in the past, a big crop of cereals has done what all the statesmen and politicians, with their fine schemes and theories, could not do—it has put the nation on its feet and headed it toward prosperity. This is the fortunate situation in which we find ourselves to-day. As is shown in the report issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor, our crop this year is a bumper one, phenomenal in every respect. The total cereal yield of 1912, including corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye and buckwheat, aggregates 5,500,000,000 bushels. Potatoes, flaxseed and hay are big in proportion. The natural result of the abundance of foodstuffs is already making itself felt in a drop of prices which presages cheaper food for our people everywhere. Truly the hand of Providence is dealing bountifully with this nation. Not only is the farmer enriched, but every industry in the country will feel the stimulus sympathetically, and the great masses of the American people will find life less of a struggle than it has been for the last two years. Crops enough to keep all our railroads busy in moving them; to give employment for 2,250,000 men in the harvesting; to realize at fair market rates a total of between four and five billions of dollars, and to enable every worker's home in America to set a better table—these are surely things to be sincerely grateful for! As Thanksgiving draws near, let us remember with overflowing hearts the Divine bounty that has been showered upon us so liberally. And let those who have been gloomy take courage at the outlook for next year. God is good, and what he has so generously bestowed is but the harbinger of better things to come. We believe that there are grander and more prosperous times ahead than we have ever known, and if we go forward in faith and confidence, we shall realize them. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD congratulates its readers and the nation on these evidences of prosperity and blessing. And in this year of great things, let us not forget that it is the farmer who, under Providence, "feeds them all," and who is the backbone of our national prosperity. All honor to the American farmer!

An Opportunity for Service

WITH the outbreak of war in the Balkans, an opportunity is presented for Christian service in aid of the wounded, who are already beginning to arrive from the front in large numbers. A committee of ministers and citizens has been formed in Sofia, with Pastor Furnajieff, who is well known to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, as chairman. This committee, which is doing relief work on the field and in the hospitals, has cabled an appeal to the readers of this journal, inviting their gifts in aid of the work, which is purely humanitarian and which will be extended to the wounded, whether they be Servians, Bulgarians, Greeks or Montenegrins. In the past our readers have done noble service for Christ and humanity in Armenia, China, Japan, India, Italy, Finland, Cuba and other lands in times of great suffering. Any readers who may be disposed to respond to the appeal from the Christian people of the Balkans now engaged in a great struggle against Mohammedanism, can do so by sending their contributions to the "BALKAN RELIEF WORK," care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. All contributions will be forwarded to the committee in Sofia, Bulgaria.

"Greater Love Hath No Man"

THE name of "Billy" Rugh takes its place among America's heroes. The city of Gary, Ill., is making plans for a fitting memorial to the crippled newsboy, who sacrificed his leg to provide skin for a young girl who had been terribly burned, a stranger to him, but whose life he hoped to save. He saved her life, but lost his own. It is impossible to prevent the mind from recalling the great words that tell of the world's greatest sacrifice. There is no sacrilege in whispering, as we think with misty eyes of Billy Rugh: "He saved others; himself he could not save;" "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend."

Billy Rugh had been a cheerful soul. His newsstand was on a busy corner, and he did much more than sell papers. He gave away sunshine. He knew his customers and loved them; he knew of their affairs and interests. As he handed them their papers he asked them with neighborly cheeriness about their welfare. If he had troubles himself, no one ever knew of them. He wanted to help bear other people's burdens, not add to them by tales of his own difficulties. When he died, the mayor issued a proclamation announcing that contributions for a memorial were being received. Before the announcement was made, $900 which had been sent for his use before he died was turned over to this testimonial committee. A statue in Jefferson Park, a bronze tablet in the building at which he sold papers, an endowed room in the Gary General Hospital, have been suggested as possible forms for the testimonial to take. The mayor said in his proclamation: "The hearts of all are torn to-day when we realize this his act of noble heroism, his unselfish willingness to suffer that another might enjoy health and life, has culminated in the supreme sacrifice."

It seems useless to moralize about this episode. The challenge it lays before us is too distinct to be misunderstood. We must live as the men and women, the boys and girls ought to live who dwell in the land that was blest by the sunshine of Billy Rugh's life and that has been thrilled by the sad glory of his death.

The Nobler Choice

IN ONE of Olive Schreiner's strangely beautiful stories, there is the dream of a mother, who ponders the future of her child. She dreams that the bees that were flying about her head when she fell asleep are suddenly changed into strange winged beings, and one by one they approach her with promises for her child. One says: "I am Health, and if I touch the child, he will never know weariness or pain." Another says: "I am Wealth, and if I touch the child, he will never know poverty and want." Another says: "I am Fame, and if I touch the child, his name will not be forgotten through the ages." Another says: "I am Love, and if I touch the child, in the deepest dark when he puts out his hand he shall find another hand near."

Last of all comes one with deep-lined face and hollow cheeks, who can promise neither health, nor wealth, nor fame, nor love—but only the lack of these. Yet there is one thing which this last strange visitor can promise. It is that the child shall ever follow the ideal. Suffering and martyrdom may lie in his path, but unswerving fidelity to the right, as it is seen—to the light of conscience—to the ideal—shall be the pole-star of his life, and for reward, the ideal shall become real t

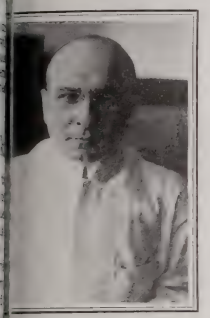
Wins Nobel Prize



Dr. Alexis Carrel

THE Nobel Prize for medicinefor this year has been awarded to Dr. Alexis Carrel, of the Rockefeller Institute, New York. The award was made in recognition of his achievement in the suture of blood vessels, and in the transplantation of organs. The value of the prize is $39,000. In his address before the American Philosophical Society at Philadelphia four years ago, Dr. Carrel

Educational Building

HE New York State Educa- tional Building was dedicated Albany on October 17. It is the first ding ever erected by an American State foreign country for the exclusive use of cational interests. It is under the con- of the State Board of Regents. The lding is of white marble, terra cotta, and k granite, is 600 feet long, 330 feet deep the center, and 190 feet deep on the es. The front consists of a splendid onnade. The cost of the structure was 500,000. One of the objects of the build- was to furnish a home for the State rary, which, unfortunately, comes too e for its intended purpose. The great which two years ago devastated what s perhaps, next to the Library of Con- ss, the most valuable collection in the ited States, robbed the State of price- s treasures, but emphasizes the wisdom, ugh belated, of the policy of placing the partment of Education in the adequate arate building which it sought long to ure. A portion of the building will be a mu- um. Distinguished men and educators from Eu- e and America were gathered for the exercises. Wednesday President Nicholas Murray Butler Columbia University said among other things: We must not overlook the fact that of all existing titutions of civilization which have had their ori- in the Western world the university is the old- , save only the Christian Church and the Roman v. It has seen the rise and fall of empires, the gration of peoples, the discovery of continents, d one revolution after another in the intellectual, ial and political life of man." Canon H. Hens- ley Henson, as the representative of Oxford and Westminster Abbey, spoke. Mr. Whitelaw Reid, Chancellor of the University of the State of New York, presided at the dedication Thursday and made an address. Governor Dix, in appropriate remarks, presented the building, and Mr. St. Clair McKelway, vice chancellor, accepted the building in behalf of the Board of Regents in one of his most felicitous addresses. The dedicatory address was deliverd by Dr. Andrew S. Draper, State Commissioner of Education. After referring the obligation of the cause to the past and its duty to the present, he made eloquent reference to duty to future generations. The Empire State could not have done a more important thing than to thus emphasize the importance of higher learning to the State. For it is the highest education which with a pure religion is the guarantee of the largest liberty, the strictest integrity, and the largest happiness and prosperity for the individual and for society. The building expresses the thought of the wise man:

Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding. (Prov. 4: 7.)

A Scene During the Dedication Exercises

Czar Fabulously Rich

THE Imperial Treasurer General of Russia claims that Emperor Nicholas is the richest man in the world. In his report to the emperor he said: "Your majesty need have no fear of ever coming to suffer the stings of poverty. Financially, you are solvency itself. With one hand you could buy out the American multi-millionaires, Rockefeller and Morgan, and still have sufficient in the other to talk business with Baron Rothschild. Or, if you prefer, you can take over the Krupps, although I would not recommend the investment." The Czar became very angry with Baron Menchikoff for his flippant and boastful report, and rebuked him for such undignified comparisons. The Czar's personal allowance is one million sterling. He owns land in Russia in Europe as large in area as the State of Nevada, the revenues of which reach $20,000,000 a year. The Czar's lands in Siberia bring him in another $7,500,000 a year. The emperor's income from all sources is $30,000,000 a year. Under a despotic form of government the Czar of Russia could naturally and easily secure great possessions for himself. Nicholas was angry at his Treasurer General, perhaps, because the government has so often to borrow money from other nations, and because it was neither a safe nor wise thing to advertise the wealth of a ruler to people who complain at poverty and oppression. The richest king of olden times is thus named:

And King Solomon passed all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom. (II. Chron. 9: 22.)

Balloon Champion Killed

THE other day Lieutenant Hans Gericke and Lieutenant Steler, accompanying him, fell from a height of three miles near Dresden, and were, of course, instantly killed. The supposition is that the balloon, being caught in a terrible thunderstorm, was struck by lightning and destroyed. Lieutenant Gericke was the champion of the international balloon races and was looked to as the one who would hold the cup for Germany in the races this year, and that he would be the man most likely to fly over the Atlantic if such a thing were possible.

This death calls to mind once more what has been called the "death reel" of motion pictures taken in St. Louis in 1910. Lieutenant Gericke is the seventh of the central figures in this picture reel to meet a tragic fate. The others are Arch Hoxey, Ralph Johnstone, A. L. Welch, Jacques Faure, Captain Schreck and his aid, Walter Brookins, and Alfred LeBlanc; the only other aviators shown have barely escaped the accidents of the air. Wisdom and caution as well as courage are necessary to conquer the upper air. The day of the accident the two men were trying for a record high flight, and it may be they took too many chances in attempting to climb above the storm and were shattered by the elements they defied. That which can be said about all persons can be said about the navigators of the air.

There is but a step between me and death. (I. Sam. 20: 3.)

Value of a Smile

THE will of Alice Johns Hodges of Chelmsford, England, was probated the other day, and was found to contain a bequest of $500 to Mrs. Walker, the wife of a bank cashier, for simply smiling pleasantly at the testatrix as they left the church together. Mrs. Walker explained, when told of the gift, that she remembers to have seen Mrs. Hodges at church one morning, and that she noticed something in her face that attracted her, and greeted her with a smile and a kind word, and chatted with her pleasantly at the church door. Oh, the value of a smile! What a wealth of happiness it gives to the one receiving and the one giving as well! How many a maiden has won a husband, a young man a bride, by a pleasant smile! How many burdens have been lifted from a heavy heart, and wrinkles taken out of the face of care, by a pleasant salutation! The simpering smile of the professional even can draw a good salary in many of the callings of life. But the genuine smile of the pure and loving spirit is a treasure beyond compute. The church is a good place for a smile, for a tender courtesy, and for a Christian love. There would be fewer withdrawals from churches, and a larger number of additions to the membership. and a sweeter sympathy, and a better growth, if there could be smiles and happy greetings instead of the frowns that chill and the cross words that wound. These are sure to interfere with the prosperity of the church, for there can be little brotherly love where they reign. The apostle insists that this Christian affection is a necessary evidence of true conversion.

We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. (I. John 3: 14.)

FAITH AND CONFESSION

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

PETER was most highly commended by the Lord Jesus Christ and a moment after most strongly condemned. Our natural question is, "What was the matter with Peter?" To answer this we must consider the surroundings. Jesus and his apostles were at Cæsarea Philippi, or near there. In Tristram's book, Land of Israel, we read: "The situation of the acient Cæsarea Philippi is indeed magnificent. Everywhere there is a wild medley of cascades, mulberry trees, fig trees, dashing torrents, festoons of vines, bubbling fountains, reeds and ruins, and the mingled music of birds and water."

It was an Eden of beauty that forms for us a setting of the story of the most sublime moment of Peter's life. We might almost say Peter was transfigured that day, for with "the suddenness of lightning" and "the graciousness of light" he uttered the divinest sentence that has ever passed mortal lips: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." He spoke better than he knew. The declaration was called forth by two questions asked by Jesus: "Who do men say that I am?" "But ye—who say ye that I am?" (This is the emphatic form of the original language in which it was spoken). These questions came after nearly three years of close association of Jesus with his twelve apostles. They had seen him cure all manner of diseases and raise the dead to life, and, too, they had seen the wonderment and the living gratitude of the people, as well as the vexation of the Pharisees; hence Jesus' first question, "Who do men say that I am?" Of course, Jesus knew what was in the thoughts of men without asking his disciples to tell him. This occasion is to be compared with that other time when a question of similar import was asked by John the Baptist in prison when he sent two messengers to ask Jesus, "Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?" (Matt. 11: 3). And Jesus' answer was: "Go and tell John the things which ye see and hear: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk," etc. The messengers were convinced, and they carried back to John most comforting assurance. But alas! all of the people who heard Jesus' teachings and saw his wonderful works did not have the clear vision that John's disciples had, and the apostles realized this, for they replied to Jesus' first question, "Who do men say that I am?" (What have you heard people saying about me?) in these words: "John the Baptist, and Elijah; but others one of the prophets." This was the voice of the multitude. It showed that they recognized Jesus as a great teacher, a great man, but that most had no understanding of his divinity. We must not forget, though, that some of the persons whom Jesus had healed believed that he had divine power.

Then followed Jesus' personal question to his apostles: "But ye, what do ye say?" Then Peter quickly became the spokesman for the whole company: "Thou art the Christ." We must know that Peter was speaking as a Jew. It was as if he had said: "Thou art the Messiah whom our nation has long expected, and we believe that thou art now ready to establish thy kingdom upon the earth." We seem to see the apostles by gestures and in other ways giving assent to Peter's words as expressing their opinion of Jesus. Some one has said: "If we could have seen Peter then, we should have seen him at his best." "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood (man) hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven," said Jesus to Peter. Also Jesus said: "Upon this rock I will build my church. I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." Those words of Jesus have been strangely misunderstood by some people, and the Roman Catholic Church has been founded on that misunderstanding. If the claim were true that body should fill earth and heaven, and there should be Christians of no other name. As to the "keys," some of the "old masters," with their wrong interpretation of Jesus' words, painted many pictures of Jesus handing a bunch of keys to Peter, making him the keeper of the keys. We doubt not that the original keys given by Jesus to Peter are to be found among the collection of "relics" so called.

In the rock foundation to which Jesus here likens Peter is no reference to the rock foundations to be found under all well-built churches, but rather to the principle that forms the base of the church, which is in the hearts of the people themselves, and is to be seen in their faith in Christ and confession of him. Peter seemed to be exemp ing this, and Jesus commended the expression o more than this, he set his seal upon it as the foundation of the church. Yet Peter spoke be than he knew; he is to be compared with the b man who, at Jesus' first touch, saw things, but not see them clearly, and not until Jesus' sec touch was he entirely cured of his blindness. know it was this way with Peter, because whil recognized in Jesus the expected Messiah, Christ of God, he did not see him as the Savio men. We must think this, because when Jesus most immediately after began to tell his apos about his imminent death on the cross, Peter s "Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall neve unto thee" (Matt. 16: 21, 22). Then it was J rebuked Peter, calling him "Satan." Peter's expression had been "the voice of the divine in human"; his second utterance was clearly the v of Satan in the human. Later on, after Peter received the Holy Spirit, and was led into whole truth, he not only saw J Christ as the Saviour, but tau men so, in the first sermon preached after that event (Act 22-37).

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for November 17, 1912. The Great Question. Mark 8: 27—9: 1. GOLDEN TEXT: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Matt. 16: 16.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—THE GREAT MAJORITY of Sunday schools are small Sunday schools in rural districts, where there are no public libraries save those of the Sunday school and few other social centers. In such cases the Sunday school should be made the center of the social life of young and old. Let each Sunday school have its vacation clubs, to play baseball or basket ball in the case of the boys, and tennis and croquet for both boys and girls. Let each of the older classes have a president and a secretary, and meet socially sometimes, but always with some address on Bible study or Christian work. Let religion be ever mixed with gladness and gladness with religion. The temptations of idleness are greater in villages than in cities, and a tactful superintendent can greatly lessen them by getting up the sort of "good times that don't go off with the having." Everywhere it is well to make the church the real center of its people's social life, but it is pre-eminently the duty and privilege of pastor and Sunday school superintendent to make it so in villages and farming communities where there is almost nothing else that is wholesome in social fellowship outside of the homes.

—IN THE CITIES, TOO, the Sunday school and church should be made as much as possible the favorite meeting-place of their members, not on Sunday and for religious purposes only, but for occasions of social fellowship, if only to do away with the idea that religion is a matter of stern solemnity. It is surprising with what a sad face some preachers read Christ's word pictures of religion as a wedding feast. One of the gladdest times in every Sunday school should be some evenings every year when the parents of Sunday school pupils give a reception to the faithful teachers who have worked without earthly reward and often in the face of many obstacles to do good to their children. Parents should gratefully express their appreciation for the help teachers are rendering, and hear suggestions how the home can co-operate with the school. It is surprising that so seldom parents seek any opportunity to thank the teachers of their children. Instead, they sometimes act as if they had put the church under obligation by sending their children to the Sunday school.

THE HOME DEPARTMENT of the Sunday school, as commonly conceived, is an arrangement by which those homes that are too remote, or whose members are too sick or too aged to attend Sunday school, shall be provided with lesson helps and encouraged to study the same lesson in their homes that is studied in the Sunday school. There is need of another kind of "Home Department" which shall insure lesson study in the homes before and after the lesson. Surely half an hour a week of religious teaching is neither a square meal or a "square deal" for the souls of our children, when they are getting thirty hours a week in "learn more, earn more" studies of the public schools. Let parents be expected to give daily religious teachings, preferably in a home worship schedule placed in their hands by church officers, and let them be made to feel that instead of Sunday school teachers relieving them of responsibility, the latter are but supplementing the main work at home, and giving pupils, in a class exercise, a weekly fellowship with persons of their own age. It is not enough to exhort parents to teach religion at home. They must be called to it and equipped for it with helps, as teachers are called and equipped.

—MR. FRANK A. FERRIS was for many years superintendent of the Fourteenth Presbyterian Sunday school of New York City. It was located in the East Side of the city, close to the tenement district, but it could not altoget be called a mission school. Mr. Ferris wa successful business man, and he carried his b ness methods into his Sunday school work. school became justly famous for its benevol financial system. A "Sabbath School Missi ary Association" was organized. The creed this association was (1) That every one sho help others to the Gospel; (2) That every should help as much as he can; (3) That ev one should find this work of helping oth very blessed and helpful to himself. The p ciple of action evolved was expressed in the lowing motto: "An offering from everyb every Sunday in the year." The items in secretary's report each week were: Attenda in main room —. Number of offerings omit in main room —. Attendance in primary ro —. Number of offerings omitted in prim room —. So faithfully was this plan carried that there would not average two omitted off ings on a Sunday. And this plan went on y after year—increasing in amount as the ha of systematic giving grew upon the schol and teachers. But emphasis was never l upon the amounts of offerings, but entir upon regular systematic giving.

MARRIAGE, FOR LOVE OR A HOME?

A DISCUSSION OF INTEREST TO BOTH SEXES, OF THE BASIS OF DOMESTIC HAPPINESS

A Girl's Problem

N THIS department in our issue of October 9 a young reader asked: "Is it ever right for a young girl to marry a man of fifty just for a home? He makes no pretense of loving me, wants a housekeeper. I certainly do not care him, but I need a home for myself and father. e were a young man, I could not love him."

he members of our Family Circle have shown ded interest in her problem and quite a readi- to give their opinion. Mrs. ——, Bingham- N. Y., writes: "It is never right for a girl to r into the sacred and intimate marriage rela- ship unless she has a sincere respect for the she weds. No woman can be happy or truly hful to wifely duties when she feels contempt the man whose home she shares. Nothing is e holy than marriage where hearts are truly ed by a love that is deep and abiding, but I ot if God ever sanctions a loveless marriage."

Ir. H. E. F., Richmond, ., says: "In such a , the woman sells her- for a home and de- des the name of wife, le the man acts as ty to the act. What ndation for respect on er side? Why should the woman find a sal- d position as a house- e p e r, and with her ney support her father? could expect little of a n too stingy to hire a sekeeper. Why invite ivorce later on? 'Better r the ills we have than to others that we know of.'" ere are more opinions. at they come from the ths of the hearts of ir writers is evident.

Dr. P., Atlanta, Ga., s: "Her question can answered in a sentence: en love does not always tify marriage, but mar- ge without love can be tified on no grounds atsoever."

A Father, of Granville, io, writes: "I sincerely y a poor girl who will nk of marrying an old n for a home. He ought be put in an insane asy- n. He cannot be a pure, d man. Her life would nothing but misery. ere ought to be a law stop such marriages. I ve a young daughter; I l see that she does not rry an old man."

Mother, Philadelphia, .: "I am the mother of girls. I have always vised them to marry for e and for love only. And e must be mutual. To rry a man who loves you but whom you do not e but marry for the comforts he can give, is in the sight of God, and he cannot add his bless- to such a union. Were I the young girl asking s question, I would do the right thing and trust God to find a home for myself and father in some er way. I draw my conclusions from the lives those whom I have known who married for homes housekeepers, and who to-day are not happy!"

Young Girl: "The idea! I answer without hesi- tion, No! I would not throw my life away to ase any old man. One old man to care for and e with is enough. My advice to her is to marry me one as near her own age as possible."

Man and Wife, Green Valley, Minn.: "Why must ey marry? Why can she not work for him for ges, keeping her father with her? If her father helpless, or nearly so, so that he cannot do any- ing to help around the place, her wages might not large, but probably more than she would get as is old suitor's wife."

Young Wife, Daytona, Fla.: "You say you do not ve him, never could, and he does not love you. ere you have the reason why you should not rry him. A wife must be miserable without af- tion for her husband. There is something wrong a man who proposes to marry a girl just for the work she can do. Take your troubles to the Lord in prayer. He will show you a way out, and it will not be through a loveless marriage."

A. M. H., Mankato, Kan.: "Had she stated that this man of fifty loved her, that would make some difference, but even then she would make a great mistake in marrying one she 'could not love even as a young man.' Indifference might soon develop into repugnance, if not hatred. Better send her father to one of the many homes for the aged—he ought to be more than willing to go rather than have her make this marriage; then she would have little trouble in finding a home for herself in some Christian family where she might make herself useful and a blessing; in which case the right man would find her soon enough, and she might take her father to a home based on love and right principle."

These answers are representative of many received. There are some that cannot appear on this page, for they open the doors on many a family skeleton in its closet and in one case even upon black, heartrending tragedy, the wreck of a home, the chaos that follows the setting at naught of God's established law. Others lead out into a whole new realm of possibilities with the suggestion, "What if that real love that is the rightful heritage of every human being should come in after years?" The alternatives now presented give us pause. On the one hand is the black depth of disgrace; on the other the wormwood-bitterness of renunciation. One comforting thing about all these letters is that in these days of rash marriages and quick divorce their tone—the nigh estimate in which the marriage bond is held—is reassuring. The emphasis laid upon "respect" as a necessary element to right relationship between husband and wife is to be noted. Respect is essential to the firm foundation of a happy home. Love without it may work shipwreck. Lover and beloved should seek as earnestly to command, to deserve, each the respect of each as to win each the love of each. Love between mates is not what it should be unless it includes respect. There can be no confidence without respect. And without confidence what house can stand?

Our young reader's problem is, however, a painful one. Her filial love is in conflict with what we may suppose to be her sense of duty to herself and this man of fifty. Now why, since he "makes no pretense of loving her" but "wants a housekeeper," can he not employ her on salary to fill that position for him, and allow her to bring her father with her? Were he the "brother of woman" that he ought to be, this should occur to him. Perhaps he has not thought of it because he has not been trained, as every man ought to be, to consider himself as "the brother of woman."

Many a time as I sit and spin
My thoughts are back in the golden past,
When the world before me was all to win
And my little children held me fast.

The children are grown and the house is still;
I am sometimes lonely but never sad,
For I sit and spin with a right good will,
For all my own are the joys I've had.

"Lights for the Bride!"

THE wedding is the main thing—not the social side of it. The sacredness, the solemnity, the tenderness, the sweetness of the marriage itself is often lost sight of in the fuss and feathers, the worry, the rush, and the strain of carrying through a big society event." "I know. That's why we're trying to have Ethel married as quietly and simply as possible. Only the nearest and dearest to witness the ceremony. But, when we count up the kin and his and her closest and most intimate friends, the house is full. Of course, about such an occasion, we don't want to wound or anger any." "Both have many friends; they are most beloved." "Oh, it is dear to think that so many eyes of love will rest on them in that supreme moment!"

The voices were low and intimate, reverent and affectionate; evidently the speakers were friends of long standing. Ethel's mother's friend was confirming Ethel's mother's purpose not to let Ethel's wedding degenerate into a "social function." Judging by the attire of Ethel's mother, the limousine depositing her at the tea-room door, and other incidentals, Ethel's parents were fully able from the financial standpoint to make such a function a "howling success." There was a certain something, a fineness of type as of the thoroughbred, about Ethel's mother that rose superior to clothes, automobiles, and other appurtenances of wealth—or, if you please, accepted them as mere graceful accompaniments to itself, and not as essentials; this something protested against suffering a marriage to sink into a display of riches and social power. The friend, of like type, but without the "accompaniments," was saying softly:

"I want to consult you about my present to Ethel. I never give a bride, that I care really and deeply about, anything that will break. Otherwise, I could select a little piece of cut glass that might express my feelings—that you and she and he would appreciate because it did. But it could break. How would a pair of silver candlesticks do?" "That would be charming!" "Lights for the bride and groom—two lights—old lights for a new home! My dear, you know that—except from the standpoint of sentiment—they can't need anything my limited purse can supply. I am going to give them something that money can't buy! I am not going to give them new candlesticks. I am going to give them candlesticks over a hundred years old! They were a bridal present to my great-grandmother. They sat on each side of the mirror in her bridal chamber; on each side of the mirror in my mother's, and in mine. They have shed light in three happy homes, homes that were at least true and consecrated and stable, even if they were not at all times and in all ways happy." The friends looked at each other with shining eyes, and their hands met under the tea-table. "My dear," said Ethel's mother, "there are two rooms full of presents already—a responsibility and a burden—and two detectives on guard. But if there were two houses full and more, there would be welcome and place of honor for your generous and gracious gift. These precious candles shall sit on each side of the mirror in Ethel's bridal chamber."

In the growing dusk up on the long swell of Bent Mountain the first of the specials bearing home the Templars from their conclave at Philadelphia swung swiftly past a little country station; polished hand rails gleaming and streamers waving from vestibules and rear ends—a train of luxury and beauty; a fleeting glimpse of softly-shaded lamps in the diners, dull-sided Pullmans, and red lights fading through the summer twilight. As they flashed by a siding a mile farther on, a boy paused in his idle kicking at the ratchet of a brakewheel on a coal-car on which he was perched to watch them in open-mouthed admiration. Then he resumed his worrying of the ratchet. He loosened a notch, found the next one easier, and the third still more so. Too late he discovered that the cars were moving. Slowly, ominously, half a dozen of them to which the one he clung was coupled, parted from a long string on the siding and rolled ponderously forward. The frightened youngster strove frantically at the brakewheel but could not undo his work. As he dropped to the ground and sped homeward in dumb terror the loaded gondolas rumbled and clacked over the switch-frogs out on to the main track, shot forward with increasing speed into the gathering darkness and were lost in it—unlighted, uncontrolled, rushing heavily, irresistibly down Heartbreak grade toward the crossing at D-X tower and the Templars' train ahead. It was as though the long black shadow of death had gone by on the whirlwind as they crashed past Argyle, ten miles down the mountain. The oil-lamps of the platform shone for the twinkle of an eye on the leaping shapes, and then there was only the echo booming back from the cliffs of Little River beyond. Before the telegraph could take up the cry to the derail at Youngstown the madly flying wheels had struck the switch-points there a score of blows so swiftly that they were as one quick and terrible hammer-stroke, and were gone, faster and ever faster, into the darkness.

The agent at Panola caught the frantic note in the brazen voice of the sounder and tore desperately up his little yard to meet and turn aside the oncoming coal. He stumbled as the rails began to whine aloud beside him, recovered himself, reached the switch-stand, and was hurled backward, stunned, breathless, appalled by the rush and roar of the grim passage.

It was at this time that the flagman on the special straightened up from placing the last of his tail lights on the rear vestibule, and caught a vague glimpse of the runaways across the neck of the famous Horse Shoe curve. Sprinting wildly through the sleepers, leaving a trail of curious passengers in his wake, he found the conductor, Pat Barnes. He only heard a dozen words before he was out of the end door of the car, and clambering over the coal in the tender to the swaying, jolting cab of the hurrying engine. Into the ear of the engineer he shouted words unintelligible to the fireman until the sudden forward leap and lurch of the great machine and the sight of Barnes's face in the glare as the fire-box door swung open gave unmistakable hint of their meaning. Pat dropped down from the driver's seat and held his hands cupwise that he might be heard above the tumult of the now furious running. "Hit her up, old tallow-pot!" he yelled through them to the fireman, "Hit her up! There's a coal train loose on the grade behind us! We gotter let it bump us gentle or there'll be millionaires scattered along the track from here to Atlanta!"

The fireman's acknowledgment was a lunge in the direction of the tender. Scoopful after scoopful he flung on the bed of raging flame in the firebox. He chained back the door that he might shovel the faster, and the sides of the mountains gave back the light that sped over them with the train's flight. The lean-faced engineer was half standing at the throttle, adjusting himself as best he could to the frightful dip and swing of the locomotive, looking back from time to time for a sight of the pursuers. The heavy sleepers behind lurched and shrieked on the curves, rocking and swaying drunkenly as they tailed the galloping engine. Chairs and water bottles overturned in the diners; women screamed in terror, and crew and passengers hung to whatever could steady them. The scenery flew past like the runaway film of a motion picture. Hills, cuts and tunnels arose threateningly, slipped violently aside, and disappeared in the trailing smoke and steam and the echoes of the yelling whistle ahead. Yet swiftly as they fled, the voice of the telegraph clicked on before them—calling, imploring, sounding appeal on appeal—that only buried itself impotently in the earth twenty miles above the D-X tower, for a careless operator had "grounded" the wire and gone whistling gaily home for the night. As yet the special's engineer did not dare to risk allowing the runaway gondolas to crash into the rear of his train until the relative difference in their speeds should be less, so on they swept in a wild and losing race.

The shadows lengthened across the fields. At the foot of the eastern hills the twilight began to unroll itself and the soft hush of the coming night fell over all the peaceful landscapes upon which Dad gazed across his levers, with misty eyes and aching throat. Down below he could hear the night operator getting his velocipede into the little storage room at the base of the tower. He was early, and the old man was very glad: he wanted now to make the most of the hours in the house across the tracks. Like a huge red disk, the sun dropped below the horizon and the dark came on. Along the creek bank the frogs began their chorus, a katydid or two took up their nightly chant, the instruments seemed to click with a drowsy tone, and the whole earth to be wrapped in peace and rest. A vagrant breeze stole through the windows and softly rumpled the gray hair—rumpled it as a boy's fingers had done long years since, and the old head went down on the table before it and the ache in the throat grew too great for silence.

Then pandemonium came into the valley. It began far off in the shadowy distance, deep and mellow, with the chime of a W. G. S. express engine in the highway crossing call.

"You need not come until Five is by," Dad called down to the other man. "I'll let her over." As he spoke there arose, growing swiftly in volume, the scream of a K. & O. whistle, now blending with, now rising above the great vibrant roar of a train running at its ultimate speed, evidently beyond all control. Again, much nearer, came the two long and two short blasts of the W. G. S. for the Bent Mountain road, followed closely by the four deep notes for the D-X crossing block. The old towerman hesitated, halting in uncertainty, then saw in one frightened helpless moment that the W. G. S. engineer had once more taken a chance and run by his signals!

The oncoming rush of the heavy trains was blotting out the songs of the frogs and katydids, shaking the ground and filling the air with their overwhelming tumult. In some mad dreams that seemed suddenly to seize him, Dad found himself diving for the red lantern that burned beneath his table. He threw it straight and hard across in front of the speeding locomotive of the express. Then sight went out in blinding, choking, sulphurous smoke that swept through the tower, while it rocked and reeled with the force of the thundering chaos below. Above the straining roar of

Number Five's engine, as her drivers went into the back motion with a scream of grinding steel, arose the sound of such battering of flying wheels on crossing-points as Dad had never known in all his days. In the midst of the smoke and dust and the incomparable uproar the old man found his hand on a lever, he knew not which, and a voice in his soul, swift and impelling, cried, "Pull!" And as the tottering legs partially collapsed beneath him, his weight sagged downward and backward on the handle and he swung out a thousand dizzy miles into darkness on the wings of a crash greater than all that had gone before.

Bit by bit the universe pieced itself together for the old man—began with a blazing flickering torch held near him, then strange anxious faces looking upon him, shouts heard above the roar of escaping steam, over all a star shining far up in the soft night. Slowly it came over him that they had brought him down from the tower and he was being supported between Oliver McCullough of Number Five and Pat Barnes of the K. & O. And he was startled at his recognition of them. Somewhere, eons ago, he had lived in a nightmare in which he had had to derail one of their trains, and since then he had been wandering for ages, seeking to know which it had been. He was very tired and he could not remember. He wished they would not bother him now. But the crowd pressed about him, wringing his hands, saying words that mingled with his troubled thoughts and made all things incoherent. He became vaguely aware of a woman's crying near him. Beyond the first row of encircling figures a bride clung openly to the tall young fellow whose arm was about her protectingly, and Dad wondered dimly why she did it. A fat man with two fat tears furrowing down his big face was passing his hat through the crowd in silence—for the American instinct to express itself with the pocketbook had already asserted itself—and again Dad wondered why. Silver clinked in the hat, was smothered under bills both green and yellow, and clinked again as it was showered in. The hum of talk began to take on a definite meaning to the old man. He caught a phrase here and there which was like a galvanic shock to his returning consciousness.

"Never heard of such a thing before!" a bearded knight was declaring excitedly. "The neatest piece of work I ever saw in all my days of railroading! Look at the old fellow now—you wouldn't think he had had that much nerve and decision in his whole life together; but good railroaders come done up in strange packages sometimes! No, sir; it beats my time how he could let our train over with hardly a split second to spare, get the W. G. S. across behind us with just grazing our observation end, and then catch the coal cars with his derail in time to put them in the ditch all safe and ready for kindling wood!"

Dad was still bewildered, shivering a little with weakness and excitement, when the fat man brought the overflowing hat to him, and, without a word, thrust it into his hands. He swallowed hard once or twice, then blurted out: "Take it, take it; it's the least we can do. I wish it was a million hats full; I've got a kid back here in the New Orleans car. Take it! I'm making a—a—fool of myself! Where's my—handkerchief!" And the portly one departed hastily. But Dad made no move.

"Please accept it!" pleaded a woman in deepest mourning; "and this ring with it. It was my husband's. He would have been glad for you to have it."

A traveling man gathered the bills in his hand that he might cram Dad's pockets full with them, but the old man would not let him. He knew now that being thrust upon him was that which could change the numbing words of yesterday from a sentence of doom to a message of hope; and yet he would not. Again the shadow was at his elbow; but a spark from the old deathless pride shone in his eyes. He tried to draw himself up very straight.

"No," his tremulous voice began. The pop-valve on the locomotive shut down with a snap, and above the muffled throb of the air-pump his words rose very clear. "I cannot take this. I—I thank you." Deeper than ever, at the finality of his refusal, the shadow hung; but once more he said it: "I thank you, but I cannot."

Then, in the quiet that followed, he turned, with a faint groping movement of his hands, and began to walk slowly away through a lane that opened in silence before him—so little, so hopeless, so weary—and yet so proud!

In the rear of the crowd there was a stir, and it parted before a big sunburnt man from the last Pullman, who had halted at its outer edge for one moment's keenest scrutiny of Dad. Behind him came "the boofer lady"—for it was "the secretary." In a few hurried steps he had overtaken the old man and his hand fell upon his shoulder.

"Father!" There was no other word—just that huskily, brokenly. And then the faces, the torches, the panting engine and the past horror all faded—and there was only the race-old story of the prodigal and his father.

Not until the deep mellow notes of the whistle floated back to them from far ahead did they know the trains had gone.

Then gently the big man disengaged himself. "It's all right now, father," he said chokingly. "It's all right. I've gotten rich down in South America. I've tried every way to find you. And now I—we—are going to try to make it all up to you." He turned to where "the boofer lady" was frankly wiping her eyes, though her lips were smiling. "Here," he added softly, "is the daughter that I have brought you."

"I am very glad and very proud to welcome you, my dear," said Dad, with a return of his old courtly manner, as he kissed her. Then, as though the years had dropped away, he said simply: "Come home, children. It's late and your mother will be waiting for you." And between them the old man went back across the tracks—to better days.

THE BEE PLAGUE

WE KNOW that the wild flora and fauna are quite as subject to parasitic diseases as are the domesticated creatures and things about us. It is, however, very certain that as man's protection increases the power of resistance to enemies decreases. The more finely bred an animal or a plant becomes, the less is its power of resistance, and diseases that would be thrown off without serious harm in a state of nature, become speedily fatal under artificial conditions. In a wild state the bee is wonderfully prolific, and although not exempt from disease, its enemies are usually the larger predatory birds and beasts. For many years the apiculturists of Europe have been plagued by a bee disease known as European Foul Brood. Despite the most careful quarantining, this disease has been introduced into this country, where we had already a bee plague of our own known as American Foul Brood. Last year the latter has been so destructive that 800,000 bee colonies have been wiped out, causing a crop failure of nearly one-half the value of the bee crop in 1910, which was set down at $32,000,000. The Department of Agriculture has issued a bulletin telling how to treat the bee plague. This should be in the hands of every bee-keeper.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

works perfectly into any kind of dough

Pastry, as you know, requires a dry dough worked very little. Crisco combines so readily with the flour that the crust is unusually flaky, tender, light and crisp.

Biscuit dough also should not be worked very much but it must be wet. You can mix Crisco with the wet flour as easily as with the dry. It makes the biscuits delicious.

In cake making, Crisco creams with the sugar more readily than butter. It gives you the smoothest, richest, most evenly textured cake that can be made.

Send for this Booklet

It tells why Crisco makes better foods at less cost and gives tested recipes showing the best way to use Crisco for frying, for shortening, for cake making. The Procter & Gamble Co., Dept. S, Cincinnati.

Get Physics in your Pen—and it Won't Leak

YOU can't stop the leak in a fountain pen with caps, plugs, or patent screw joints.

Build the pen by a simple law of Physics and there won't be any leaking and smearing.

The reason ordinary fountain pens leak is that the ink in the feed tube won't all run down when pen is in vest pocket position. Some ink always hangs up in the straight feed tube.

When the heat of the body—98 degrees—heats the air in the pen, the air expands, pushes up through the inky feed tube, and drives the ink up and out, spawling it all over the writing end of the pen to smudge your fingers when you remove cap to write.

This touch starts Capillary Attraction. That Capillary Attraction sucks the ink down and out of the Parker feed tube before the warm expanding air goes up. Of course, when the air goes up in the Parker, no ink goes with it.

Thus do you see how the science of Physics keeps the Parker Pen from leaking?

Parker Pens write smoothly, for they have 14k gold pens tipped with hardest Iridium. They never blot or skip because the Parker Spear Head Ink Controller keeps ink from flowing too fast or too slow.

Parker Lucky Curve Fountain Pens $2, $2.50, $3, $4, $5, and up, according to size and ornamentation.

Should any Parker Pen leak or not write, return within 10 days, and dealer will quickly refund. We protect him from any loss. If your dealer doesn't handle Parker Pens send us his name. We'll send you complete catalog to select from.

NEWS FROM GARRAWAY MISSION

FROM Cape Palmas, in far-away Liberia, Africa, comes a report of the year's work at Garraway Mission. Miss Anna E. Hall, superintendent of the mission, writes:

"This has been a very busy year. In fact, it seems that each year that comes is the busiest one. Last week we had our examination, and most of our large boys have gone to cut rice and help their people, while the others here are clearing the farm, doing a little coal tarring and painting. When not sewing the girls are busy on their farm.

"We have had a full school, boys and girls whose hearts have been touched. You may be sure we were anxious to have a wire fence around the mission lot to keep out the bullocks, and then a good house with iron roof.'

"The large number of new boys and girls coming to us has greatly increased our need of scholarships. A man brought his daughter to us recently and said: 'This my girl. She want to do mission fashion. She trouble me plenty to bring her here.' We told him that we had our number; but he continued to talk and the girl begged. She was about twelve years old. I asked why she wanted to come to mission and if she had a husband, or was she sold. She replied that she had neither been married nor sold. We finally agreed for her to stay.

The First Recruits for the Garraway Mission, 1912 have them accept Christ as their personal Saviour. When we grew earnest about the matter and were fasting and praying, one day the dear Lord honored us with his presence and power, and twenty were converted. The good work has continued until all of our family is saved with the exception of two.

"We are glad of the interest that is being manifested over at our Po River station. In the next few weeks, the Lord willing, we are to build at Trembo and also at Genoyoh. At the last-named place we had a gift which enables us to build a good house there, mud walls with roof of zinc. We are to build a thatch-roofed house for the present at Peddeh. The call continues to come to us for help. "Give us teachers." We dare not attempt any more new stations until we get good houses on the ones already opened. The most of our houses now need new roofs, the old thatch is spoiling. One of our native workers, who was down to visit us Tuesday, said: 'My heart can be pleased when we When she got up to go down we saw that she was lame, and that was why her mother's husband—not her own father—was so willing to have her come. Of course she wanted to come, and has seemingly been very happy here. She has also been converted. It is not so easy to marry off or to get pay for the lame or deformed girls. But Jesus accepts all, and we are glad to help her and trust that she may make a good, useful woman.

"Let me again thank the dear friends for their gifts to the work. We ask for their continued interest. As the work grows our needs increase. We are now in need of fifty scholarships and support for a number of our workers. We can feel very much more at ease now that we have a good wire fence around our place and have the town bullocks shut out. A saucy one was around, and the boys said he was vexed about our new fence. We hope in the near future to hear from many of the friends who have helped us in this work so well planned by the late Miss Agnes McAllister."

Answered Prayers

THERE is a suggestion in this letter of a spirit which is quite likely to get results in prayer. W. L. N. of Birmingham, Ala., writes: "I beg to acknowledge a direct answer to prayer, which I certainly did not deserve." That sounds like the right sort of humility—the humility which makes the kind of a life God can bless. Here is another open secret: "How he . . . straightens out all our business tangles when we try to do his will!" So writes a lady who sends in an acknowledgment of prayer answered. It is true, indeed, that

> The favor he shows
> And the joy he bestows
> Are for those who will trust and obey.

G. W. D., Boston, Mass., writes: "Twice in the last four months my prayers have been answered by the recovery of dear ones from illness, for which I wish to express my gratitude to my heavenly Father." A Reader, Ontario, Calif., declares: "Many times when the way has looked very dark, God has helped me out by means entirely unthought of in answer to prayer, for which I give him praise." "The Lord has answered my prayers; a wandering boy has come home and a child is regaining her health in answer to prayer," writes a grateful mother. A reader from Maryland testifies: "God does answer prayer. I have had many prayers answered when the way seemed dark." A CHRISTIAN HERALD friend, Pittsfield, Ill., writes: "I am thankful to God for his mercy and goodness in answering many prayers for me when there was no hope any other way."

Here is another mother's testimony: "God heard and answered my prayers. He knows the anguish of a mother's heart, and I praise him from whom all blessings flow." Mrs. T. L. B., Topeka, Kan., writes: "I know that God hears and answers prayers. I have been wonderfully led in his ways."

Other acknowledgments of answered prayer have been received from:

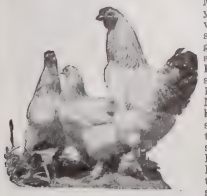
$13,400.31 on the Side



Mr. F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., in the past twenty-five years has cleared $13,400.31 from hens. This is a remarkable record, when it is known that Mr. Dunlap is employed ten hours a day in a store and all the time he has to put in with his hens is what he can get morning, noon and night. This $13,400.31 was all made on the side. Nor does Mr. Dunlap get fancy prices for what he has to sell. He ships to Boston, and takes current quotations from the commission men there. Mr. Dunlap began in 1887 with twenty hens. In 1910 his poultry profits figured out $1188.05—and this is all on the side. Mr. Dunlap's hens have bought him a beautiful home, purchased a horse and carriage, sent three boys to school and college, besides saving something for a rainy day. Can others do equally well?" Sure thing," says Mr. Dunlap, "if they will wear out the soles of their shoes faster than they do the seat of their chair." The story of Mr. Dunlap's success and his methods is told in the book, "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping," and it is only one out of a score of things to set the blood tingling and make one resolve to get next to the $600,000,000 spent in the United States each year for poultry and eggs.

$1,009.31 R. A. Richardson of Haverhill, Mass., a shoe cutter, made his hens pay him $1,009.31 in 1910 and kept working at the bench at the same time. How he did it is told in "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping."

"SIDE-LINE POULTRY-KEEPING"

is the name of a new book by the author of "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen," the most popular poultry book published. "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping" deals with the business side of poultry keeping as the other dealt with egg production. It tells how to make poultry keeping pay. It describes the methods by which F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., makes over $1000 a year from eggs, devoting not over two hours a day to his hens. Not a detail left out. The book tells how to make a start, what breeds pay, how, when and where to buy a farm, how to make a living from the first, describes the most wonderful brooding system in the world, tells how to build the most economical poultry houses and trap nests, how to feed for best results, describes a feed that can be made for 15 cents a bushel and is without a peer for producing eggs, how to make money with geese, ducks and market gardening, how to fan and sell to advantage, how to pick out the laying hens, how to get down eggs so that they will keep a year, etc.

Invaluable to every man who wishes to make money on the side, and indispensable to the man who is looking forward to the free, independent livelihood of the egg producer. Nine hundred pages, illustrated. Price 50 cents, postpaid. With the American Poultry Advocate one year, 75 cents; two years, 90c. Send stamps and book for $1.00, or cash as a premium for two yearly subscriptions at 50 cents each. Our paper is handsomely illustrated, 44 to 124 pages, 50 cents per year. 3 months' trial, 10c. have almost realized the fulness and elevation of inspiration itself. In your sublimest moods, when earth fades into a fleck hardly to be seen, and heaven crowds itself in noble fellowship upon your soul, the whole man is lifted up in an ecstasy divine. When you are inspired, you have the keys. And no man can take those keys from you so long as you realize the inspiration; everywhere the inspired man keeps the keys—in merchandise, in statesmanship, in philosophy, in adventure, in religious thinking, in Christian civilization, you cannot keep down the inspired man. It is as if Christ had said: 'This is the very wisdom of heaven, and therefore I say unto thee, the keys are thine.'"

Carey carried the "keys" with him when he went out to India to establish the great missionary movement. Morrison had a "key" in his possession when, more than one hundred years ago, he went as the first missionary to China. Livingstone carried a "key" with him to Darkest Africa; so did Bishop Taylor; so did Henry M. Stanley. Judson had a "key" when he went to Burma to preach the Gospel. Dr. Paton was in possession of such a "key" as he went to the New Hebrides. How the bunch of keys would increase if we should name all who have gone on similar errands!

Peter lost his keys only for a little while; he regained them on the day of Pentecost, and then the other apostles had keys too, for they, too, had their share in preaching the Gospel to the multitudes that gathered. Strange were the keys, but they worked well, for they spake with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance, and, though they were Galileans, they spoke in the languages of the Parthians, Medes, Elamites, Egyptians, etc. A "key," then, is an opportunity to do good in the name of Christ for those who are in need of his salvation and consolation.

The story is told of a child to whom an angel came, holding out a key, and saying, "My Master sends thee his love and bids me give thee this." "What is it?" asked the child. "The key of all the winds," the angel said, and went away. "Now," said the child, "I will stop the cold north wind with this key," and he listened and seemed to hear it going quickly away. "Now," said the child, "I will stop the hot south wind," but before he had turned the key he thought of the beautiful flowers that bloom because they are touched by the south wind. He thought of the green meadows where the lambs may play; he thought of the showers of rain that the south wind brings to fill up the brooks and rivers so that all living things may have water to drink, and where fishes may have homes to live in. "No," said he, "I think I had better not turn that key." And while the child was wondering what to do next with the key, the Lord Jesus himself stood by, and gently reached for the key, and took it from her, and put it in his girdle. And the child asked, "Dost thou keep the key of the winds?" And he answered, "Dost thou not know that my kingdom ruleth over all things?" "Over all?" asked the child. "Yes," he replied, "and your only safety is in everything to love, trust and obey."

A Successful Defense

—IN REPLY TO an accusation made in some of the New York daily newspapers that the dwelling-house property owned by the corporation of Trinity parish of the Episcopal Church in New York City was occupied by undesirable tenants, Rev. William T. Manning, rector of the parish, recently published a letter in the New York Times. Dr. Manning refuted the accusation and referred to authoritative documents in such fashion as to leave no doubt as to its falsity. One of the papers which had printed the mistaken statement immediately acknowledged its fault in an editorial on the subject.

Heinz Baked Beans

The Name "Heinz" and the Word "Baked" On the Label Are Double Proof of Real Quality and Real Baking.

THE United States Government forbids the use of the word "Baked" on the label of beans that are not baked.

But the word "Baked" is never omitted from a tin of Heinz Beans.

It's oven-baking that develops the full, rich flavor of Baked Beans. It is oven-baking that drives out the excess moisture and concentrates the nutriment.

Heinz Baked Beans are baked, like pies and biscuits, under direct heat.

That's why they offer such perfect flavor, so much more satisfaction than beans that are simply boiled or steamed, as are most of the brands sold in tins.

Slices of choicest pork and rich tomato sauce give added snap and savor to Heinz Baked Beans. There are four kinds to meet every taste:

Heinz Baked Beans with Pork and Tomato Sauce

Heinz Baked Pork and Beans without Tomato Sauce (Boston Style)

Heinz Baked Beans in Tomato Sauce without Pork (Vegetarian)

Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans

Other delicious Heinz Food Products are Heinz Preserves, Jellies, Tomato Ketchup, Tomato Soup, Peanut Butter, Spaghetti, Pure Vinegars, etc.

EVER SO MANY GOOD THINGS

DEAR COZY CORNER BOYS AND GIRLS: When I came back to the big offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this morning such a nice visit among the tiful Berkshire Hills of New land I found my desk so heaped delightful letters from old Cozy er friends and new that it will me some time to answer them; nwhile I want at this earliest pos- moment to bid our new friends a n and happy welcome and to as- you each and every one of a long y and personal letter very soon. ill have a beautiful Cozy Corner cot souvenir for remembrance and ard enclosed, and once again I t to thank you older members for he nice new friends you have in- uced to us.

he souvenir consists of four rming art cards. If you have in- uced at least three new friends to Cozy Corner and have not re- ed the Mascot souvenir, write and me and I will carefully look into matter for you.

ifts and prizes, souvenirs and let- are going out very briskly ou all every day, and I feel sure t each Cozy Corner member who written recently to us, sending d, publishable work, interesting ers, or the names of new friends, oing to hear from us in some de- itful way.

And here is a suggestion which I think is

A Very Clever Idea

IN a nice homey letter to the Cozy Corner, Mary Marshall tells us that last year on Thanksgiving day she selected many beautiful turkey feathers from the tail of their Thanksgiving turkey and made charming Christmas gifts of them. "I dyed them," Mary goes on to say, "just as though I were coloring a ribbon or a bit of cloth. I then bought inexpensive gilt holders to slip on the quills and hold the nib, and you would be surprised what really bright and attractive Christmas gifts they were. Every one to whom I gave a turkey feather pen prized it highly.

"For my little brother and my nephews I made Indian bonnets out of chicken feathers dyed in brilliant colors. I sewed the feathers to a piece of canvas three inches wide and one and a half yards long: this allows for the headpiece and a long feathered end to hang down behind. To cover the cross stitching on the stems of the feathers I sewed a double strip of turkey-red cloth the whole length of the war bonnet, which holds the feathers firmly in place. No expensive gift which I might have bought for the boys could have delighted them half as much as did those homemade Indian war bonnets."

The Way Paint Dries is Important

You know how kerosene and other similar oils dry when spread out in a film; they just evaporate. Some oils, on the other hand, scarcely dry at all; they stay soft and gummy. A good paint oil must dry hard and yet make an elastic film. Linseed oil is the only oil, so far known, which is satisfactory in all respects for general outside and inside painting use.

But it must be pure. And right there is the big reason why we decided to put up linseed oil in sealed one and five-gallon cans—put it up absolutely pure, just as it is pressed from the flaxseed. We guarantee its purity with our "Dutch Boy Painter" trademark, just as we do the purity of our white lead. When you buy or specify and have them mixed to suit the conditions of your buildings at the time of painting, you have done all that anyone can do to ensure a satisfactory job. Nothing else quite equals "Dutch Boy Painter" made-to-order paint.

The season most favorable to painting is late Summer or early Fall. The paint anchors a little better into the wood, then, and dries a little more thoroughly—two items that count big for protection against rough weather.

Now is the logical time to paint indoors also. White-lead your walls and put on one of our artistic stencils, here and there. That's the way the most elegant homes are finished. It will make yours dignified, durable, beautiful and sanitary.

Ask for "Painting Helps 144" which will give you some convincing facts and information. These "Helps" include our stencil book with a hundred choice designs for high class decoration, from which you may order at half the art store prices.

Questions and Answers

O. M., Topeka, Kan. Where is the dryest and where the wettest sections in the United States?

The dryest region is what was formerly known as the "great American Desert," now comprising the southeast of Nevada and northwest of Arizona; the wettest areas are in the North Carolina mountain regions and in Florida.

H. C., Honduras, C. A. 1. In Num., chapter 22, verse 28, we are told that Balaam's ass spoke to him. Is this an Eastern parable, or not? 2. In the Gospel according to Mark (chapter 6, verse 18), John the Baptist told Herod that it was not lawful for him to have his brother's wife. Was Philip dead?

1. There have been many discussions concerning this passage. Some have held that as dreams and visions were the frequent methods by which God made himself known to the prophets, therefore Balaam's experience was a vision. Others have argued for a literal interpretation of the passage as a miracle. One authority (Dr. Jortin) explained it on the belief that Balaam fell into a trance and in that state conversed first with the beast and then with the angel. In any case it was a supernatural experience which, like others of the same class, is not to be explained by natural means. 2. Herod's wife and Herodias's husband were both alive and the parties were within the forbidden lines of blood relationship, Herodias being the daughter of Aristobulus, the brother of both Herod and Philip.

S. M. H., Watervliet, N. Y. Some years ago, I received a book with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which has been a great comfort to me during the dark days. It is Bogatzky's Golden Treasury. Will you please inform me who Bogatzky was?

Karl Heinrich von Bogatzky was a German writer, born in Silesia in 1690. He studied theology and became a great spiritual teacher and soul-winner. He wrote many books of hymns and devotional exercises. His Golden Treasury is the best known. He died in 1774.

R. B. F., Hampton, Va. 1. Will our sun and moon and earth and the stars we see eventually pass away? 2. Is there any certainty that other worlds are inhabited? 3. What will be the ultimate fate of the universe?

1 and 3. Your first and third questions may be answered simultaneously, though in a final analysis the third does not admit of an answer. Sun and moon and earth, planets and stars and all the visible universe in the course of æons shall become cold, dead masses and finally dissolve; but, since science tells us matter is indestructible, their disintegrations may help to build up other forms, to keep up the cosmic order in an eternal round of revolution. Astronomers tell us there are many old stars nearing dissolution (such appear red), and it is supposed that new ones are in process of formation from the nebulæ of space. However, it is futile to wander in the paths of groundless and fruitless speculation. He who called worlds and stars and systems into being by his word still holds them in the hollow of his hand, and it is for us to bow down and adore without questioning the why, the wherefore or the whence. 2. We have no absolute evidence that there are inhabitants of other worlds.

E. R., Sr., Homestead, Pa. Please explain Matt. 5: 33-37.

This was meant to condemn the use of swearing in common intercourse, frivolous oaths and meaningless adjurations such as were common in those times, and which were a sin, even if they did not profane the Divine name. It is evident, however, from other passages in Scripture, that it did not refer to sacred vows and pledges or oaths made for a righteous and proper purpose. For all the occasions of everyday life the simple "yes" and "no," without any asseveration whatsoever, is sufficient to establish the truth or untruth of our statements.

E. P. H., Denver, Col. The prayer of the heart, even if it should not find expression at the lips, will be acceptable. It is natural, however, to give expression to our feelings in words, and in the moments of deepest emotion the language flows to the lips, seeking audible utterance. Silent prayer has its proper place in our devotions, but it cannot satisfy the soul that is reaching out in great earnestness for divine help in its extremity.

F. S., Cleveland, O. What are the churches doing to look after the young people who are constantly flocking to our great cities? Who helps those who find themselves without money there? Could the churches do more than at present? Could they not provide inexpensive boarding houses for the young and inexperienced?

This very suggestive letter deserves careful consideration. Individual churches make some effort to look out for the young strangers in the city, but there is surely a need for a more comprehensive and vigorous campaign in this direction. The Travelers' Aid Society, whose work was described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 12, 1912, is doing a great work on the right line. The plan that must be adopted sooner or later by all the religious organizations, including the churches, is not to wait till people who are in need come for help, but to go out and look for those who need help. The plan of church boarding houses might work exceedingly well. Too much credit cannot be given to the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. for their magnificent work in this matter. Besides supporting lodging and boarding institutions themselves they keep lists of good places to which they direct strangers. If the young people would make it a point to go directly to the headquarters of these associations or to some minister they would receive cordial assistance. Your last point is also very well taken; young people should be urged to wait till they have some funds, both of money and experience, before coming alone to the city to try to make their way.

T. B., Augusta, Me. In addition to her navy, has Japan any merchant vessels?

Yes; of late years Japan has developed a large merchant marine and has a very important company engaged in the Transpacific trade known as the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, which means "The Oriental Steamship Company."

Canadian. In our prayers we should never get beyond Christ's words and spirit when he said: "Nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." The only time we have a right to insist upon having our own way is when we are absolutely sure that what we want is what God wants. Certain things are revealed very clearly in the Scripture and sometimes we can be sure that what we are asking is a thing God wants to grant. But in the ordinary affairs of life our most serious concern should be to find out God's plan; and in our praying we should earnestly try to cultivate a frame of mind in which we are eagerly desirous of glorifying Christ and advancing his kingdom, rather than getting a gift that we happen to want for ourselves. Rest for soul and victory in life are found in the "sweet will of God."

G. W. S., Duck Hill, Miss. Deut. 8: 4 relates to one of the many miraculous provisions by which divine providence cared for the Israelites during their desert sojourn. Most commentators interpret it to mean that they were so abundantly supplied with everything needful that there was no lack. See also chapter 29: 5, which bears out this interpretation.

R. C. B., Bismarck, N. D. 1. What will remove grease stains from brass? 2. What will remove rust from linen and white goods? 3. How can paint brushes be cleaned on which the paint has become hardened?

1. Try a solution of potash or concentrated lye. 2. Put a teaspoonful of oxalic acid in half a glass of water and wet the rust spots with the mixture time and again until they disappear, then sponge with weak ammonia. 3. Soak the brushes in linseed oil for a day or so, then rinse them out in hot turpentine. A strong solution in hot water of soft soap and washing soda will also be effective.

S. M., Allentown, Pa. Had the Titanic sunk at a great depth, say over 30,000 feet, is it a fact that the density of the water would have kept her from reaching bottom?

No; the confusing of density and pressure gives rise to such an idea. Of course, at a great depth the pressure is tremendous, but the density, that is, the weight per cubic foot, is but slightly increased over what it is at the surface. The Titanic would have reached bottom no matter where she went down.

By an interchange of words in our issue of October 9, the composition of the Sixty-second Congress was given as 228 Republicans and 162 Democrats, whereas the order should have been reversed.

F. F. F., Oshkosh, Wis. 1. How should we understand the "curse" on the barren figtree? (Mark 11: 21.) 2. Can we love our neighbors as ourselves? 3. How shall we manifest such love?

1. This whole episode is one of the many indications in the New Testament of a characteristic in Christ which has not been sufficiently emphasized either in art or in Christology; that is, his sternness. There is no necessity for attempting to apologize for his action in this case, to explain it away, or to minimize it. The fig-tree gave promise of fruit to those who passed along the way; but it had no fruit. It had not carried out the plan of nature; it had not done the thing for which nature made it. A fruit-tree that will not bear fruit is in the way; if there is any hope for making it fruitful it might be spared; but if it will never bear fruit it has no right to a place on the ground. So Christ, the ruler of nature, punished it by destruction. His act here is like his words about salt: "If the salt have lost its savor . . . it is good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men" (Matt. 5: 13). Aside from this actual and direct punishment, there was, of course, in our Lord's words and action a great lesson which he wanted his followers to master. It is perilous to profess or to promise what is not fulfilled; souls and nations will be judged, like the tree, not by what they pretend to be but by what they are. There was also the great lesson of prayer and faith. His followers were to be given the same power he had to produce, through faith, any result required for spiritual victories. There is a striking insistence of kindness in our Lord's words about forgiveness, immediately following his stern judgment upon the tree (Mark 11: 21-26). 2. It is certainly possible to love our neighbors as ourselves. Entirely aside from religion it is a common thing to see one person loving another even more than himself, as a mother loves her child, or a man his brother. If this is so without the help of religion it is surely true that when a soul loves Christ supremely it will love other people for whom Christ died, and love them in a self-sacrificing spirit. 3. This love should be manifested in service for others. A Christian should train himself to think more of the comforts and pleasures of other people than of himself; he must constantly look at them with the eyes of Christ and try to do for them what Christ would do if he were here in the flesh.

M. L. F., Schenectady, N. Y. 1. In a recent issue you stated Sirius was the brightest star; how can I locate it in the heavens? 2. What is the next brightest star, and where can it be found?

1. Look to the south for the constellation Orion, which can be detected by seven brilliant stars, four forming a quadrilateral, in the middle of which are three collinear stars known as Orion's Girdle or Belt, and sometimes called the Three Kings. In a direct line with these three stars towards the southeast is the blazing Sirius, bluish white in color, lying in the constellation of the Great Dog. This constellation rises in the evening at the end of November, passes the meridian at midnight at the end of January and disappears from our horizon toward the end of April. 2. The next brightest star is Arcturus in the constellation Boötes, which is in the form of a pentagon and may be found by following with the eye the turn in the tail of the Dipper or Great Bear. This constellation has only one star of the first magnitude, Arcturus, which can be readily distinguished by its beautiful golden yellow color.

A. M. P., Peoria, Ill. Where is the longest stretch of railway in the world without a curve, and what is its length?

In New Zealand, where there is a line of railway a part of which stretches for a distance of 136 miles in a perfectly straight line. This fact is remarkable when it is taken into consideration that New Zealand is one of the most difficult countries in the world for railway construction, as it is very mountainous, necessitating sharp curves and very heavy grades.

J. M. A., Chicago, Ill. What was the Pauper's Bible and why was it so called?

The Biblia Pauperum (Bible of the Poor) was the title given to a manuscript Bible Manual or Picture Bible of the thirteenth century. It was prepared for the use of the children of the poor. It contained forty or fifty pictures of incidents in the life of Christ and of Old Testament events, with texts or sentences in Latin. The earlier copies were written by hand, but after the discovery of printing, the Biblia Pauperum is said to have been the first book to be printed with wooden blocks and afterward with types.

Mrs. N. S. H., Los Angeles, Calif. Who was the author of the hymn "How Firm a Foundation"?

It was first printed in 1787 with the initial "K" as the only clue to the authorship. Thomas Kirkham, Caroline Keene, William Kingsbury and George Keith, a Baptist layman, have each been mentioned as the probable author. It first appeared in a small collection of hymns published in London and edited by Dr. Rippon, who was father-in-law of Dr. Keith. Beyond these facts, nothing certain is known concerning its authorship.

I. P. M., Milligan, Tenn. Explain the modern method of teaching deaf-mutes as exemplified in the case of Helen Keller.

The method employed is that known as the Bell method of visible speech. The characters of the alphabet on which this system is founded are intended to reveal to the eye the position of the vocal organs in the formation of any sound which the human mouth can utter. Articulation is learned by the deaf-mute as a set of movements and sensations in the organs of speech. It is taught by pointing out to the pupil the positions of the lips, teeth and tongue in pronouncing the vowels and consonants by making him feel with his hands all the perceptible movements and vibrations of the throat and other organs which are requisite for their pronunciation, and by using diagrams, etc. He is then required to imitate those positions and to force a quantity of air from the lungs sufficient to produce the sounds, and is taught to read the articulations of others by observing the position of the organs and the countenance.

"PROUD AND GLAD"

Because Mother Looked So Well After Quitting Coffee.

An Ohio woman was almost distracted with coffee dyspepsia and heart trouble.

Like thousands of others, the drug—caffeine—in coffee was slowly but steadily undermining her nervous system and interfering with natural digestion of food. (Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the poisonous drug found in coffee.)

"For 30 years," she writes, "I have used coffee. Have always been sickly—had heart trouble and dyspepsia with ulcers in stomach and mouth so bad, sometimes, I was almost distracted and could hardly eat a thing for a week.

"I could not sleep for nervousness, and when I would lie down at night I'd belch up coffee and my heart would troub'e me. It was like poison to me. I was thin—only weighed 125 lbs., when I quit coffee and began to use Postum.

"From the first day that belching and burning in my stomach stopped. I could sleep as soundly as anyone and, after the first month, whenever I met any friends they would ask me what was making me so fleshy and looking so well.

"Sometimes, before I could answer quick enough, one of the children or my husband would say, 'Why, that is what Postum is doing for her'—they were all so proud and glad.

"When I recommend it to anyone I always tell them to follow directions in making Postum, as it is not good to taste if weak, but fine when it has the flavor and rich brown color." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

HOW A DEBT WAS REPAID

BY REV. C. H. MEAD, D.D.

But all through the mountains, thunder-riven,
And up from the rocky steep,
There arose a glad cry to the gates of heaven,
"Rejoice, for I've found my sheep!"
And the angels echoed around the throne,
"Rejoice, for the Lord brings back his own!"

FROM a rich baritone voice came the song ringing out on the frosty air of the late October morning, and the hills and valley, catching the words and melody, sent back in triumphant echo—"Rejoice, for the Lord brings back his own." The hoarfrost on the grass was like burnished silver under the touch of the rising sun that sent its golden beams to brighten the green and yellow and crimson and brown and purple leaves, and made the trees look as if they were festooned with rainbows. One could almost hear them whisper, "Rejoice, for the Lord brings back his own." The song and nature seemed blended in a harmonious whole.

Around a bend of one of the hillside roads appeared the singer, tall and strong and magnificently proportioned, his face beamed with health and happiness and carrying in his arms the sheep for which he had spent hours of the night searching. The animal was trembling with cold, and, it may be, with a fear of a well-deserved punishment. The man looked at it with a smile and said: "You poor, foolish sheep, why did you wander away? Did you think the rocks and stones on the bleak hills were more nourishing than the green grass in the valley? Did you think you were safer among the wolves than with your comrades in the sheepfold? Why did you turn your back on your shepherd, who never turned his back on you? Did you think I would not miss you, and would fail to seek for you? If so, you do not know the love of your shepherd for his sheep. I wonder—" Here he paused as he discovered a man standing near one of the buildings—a young man, showing plainly the marks of dissipation and riotous living. He looked him over and then asked:

"Who are you?" "What, me? I am nobody." "Where are you from?" "Everywhere." "Where are you bound for?" "Anywhere." "Where do you belong?" "Nowhere." "Do you want employment?" "I would be glad of a job if I could only get away from my present boss, for whom I have worked faithfully for two years." "And pray, who is your boss?" "Satan." "Does he pay good wages?" "Good wages? No. Big wages? Yes." "What kind of wages?" "Hunger enough for a dozen men. Rags, desolation, shattered nerves, ruined character, and a burning appetite for the thing that wrought my ruin."

The shepherd dropped his head in deep thought and said to himself: "I've spent half the night in trying to rescue a four-legged sheep. Dare I drive this two-legged one from my door, and make no effort to rescue him?" Looking up, he said to the tramp, "You look to me as if you could eat some breakfast; how is it?"

The tramp was evidently moved by the kindness of the tone of voice in which the invitation was given. He straightened up and said: "Thank you, sir. I am very hungry, but I am not deserving of such kindness."

"Young man," was the reply, "I never turned a hungry man from my door, and I never will, so long as my name is Robert West." At the mention of the name, the young man gave him a startled look and turned pale. Bracing up, he said, "I appreciate your kindness and accept your invitation gratefully."

After putting the sheep in the fold with the others, he led the young man up to the house where Mrs. West stood in the doorway to greet her husband, of whose coming she knew when she heard a half hour before the welcome news, "Rejoice, for the Lord brings back his own," ringing out through the valley. After both men had washed they sat down to the table, on which was a tempting breakfast. Robert West and his wife very sweetly and reverently asked the morning blessing.

While Mr. West gave his wife an account of his experiences in his search for the lost sheep, their guest ate his breakfast as only a hungry man can eat, yet with a manner that showed the breeding of a gentleman, and it was plain to be seen that he was thinking as well as eating, and thinking, too, with a purpose, as tears trickled down his cheeks.

When the meal was over, the host read from the fifteenth chapter of Luke, the parables of the lost sheep and the Prodigal Son, and offered up an earnest supplication for the wandering ones, and prayed for divine guidance for them all to do the right thing in the right way. During the prayer, the young man, kneeling with the others, was deeply moved, and at its close when Robert West and his wife sang, "Rejoice, for the Lord brings back his own," the wanderer sobbed aloud. As they finished singing, the young man arose and said, "By some strange chance I came to your door this morning, a prodigal, one who is a pauper clothed in rags, a bankrupt in character, burning with an appetite for the cursed drink that has made me what I am, and yet, at your hospitable board, you have treated me as an honored guest. Nearly two years ago I turned my back on a beautiful home, closing my eyes to the appeal of a Christian father and mother, trying to drown the memory of the prayers at that family altar, only to find myself at the end in another Christian home, and bowing at another family altar. It was while at college I learned to drink, and though I graduated with the highest honors, I had gained also a consuming appetite. I was a slave, and every effort of parents and friends failed to break the chains that bound me until at last I fled from those who knew me best and loved me most. For nearly two years I have tramped hither and thither with the shadow of my wretched self falling on the path ahead of me, until this morning, bowing at your family altar, I acknowledged my sin and put my trust in him who has promised to "save unto the uttermost" the "whosoever" sinner. Sir, the desire for drink has left me, and the shadow of myself is behind me since I have turned my face and heart to the light. I said it was a strange chance that sent me to your door, but in that I was wrong, for it was a divine Providence that guided my steps hither, and it was his will that you should be the one who should bring back to the fold this wandering sheep, as well as the one you brought back earlier this morning. Do you wonder why? I think you will understand when I tell you that my name, for which you have not asked, is Robert West Beatty."

At the announcement of that name Mr. and Mrs. West, down whose cheeks the tears were falling like rain, started forward in surprise, and Mr. West exclaimed: "Are you the son of my old college mate, Frederick Beatty?"

"I surely am," was the reply, "and my father named me after you in memory of his college chum."

"Then it surely was God who sent you here to enable me to pay a debt of gratitude I owe your father."

"I never heard my father say anything about your owing him anything."

"Probably not; but listen now to my story. Fred Beatty and I entered college together and soon became the closest of friends. Like you and many another foolish young man, I began taking a social glass in society. One evening I returned to he rooms which

Get a California Farm Be Independent in the San Joaquin Valley

There is no other similar area under the Stars and Stripes where earnest effort will bring such tremendous returns. You go into a finished country, needing only intelligent work to bring fortune—independence to you and yours.

Go now and buy this land. It is settling fast and the prices are steadily advancing. You still can buy small farms of ten, twenty or forty acres, with water for from $125 to $150 an acre. This same land, planted to alfalfa, will sell for from $200 to $300. Can you make money faster? But, once established, you won't sell. This alfalfa will bring you $40 to $70 an acre if you sell the hay. If you feed it to dairy cattle, hogs and chickens, your returns will be at least $100 an acre.

And fruit—for this is the home of fruit—is making fortunes every year.

Go out and investigate. The Santa Fé sells round-trip homeseekers' tickets to California and elsewhere in the Southwest on the first and third Tuesday of each month—only $65 from Chicago.

Write to-day for our two books, "The San Joaquin Valley" and "What California Means For You" — both Free. Just send a postcard to

It was early in December when bert West, unknown to Bob, sent a g letter to his old college chum, ederick Beatty. He said nothing out Bob, directly. He wrote of ir old college days, and then said, ve been greatly prospered, and e long wanted you to come with ur wife and pay me a visit. The receipt of that message caused bert West to sing more than ever his work, and his wife more than er at her work, until Bob found mself singing at his work, while the mily altar was "Beulah Land" to all ree. The company soon arrived, and when the greetings were over, just as they were about to sit down to the table, Bob was heard coming down the stairs, and Robert West said: "Fred and Mary, here is my Christmas present—the other sheep I found that October morning." As Bob opened the door, Mrs. West said to him: "Here is your Christmas present, Bob." Who can describe the joy of that reunion? The sheep that was lost was found again, while

GILT-EDGED

SEVEN per cent.! How goodly!
And cumulative, too!
Preferred, full paid, and, goody!
Just offered to a few!
Not selling on the market:
A rare commodity!
And common stock for bonus!
Gilt-edged security!

A little pile of savings
Laid up for rainy days,
And drawing four per centum,
In good old-fashioned ways,
Within the safe deposit,
But think of that and this!
Gilt-edged! preferred! and seven!
Too good, by far, to miss!

The little safe deposit
Account drawn out of full;
A happy, hopeful lambkin,
A tiny bear or bull;
A dividend in money,
Or two, or three, at best;
And then a gay receiver
To gobble up the rest!

Gilt-edged? Of course, and printed
In green, and red, and gold,
A charming little picture
For one to have and hold;
All signed, and sealed, and legal,
According to the rule,
A picture of the parting—
"His money, and a fool!"

YOUR SIGNATURE

THE ordinary woman needs to be cautioned against signing her name to a contract or other document without knowing precisely to what she is pledging herself. "Sign here," a woman is told, it may be by a member of her family, a house agent or somebody else with whom she is having a business transaction. She sees a blank space and she writes her name. Later, she may discover that she has become responsible, to her embarrassment, in the settlement of claims to her own loss. One's signature, whether appended to a personal letter or written at the direction of another, has in it a quality of permanence, and may rise in judgment against one long after the ink is dried and the act forgotten.

Always insist upon reading anything that you sign. Be satisfied that your signature stands for that which your judgment approves.

A word may be said as to the legibility of a signature. Dozens of people write plainly and legibly until they reach the page where they sign their name. The signature trails off vaguely, vowels and consonants running into one another until the unfortunate individual who receives the letter is puzzled to ascertain from whom it has come. A woman who receives a great many letters from the outside public is sometimes compelled to paste the signature of a correspondent on the envelope that carries back her reply to an interesting letter. She has decided upon this plan as the only peaceable way of saving herself from misunderstanding and of lessening the burdens of the officials in Washington who open and return dead letters.

As a rule, you should sign your name in full at the close of every communication sent through the mail. There are exceptions to this, as to every rule, but they are few. In the correspondence passing between married people it may be sufficient to sign a letter, "Your devoted wife," or "Your adoring husband." Generally speaking, it is a better plan to write one's name, inclusive of both Christian and surname, without abbreviation, to the friend or relative or business person addressed. Simply to write "Alice," "Kittie," "Madge," or "Bessie," is not enough. In these days, young girls frequently write a similar hand, and there may be several Kitties and Madges in one's acquaintance, so that confusion ensues, particularly if the full post office address is not given.

One's signature should be characteristic. We remember the bold and striking penmanship of some of the brave men who signed the Declaration of Independence in a day when their signatures whirled defiance across the sea and involved a tremendous risk to themselves and their descendants. We recall with pleasure the bravery of Charles Carroll, who added "of Carrollton" to his name lest it should be a menace to another if his identity were mistaken.

We may never be called upon to sign our names amid conditions of peril. Still, in the most trivial affair it is worth while to remember that no one knows what may happen to-morrow, and to be impressed with the uncertainty that besets human life. We should think twice before placing a signature at the end of a letter written in exasperation, annoyance or resentment. Wait until to-morrow, and observe from its distance the thing that has vexed you to-day before committing yourself to a statement concerning it in writing. Be careful, too, about giving letters of recommendation or of personal introduction to those who are strangers. Many women have no hesitation in signing certificates of character for maids who have not been satisfactory as employees in their homes. This is an infraction of honesty and an obvious bit of cowardice.

POEMS EVERY ONE SHOULD KNOW

DON QUIXOTE

BEHIND thy pasteboard, on thy battered hack,
Thy lean cheek striped with plaster to and fro,
Thy long spear leveled at the unseen foe,
And doubtful Sancho trudging at thy back,
Thou wert a figure strange enough, good lack!
To make Wiseacredom, both high and low,
Rub purblind eyes, and (having watched thee go)
Despatch its Dogberrys upon thy track.

Alas! poor Knight! Alas! poor soul possest!
Yet would to-day, when Courtesy grows chill,
And life's fine loyalties are turned to jest,
Some fire of thine might burn within us still!
Ah, would but one might lay his lance in rest,
And charge in earnest—were it but a mill!

AUSTIN DOBSON.

Don Quixote, written by Cervantes as a satire upon the extravagant romanticism of his time, makes an appeal to the sympathetic reader of these modern and materialistic days quite different from that originally intended by the writer. The Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance and his doughty squire no longer excite extreme risibility. While we perforce smile at the incidents of the story, our sympathy subconsciously goes out to the earnest but ineffectual idealism of its protagonist. In the sonnet quoted above Austin Dobson has voiced the feeling many of us have experienced upon reading this wonderful book.

NIGHT AND DEATH

MYSTERIOUS Night! when our first parent knew
Thee from report divine, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperus with the host of heaven came,
And lo! creation widened in man's view.

Who could have thought such darkness lay concealed Within thy beams, O Sun! or who could find,
Whilst fly and leaf and insect stood revealed,
That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind!
Why do we then shun Death with anxious strife?
If Light can thus deceive, wherefore not Life? BLANCO WHITE.

This sonnet was first published in an English periodical, called the Bijou in 1828, and was at first credited to Samuel Taylor Coleridge. This mistake arose from the fact that it was written by Joseph Blanco White, and dedicated and sent to Coleridge, among whose papers it was found and selected with certain of Coleridge's own verses for publication, by one of his friends, to whom he had turned over his papers. It is to be doubted if any sonnet in the English language compresses within its fourteen lines such range and wealth of imagination. This is one of several instances in the history of literature where an author's fame rests upon the merits of a single poem.

ILLINOIS POORHOUSES

THE title of "poorhouse"—suggestive of misery, adversity and ill-luck—is being abolished in Illinois through the work of Mrs. James Fesler of Rochelle, Ill., secretary of the Auxiliary Board of Visitors for the State Charities Commission. Mrs. Fesler began her campaign in her home county and there were no more official references to the almshouse or the poorhouse. Instead it was the "county home." Several other counties were induced to make the change and soon Mrs. Fesler hopes to make her campaign Statewide. The State charitable institutions of Illinois are taking care of more wards than before, so that now the title "county home" is suggestive of the residents—homes for the aged, infirm and unfortunate who are of good character and in genuine need of help.

Mrs. James Fesler

THE OLD HOME REVISITED

MANY were there to meet the train
That drew up to the dear old place.
I recognition sought in vain,
For I was changed in form and face.
I made my way through the glad throng
That gathered there, loved friends to greet,
And hummed a merry old-time song
As I passed up the village street.

All seemed familiar, and yet strange
And unaccustomed first to me;
Not even Time had paused to change
The scene from what it used to be.
I saw, in glow of sunset fire—
Where oft I'd worshiped, not alone—
The church whose high ambitious spire
O'er tall encircling maples shone.

The dear old homestead came in view;
The short cut through the fields I took:
That was my brother there, I knew—
He let me pass with scarce a look.
But hardly had I reached the door,
My mother came, with tear-filled eyes,
And cried, "My son is home once more!"
And kissed me, in joy's sweet surprise.

Warm was my welcome, glad, sincere,
Receiving me in home's snug nest;
There were my brothers, sisters dear,
And mother, always first and best.
There was no father there to meet,
To grasp my hand, and bid me stay—
'Twill be to me remembrance sweet,
He blessed me when I went away.

On Sunday was a sermon heard
From the good preacher I had known;
The singing of the children stirred
Other full hearts besides my own.
And going home, how proud was I,
With feelings I could not define,
Beneath the quiet Sabbath sky,
To walk with mother's hand in mine.

In looking back to happy years,
I tried their story to retrace;
I saw, but through a mist of tears,
The cherished old familiar place.
And dear dead days could haunt me still
With joys that long had gone before:
Ah, could we choose our lot at will,
I'd leave the old, loved home no more.

BECKER FOUND GUILTY

SHORTLY after midnight on Friday, October 25, the jury, which tried Lieut. Charles Becker of the New York police force for planning and instigating the murder of Herman Rosenthal, brought in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. Justice Goff had begun his charge to the jury at 10:35 Thursday morning, concluding at five minutes of two. Counsel for Becker made numerous exceptions to the charge, which were noted in the record before the jury retired at twenty minutes past two. They were taken out to luncheon, and at four o'clock began their deliberations. There was much tense excitement throughout the city when it was known that the jury was at the work of preparing the verdict. In a sense, it was the whole city that was on trial. Was it to be found capable of sifting truth from falsehood in such a tangle of crime and of placing the guilt where it belonged?

Counsel for Becker insisted that the charge of Justice Goff had been virtually a charge to convict. He claimed, however, that he had merely called attention to the items of evidence presented and to the law covering the case. He acknowledged that the backbone of the testimony for the prosecution was the testimony of Jack Rose, who had engaged and paid off the gunmen. He said that the jury must decide whether or not his testimony was credible. They were to take into account the character of the man, but they were also to consider his manner on the witness stand and his ability to stick to his story throughout three hours of examination and seven hours of cross-examination. Also they were to ask themselves if a man of his mentality could invent such a story, and for ten hours keep its details consistent under such circumstances. He pointed out that the law which formerly made the instigator of a crime merely an accessory before the fact now makes him a principal in the crime. Another technical point was the value of evidence presented by accomplices. This in itself is not sufficient to convict, but must be supported by other evidence. Justice Goff held that Sam Schepps was not an accomplice, as no evidence tended to connect him with the crime before it was committed.

The battle of the lawyers in summing up on Wednesday evening was dramatic in the extreme. Attorney John T. McIntyre spoke for Becker and Assistant District Attorney Frank Moss for the people. Mr. McIntyre held that the testimony of such characters as the chief witnesses could not be reliable, and made insinuations against the District Attorney's office which Mr. Moss vehemently and skilfully resented. Altogether eight hours were consumed in this historic legal duel. Becker received the verdict with stolid calmness. Mrs. Becker, occupying an apartment adjoining the court room, collapsed upon receiving the news. Davidson, the slayer of Jack Zelig, will be tried before the cases of the gunmen who are accused of the actual killing of Rosenthal are taken up.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE AMERICAN BOARD of Foreign Missions, Boston, has received information to the effect that a famine prevails in South Africa. The area affected is about 250 miles inland from the port of Beira, in Rhodesia, and bordering on the Sabi River. Last season there was almost no rainfall and consequently no crops. This season the rains are holding off so long that there is little prospect of relief for three months at least. From the urgency of the news received, it is believed that many thousands are suffering. It is desired to send help as soon as possible to relieve the situation. The missionaries are doing all they can to save life, but their means are totally insufficient. The ordinary heathen African is generally so poverty-stricken and makes so little provision, except for immediate needs, that continued drought brings great distress and mortality among them. This characteristic is partly due to indolence on the part of the heathen and partly because of superstitious beliefs. It is valuable to note that the Christian community suffer far less than the heathen around them. It is estimated that one dollar will buy enough grain to save the life of one native.

—THE IMMIGRATION Restriction League of New York, at a special meeting on August 16, resolved to unite with the Guardians of Liberty, "with its full membership of 126,000, and that separate Courts be formed throughout the State of New York, other than those already organized by the Guardians of Liberty."

—MEDICAL MISSIONARY J. H. ROMIG, of Kodiak, Alaska, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD informing us that the contributions raised by our readers for the sufferers by the late volcanic upheaval in that region were worthily used in helping cases of real distress and physical suffering. Several of these sufferers were young children. Some were badly burned by the volcanic ashes and lava, and some were partially blinded. The patients were treated at Pioneer Hospital, Seward, the Kodiak Orphanage, Wood Island, and the government hospital, Juneau. Dr. Romig says much good has been accomplished through our readers' timely gifts.

—REV. T. HUCKERBY, a Methodist minister of San Fernando, Trinidad, B. W. I., will be glad to receive from any reader of this journal good Christian literature, especially Bibles and Testaments for use in his field, where he has given eighteen years of service in Gospel work.

—REV. C. A. COLLETT, of Khargpur, India, calls our attention to the fact that the illustration in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 17, entitled "The Juggernaut on the Temple Wall," is a picture of "Hanumanji," the leader of the monkey tribe, who aided Ram Chundra in a war against Rabana, of Ceylon, for the recovery of his wife. Rabana had stolen Ram Chundra's wife and carried her off to his own domains. In the war which followed Ram slew Rabana and brought his wife, Sita, home with him. For the aid given by Hanumanji he receives a special worship. No image of Jagannath is ever kept outside of a temple. Dr. Collett adds: "The government passed a law several years ago that the car must arrive at its destination within the same day on which the journey is begun. This was done to prevent the unnecessary delay of the pilgrims in Puri, where cholera invariably breaks out within a few days after their arrival, and because it is too much of a task for the police to control the mob so long a time."

—SAMUEL L. ADAMS, a lawyer, of Halifax County, Virginia, and well known on account of his long connection with the State Sunday school work and the Anti-Saloon League of Virginia, writes us in regard to the announcement of the death of Dr. Wray Beattie, of Newark, Ohio, published in these columns on August 7. "Some ten or twelve years ago I frequently spent Sunday in the city of Washington and attended Sunday school and church services at the Metropolitan Methodist Church. In the Sabbath school I was usually a member of the class taught by Dr. Beattie, who I am sure must be the same individual who has lately gone to his reward. He was an earnest Christian teacher, and always brought to the class a good-sized bundle of CHRISTIAN HERALDS and other religious newspapers, which he distributed to members of his class after the lesson was over, especially to the strangers or visiting members of the class. Some five or six years ago I happened to be at the same Sunday school in Washington on the day that he made a short farewell address, stating that by reason of age and infirmity he would depart within the next few days for his home in the West; since which time I have often thought of his clear expository remarks on the Scripture and his benignant countenance."

—MORE THAN ONE HUNDRED secretaries and experts of the volunteer, student, and foreign departments of the Y. M. C. A. met in conference with John R. Mott at Northfield, Mass., from September 1 to 15. Among the most notable leaders present were Count Moltke, the John R. Mott of Denmark, Dr. Julius Richter, the great specialist on missions from Germany, Rev. Arthur Rugh and Mr. F. M. Brockman of China, Mr. George Gleason of Korea, Rev. J. Ross Stevenson of Baltimore, Dr. Harley Smith of Toronto, John B. Hurrey of South America and F. P. Turner of New York, the general secretary of the Student Volunteer Work. A new feature this year was the language class taught by Mr. Thomas Cummings, a missionary from India. Mr. Cummings has been teaching the first principles of Oriental language study to several recruits who are soon to go to the foreign field. Mr. Mott, with several associates, sailed on October 5 for a world campaign among the student centers of the world. They will visit the large colleges and schools of learning in the Orient and attend several conferences in connection with the work of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference, and will be absent from this country about two years.

Announcement

On or about December 1 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will publish The Pictorial Life of Christ. For twenty centuries famous artists have vied with each other in depicting the Wonderful Story of the Life of Jesus on earth. It would be futile to offer another series of pictures describing scenes already so well portrayed, unless something distinctly new and different had been done. A new master of art has arisen—a Prince of Sculptural Artists. For six years his genius has been devoted to illustrating the Gospel narrative of Jesus' earthly sojourn, and the result, now given to the world in eighty-two remarkable plastic pictures, has excited the wonder and admiration of connoisseurs on two continents. This already famous Italian Master-Sculptor, Domenico Mastroianni, has "imbibed the very spirit of the Holy Land." In his scenes, every figure stands out with vivid distinctness and almost startling clearness of detail. The characters, postures and surroundings are those of Nazareth and Jerusalem. We see the Saviour himself—a commanding figure of royal dignity blended with divine pity, yet withal intensely human—"in all things as we are."

An Entirely New Art Creation

These magnificent pictures are not paintings. They are something finer. The originals are combinations of sculpture and sculptural reliefs done in wax and clay and wonderfully grouped and photographed in such a way as to bring out in sharp contrast the lights and shadows and perspectives. The resulting photograph is something absolutely and entirely different in the history of art. There is a depth of space realized in looking at these pictures that you have never known in looking at a drawing or painting. Throughout all the pictures there is a reverence, an atmosphere of worship in the treatment of these themes, which is instantly appreciated. Never has the artist lost sight of the fact that his task was a sacred one. His work will be an inspiration to all who view it in this book. Splendid as a triumph of art, these pictures are priceless as the highest tribute that consecrated genius can pay to the greatest subject the artist could have chosen. He has brought us into intimate touch with the daily life of Jesus and shed a flood of radiance on the Life and Mission of the Saviour of men and brought them before us in vivid and realistic portrayal.

The Text and Binding

In simple, attractive language, the story of the life of Jesus is told by the Rev. Ira S. Dodd, who has adhered faithfully to the narrative in the Gospels. He is a lucid and sympathetic writer and gives us a clear conception of the social, religious and political conditions in Galilee during the time Christ was upon earth. No expense has been spared in producing a book worthy in every respect of these wonderful pictures. The binding is an extremely handsome design in gold scroll work with combination of red and gold letters upon the side and back of the cover, which measures 7x10 inches. This splendid volume will instantly attract attention wherever shown.

The Site of Ancient Lystra as It Is To-day

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

LYSTRA THE FICKLE

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

Types at Lystra

WHEN actually following the footsteps of St. Paul from Iconium to Lystra, I felt that I was more completely in the atmosphere of St. Paul's time than in almost any other part of our long journey. Not only have the physical features of this part of Asia Minor remained the same in the changeful yet unchanging years, but the character of the people; ther mode of cultivating the soil; the houses in which they live; their ignorance, superstition and fickleness, as will be seen from the succeeding story, all remind us that the people of to-day in the territory of ancient Pisidia are essentially the people of two thousand years ago, even though the modern abitants have sprung from a different stock. n America changes in the customs and habits of the people so sure to come, that the only certain thing is the cerity of change. A desert to-day is a populous State torrow. A barren, absolutely uninhabited lake front at the inning of the century is a city with millions of inhabitants its close. In this oldest part of the Christian world, howr, where we are traveling, it takes a millennium to produce changes of a century in other lands. What changes one are for the most part changes for the worse rather than for the better. ns of degeneration rather than of evolution are noted on every hand. The endid Roman roads have become re cart paths or impassable reminisces of splendid highways. The great dges of solid cut stone are so mase that they are often still used, as y have been for two thousand years, , in other places, one must ford the eam over which the Roman chariots, with their prancing horses, rode in umph. Unless one sees, as in Icom, mosques and colleges of the noble iod of Mohammedan architecture, cities which in Paul's time were ed for their magnificent marble temes and gymnasia and palaces and thers, now contain little besides mean vels of mud and stone, with possibly ew mosques and Greek churches of a enerate type.

Yet, in spite of these changes for the rse, one can seem to breathe the very nosphere of St. Paul's times when in se latitudes, and especially when on journey from Konia to Lystra, for region, then as now, was largely upied by a rude, semi-barbarous ple. Upon them the Romans and Hellenists of the more populous towns in ancient times looked down with a supreme contempt.

The Doorway of Seljukian Mosque

Our first days in Konia had been warm and sunny, for though it was still February there was a promise of the coming spring in the air. But the day that we started for Lystra was threatening and gloomy. Soon the snow began to fall and the dull, leaden sky and rising wind gave promise of a heavy storm. But our time was limited, and we must see Lystra then or never. Besides, it seemed altogether more Pauline to endure some hardships and perils, and so we started in the same direction, and perhaps through the same street by which he left the city which had treated him so inhospitably. How Paul journeyed we do not know; whether on foot, on horseback or donkey back. Very likely the latter animal, humble though he was, was pressed into the apostle's service, for on this road to-day one meets many travelers astride the patient ass. Our equipage consisted of two large Turkish wagons for the five people who were to make the journey. These wagons are called arabas, and are admirably fitted for the rough roads of Asia Minor. Their springs seem absolutely unbreakable, and well they need to be, for our road will take us through deep sloughs of mud, over the crests of a low range of mountains, where the only pass is strewn thick with boulders; across the rocky beds of ancient rivers, and through living streams with a very uncertain bottom.

in Modern Lystra

There are no seats in our arabas except those that we make for ourselves with our bedding and boxes of provisions. Our horses are not thoroughbred racers by any means, but they are strong and willing, and into their manes and tails are braided blue beads to keep off the "evil eye," while around their necks are strings of the same evil-eye beads, which are also worked into the harness in various parts of the araba. These blue beads, sometimes decorated with a rude imitation of an eye, indicate a universal superstition of the East. If any caravan could thus be guarded from evil, ours was surely safe from harm. One of our araba-jis, or drivers, was a Greek with a long brown scarf wound around his head. The other was a Turk dressed like a kavass, with much gay embroidery about his person, and some murderous-looking but harmless pistols thrust into his girdle.

The Old Roman Bridge at Lystra, Now Impassable

THE PARK BENCH ROW

Drawn by F. J. Cassavant

LADEN down with load of sorrow, day by day and year by year,
Is the dreary park bench in our crowded cities far and near,
Till the breast of earth is tortured by this load of human woe
Centered in the hearts of thousands drifted to this wretched row.

Sparrows flit from post to pavement, happy in their humble lot.
Squirrels sometimes scramble gaily for the crust of careless tot.
Children riot at the fountain,—life to them is very sweet,
But the souls are dead that witness all this gladness at their feet.

Breaking hearts and bitter mem'ries fill these beings, dim of eye,
Blasted minds and aching bodies, waiting for the time to die.
Can it be that bright-eyed children, carried on by life's rough stream,
Will be tossed at last like driftwood where these vagrants doze and dream?

Yet they catch a moment's respite from their weariness and woe
When they sink to stare and slumber in the dreary park bench row.
They were children once, God help them, brothers still of me and you.
May we cheer them, help them, save them,—while we guard the children too.

T. E. ROBINSON.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

After plowing through the muddy streets of Konia, where the black slush often reaches the fetlocks of the horses, we came out into the gardens and vineyards that surround the city on every side, and which have long made it famous as the garden spot of Asia Minor. For some ten miles our road was across a plain as level as a house floor. We jogged along at the rate of some three miles an hour, the usual rate of travel by araba, and after something more than three hours began to ascend a rough hillside until we had reached a height of nearly a mile above the sea, fully a thousand feet above the city of Konia. Here a magnificent view greets the eye. Kara Dagh, the Black Mountain, is the most conspicuous feature of the landscape. On its sides are the ruins of "a thousand and one churches," according to tradition, though an actual count would make the number far less, and some would be found to be not churches at all, but ancient buildings of a secular character. To the north is the city of Konia, with its stately minarets and its beautiful mosques, the twin peaks of St. Philip and St. Thekla keeping guard over the city. To the south we can see Baba Dagh, or the "Pilgrim Father," a mountain eight thousand feet high, that rises, like its nobler companion, Kara Dagh, directly out of the level, ocean-like prairie.

In the nearer distance to the south is the plain of Lystra, and to this we now gradually descend. Our journey is about half completed, and we stop for a noonday lunch in an old khan, built of tremendous blocks of hewn stone, with mighty stone pillars supporting the roof. It looks more like a cavern than a house of refuge, and it dates back doubtless to the Seljukian times some six hundred years ago. Here numberless travelers over this lonely and desolate road have found shelter with their camels and horses and donkeys, and in just such a khan St. Paul may have rested, as he, too, took the same route over the heights of Loras Dagh to Lystra.

Four hours more from our noon halting-place, we plowed through mud and snow and slush until we came to a small river, crossed by a fine Roman bridge that was sadly out of repair. Some of the great stones had been carried off, perhaps to build the pigsties of the neighboring village, and we were obliged to seek a ford and drive our horses through. Just beyond we came to the wretched little Turkish village of Khatun Serai, the modern Lystra, for the ruins of the famous city of old lie less than a mile away.

Lystra, in Paul's time, as we have said, was largely inhabited by an uncultured people, and its inhabitants are no different to-day. To be sure, Lystra was a Roman colony, and there were a few well-educated aristocrats belonging to the ruling classes, who spoke Latin or Greek, but the great majority of the people were Lycaonians, and though many understood Paul's speech in Greek, yet, as St. Luke tells us, "they lifted up their voices in the speech of Lycaonia." The thousands in the populous city of old have dwindled to a bare three hundred, counting men, women, and little children. Of the temples and monuments and theaters of ancient Lystra, scarcely a trace can be seen. Every house in modern Lystra, with the exception of the mosque, which is a poor little affair without even a minaret, is a one-story hut of mud or stone.

We found the inhabitants still less hospitable than in Paul's time. Doubtless, a stranger in these days is a far greater rarity than in ancient times. Prying faces were thrust behind the curtains of our arabas to look at the strange women from America, with their unveiled faces. The mudir, or head man, of the hamlet was among the first arrivals in the motley throng that surrounded the arabas. In return to a polite request that he would direct us to the ruins of the ancient city, he gave a prompt and curt refusal. The boys and young men, taking their cue from the head man, began to revile us as "Giaours" or "Christian dogs." But soon they found out that one of our company was a missionary doctor; then their whole attitude changed, for there were many diseased people in the little village, and to them the coming of a skilled physician from America, whose fame had already spread to this little hamlet, gave promise of health and life. This sudden change, gratifying as it was to the cold and weary travelers, showed them that the character of the Lystrians for fickleness had not changed with the changing centuries. In Paul's time they first blew hot and then blew cold. With us, in the twentieth century, the process was reversed, and their cool and forbidding reception was soon changed to a warm welcome. The mudir relented, and allowed us the next morning to find the ruins of the ancient city. This was not the easiest thing in the world to do, for Lystra is surrounded by hills, and our only information about the exact site of the city was that it was upon a hillside, about a mile from the modern village of Khatun Serai.

Every hill was covered with a pall of spotless snow, while in the valleys and on the plowed fields it had largely melted into the brown earth. At last, however, with the help of Sir William Ramsay's invaluable descriptions and pictures, we reached the site of the old Roman colony, and stood before the pillar on which is a still legible inscription, which shows that here stood the temple at the gate of the city erected in honor of Cæsar Augustus. Here occurred one of the most dramatic scenes in all the Bible history. The people, rude as they were, were imbued with the legendary lore of Lycaonia. Ovid tells us how Lycaon, who gave his name to all this region, was directed by an oracle to found a city here. In this city Jupiter visited him in bodily shape, and he was so angry that Lycaon had cruelly murdered a legate from a neighboring kingdom and served up his flesh as a dinner to the god, that he overturned the tables, caused flames to burst forth in the palace, and laid it in ashes. Meanwhile, Lycaon fled in terror; his speech forsook him; his human form was gradually changed into that of a wolf, and he turned, growling with fury, on the unprotected flocks browsing in the fields around.

To this city, imbued with the superstitions of the past, and filled with the idea that the gods had actually visited their city, Paul and Barnabas had come, to tell of the true God and his Son Jesus Christ. There were few Jews in the city and no synagogue so far as is known, but in the streets and open squares the intrepid apostles preached the Gospel. The ignorant rabble were only too ready to believe that history was repeating itself, and that again the gods had come to visit their old haunts. They were led to this belief not only by the fiery eloquence of the newcomers, but by their supernatural power, as shown in healing the cripple, who had, doubtless, long been a familiar figure in the streets of Lystra. When Paul had fixed his piercing eye upon the lame man, and saw that he had faith to be healed, he cried aloud, "Stand upright on thy feet!" Then the cripple leaped and walked, and the people shouted in enthusiastic chorus, "The gods have come down to us in the likeness of men." Barnabas was doubtless a tall and stately man, who impressed people by his personal appearance, and him they hailed as the Jupiter who had once dwelt with Lycaon in their own Lycaonian city. Paul was a meaner appearance, according to his own statement, was more active and more eloquent, and him they called Mercury, the messenger of the gods.

I need not rehearse the story in detail; how they brought oxen and garlands, and were about to sacrifice to the apostles as though they were gods indeed. We know with what difficulty these men, servants of Jehovah, though they might have passed as deities and fared more royally than kings, put these honors away from them, with horror at the very thought of being worshiped as gods. We know how in the same breath in which they declared that they also were men with like passions as the humblest Lycaonion, they proclaimed unto them "the living God which made heaven and earth, and the sea and all things that are therein."

No passage of the Bible is more dramatic, and perhaps none is more familiar than this. It certainly shows forth more vividly the character of the great apostle, who, though endowed with extraordinary eloquence and supernatural power, only claimed kinship with the barbarians that would accord to him divine honors; the apostle who was ever intent not upon winning glory and honor for himself, but upon the message he had to deliver and the work he had to do.

THE GREAT BATTLE IN THE BALKANS

AN APPEAL FOR HELP FOR THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS AND THE WOUNDED

Turkish Carts Transporting Munitions of War

A Panoramic View of Scutari

A Servian Frontier Outpost

DEFEATED on every hand, routed and disorganized, the Turk, who three weeks ago held sixty-six thousand square miles of territory in Europe, is at bay within twenty-e miles of Constantinople, making a desperate ort to save his last foothold in Europe. Now at e end of the third week of the whirlwind cam-ign, as this statement is prepared for the press, e situation in the Near East is one of the most tonishing in modern history. Four little king-ms that the Powers of Europe fondly imagined ey were allowing to exist on sufferance have sud-nly proved themselves a military giant—a giant generalship, equipment, sturdy, unflinching dis-line and in ferocity. And it has been, too, with ven-league strides that this unsuspected Power e marched into Albania, Thrace and Macedonia, iving the forces of Turkey before it.

Success after success has fallen to the arms of e allies. Every despatch from the scene of the hting proves that Turkey to-day is no longer the wer that held the Russians at y at Plevna. The individual ldiers may still be desperately ave, but the soul of the army, rrupted by politics, has sunk the lowest level in the history a race that for a thousand ars has been famous for its hting men. The general offi-rs are mere politicians and d ones at that. The troops e undisciplined and untrained d the commissariat and army rvice departments have prac-ally ceased to exist. Turkish isoners have begged their cap-rs for food, saying they had ten nothing in thirty-six urs. On the side of the allies, pecially of the Bulgarians, e management of the commis-riat has been one of the won-rs of General Savoff's cam-ign. The vast body of men der his command is really a ing column; in three weeks it s covered sixty-five miles in e face of constant opposition, d still all the reports agree at at the close of each day's hting or marching the Bulga-an trooper found his rations aiting him.

Straight across the northern ld of operations from Montenegro to the Black a the successful allies have inflicted defeat after feat upon the Turks. The Montenegrins have ken possession of several towns in the district of vi-Bazar, and have occupied positions on the untains around Scutari in such a fashion that e Turkish garrison there is cut off from all sup-ies and must, within a short time, surrender. In acedonia the Servians have marched trium-antly down, taking town after town and inflicting ch punishment on the Turkish army commanded Zekki Pasha that it is now reported in full re-eat toward Monastir. The important engage-nts in this section of the field were those at manova and the battle about the city of Uskub. re the Turks were so utterly routed and panic-icken that they fled in disorder, even fighting ong themselves, it is reported, for places in the parting trains.

The Bulgarians, who, of all the allied forces, have the largest numbers in the field, have, during the last few days, accomplished the most important movements and victories of the campaign. With Kirk-Kilisseh and its line of defenses in their hands they have, with amazing speed, despatched bodies of troops to the south and east. For several days there came the reports of their occupation of a series of small towns, defeating and driving out the Turks in every instance. After a time it was learned that they had succeeded in reaching the railway line which connects Constantinople with Adrianople, and had blown up a bridge, thus cutting Adrianople from its base of supplies. Though all the news is the closely censored output of the government officials at Constantinople and in the Balkan capitals, there soon remained no doubt that one line of defenses after another had been evacuated by the Turkish troops and that they had at last fallen back to a series of positions which were believed to be almost impregnable. Leaving the besieged garrison of Adrianople to its fate, Nazim Pasha, the Turkish Minister of War, who had himself taken the field as commander-in-chief, aligned his troops and prepared for what all the world believed would be Turkey's final battle on European soil. Then came news of fighting—indefinite and unsatisfactory. Now within the last few hours, without details, comes the news that after three days of almost unceasing battle along a front extending almost thirty miles, Nazim Pasha's main army has been absolutely crushed and is fleeing in disorder, leaving thousands of killed and wounded and many guns and rifles and great stores of ammunition on the battlefield.

Montenegrins Under Cover Upon One of the Turkish Positions Near Scutari

From London there come a number of reports of the diplomatic moves which will follow this great battle. In one quarter it is stated that the allies will accept no proposition for an armistice and will negotiate for peace only with Turkey herself. It is also stated that France is moving for a speedy settlement of the difficulties, and from the Sublime Porte comes the statement that the question of suing for peace is there being given the most serious consideration by the Sultan's cabinet ministers.

During all this activity throughout the northern theater of war, Greece has not been idle in the south. Although the Turkish and Greek fleets are playing surprisingly small rôles in this mighty drama, the latter has taken possession of the islands of Thaos and Imbros in the Ægean Sea. On land the Greek army under the command of Crown Prince Constantine has been moving steadily forward in its march toward Salonica. The last great success reported is the capture of the Turkish city of Verria and the cutting of the railway line which leads to Monastir. This achievement cut off the retreat to Constantinople of that wing of the Turkish forces against which the Servians are operating in Macedonia.

Both from Greek sources in the south and from the Bulgarian Red Cross workers in the north have come terrible tales of the atrocities of the Turks. From Verria the Greeks report that Turkish troops massacred many Greek women and children before leaving the city. Two small towns, Aidali and Marash, on the railroad to Constantinople, have been burned by the retreating Turks, and, it is stated, all the Christian inhabitants slaughtered. The Red Cross workers report that the Turkish irregular troops, the Kurds and Bashi-Bazouks, massacred the wounded Christians and mutilated both the dead and dying at Kirk-Kilisseh. Fearing that anti-Christian riots might take place, France and Great Britain have ordered warships to a number of important Turkish ports to protect the foreign population should the Mohammedans attempt to make reprisals.

Letters from American missionaries and native Christian (Protestant) pastors in the Balkans have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, describing the situation and appealing for help to enable them to assist in caring for the wounded and in aiding the widows and orphans.

Rev. M. N. Popoff, a correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, writes from the American mission at Samokov, October 13:

> Just two weeks ago a full mobilization was ordered of the Bulgarian army. That means four hundred thousand soldiers in readiness to fight. Most of them are on the Turkish frontier. All over Bulgaria, for ten days there was a great stir. One could see only soldiers and guns. Even the school children were marching like soldiers, each with a gun, accompanying the troops from the depot to the barracks. On the same day on which the Bulgarian mobilization was ordered a similar act took place in Servia, Montenegro and Greece. That meant at least six or seven hundred thousand more troops in readiness for fighting with Turkey.
> At last the Balkan States have come to a mutual agreement on solving the Eastern Question. It is hoped that the Powers will leave them free to act. From all appearances, the end of Turkey in Europe is fast approaching. By the time this reaches you, the war will be on. In fact, Montenegro has already started it. Greece and Servia will follow. Then Bulgaria, the strongest of the four allies, will strike for Adrianople, and on to Constantinople, where the hardest fighting will take place. All this is not for the acquisition of any territory, but for

ONE THING THOU LACKEST

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Richard Braunstein*

TEXT: "What lack I yet?" Matt. 19: 20. "One thing thou lackest." Mark 10: 21

THE story of the rich young man who came running and kneeling to Jesus, anxiously inquiring what he must do to be saved, is particularly interesting and refreshing in the Gospel's history, because it is an account of one who is in earnest. It forms a sharp and decided contrast to the dishonest Scribes and hypocritical Pharisees of whom we so often read, coming to Jesus, not after truth, but only by their flippant questions to entrap him, and in the meshes of their hopeless and godless theology to entangle him, desirous for no other end than at last they might crucify him. All such evil spirit is wanting here; intense anxiety and deep sincerity after truth leave no room for any other than the spirit of earnestness. Consequently the lessons taught by this young man's intercourse with Jesus will find readiest acceptance with those who, like him, are in earnest; with those who are anxious to have answered that question which arises from every sincere heart, either from a lack of the knowledge of salvation or from an imperfect life, namely, "What lack I yet?"

Earnestness in a Good Cause

In the first place we would say what has already been implied, that the young man did not lack earnestness. Everything from the beginning to the end of this narrative is indicative of the intensest and deepest sincerity. And surely to be in earnest and to be sincere is a vital principle in every character. Without it there can be no stability, neither will there be substantial progress. It is a well established fact that earnestness in a wrong cause is far more to be trusted than its absence in a good one; for it is sure to lead to truth in the end, while its absence must, of necessity, betray the truth. Saul of Tarsus was most wofully deluded in his dreadful persecutions of the early Christians, but when this earnestness that was spent in persecution was suddenly brought face to face with the truth of God, and consecrated by God, he found his place at last among the very chiefest of the apostles. On the other hand, Judas Iscariot, a man apparently engaged in the very best of occupations, the bosom companion of Truth, walking at the side of Jesus, chosen to be an apostle, and yet lacking in the very fundamental element of success, earnestness, betrayed the truth, gave up his Saviour and died a suicide of error. So it is always. Life is real and earnest, and life will reward only those who are in earnest. This element the young man did not lack and he found the Truth.

The Sense of Imperfection

Again, he did not lack the knowledge of his own imperfections. The question, "What lack I yet? What must I do to inherit eternal life?" manifests his deep sense of his own incompleteness. He knew his failings. Such a knowledge of one's self is indispensable to every form of self-improvement. It was only after the Prodigal Son, as the Bible says, "came to himself," that is, felt himself perishing among the swine's husks, that he arose and went to his father. The knowledge of one's needs and inadequacies gives direction and scope in which earnestness can reveal itself. Without such guidance earnestness is simply fanaticism.

One of the most dangerous positions in life is to be satisfied with one's self. There can be no progress, no growth, in such a life. Everywhere there are far too many Christian people who are absolutely insensible to anything higher in the spiritual life than they have obtained, while the truth is that beyond and above the most spiritually inclined there are ever mountain peaks of exalted experience still unattained and undiscovered by them; for a life with Christ is perfectly boundless in the possibility of its dignity and development. St. Paul very beautifully expresses this idea when he writes, "I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind and reaching unto those things which are before I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." The rich young man, in this respect, was apparently faultless.

The Soul's Cry for Help

Furthermore, he knew where to go for help. He was not ignorant of the proper source of relief. He came to Jesus. It is true, he was somewhat at fault in his estimate of the Saviour; he called him "Good Master," "Rabbi," high titles, but far too low. And Jesus, apprehending that he did not know that Christ was God, said, "Why callest thou me good? There is none good, but one, even God." But in his appreciation of where to go for aid, he must soon have come to a realization of the Saviour's high rank.

Among the multitudes of earth such knowledge is rare. Everywhere around and about us there are many weary, hungry, distressed souls, who are earnest enough, perhaps, and who are aware of their great needs, but who are ignorant of any means of deliverance from all those things that make human life unblest. The young man proved his earnestness and his wisdom by going to the Master for relief. Our age needs some Wycliffe or Wesley, some Luther or Calvin, Savonarola or Zwingle to lead the multitudes that are in bondage, to this Christ, to whom the rich young man went. This Christ unlocks the prison gates and dispels the gloom, solves problems, saves souls. No one shall be turned away from him and at this moment he is waiting with his balm to bestow healing upon individual and nation.

The Teachable Spirit

The young man did not lack a teachable spirit. He was willing to be taught. He came in the attitude of a student. Most young men, especially those of the high station and dignity which characterized the subject of this exposition, are very loath indeed to acknowledge a superior. But here is a young man who is willing to learn. No truth can be acquired without this teachable spirit; no life perfected; no vision enlarged; no soul saved. The first lesson which must be learned in every school, pre-eminently in the school of life, is a willingness to learn. Bigotry, conceit, pride, folly and failure are the fruits of an unteachable spirit. It is the privilege of every soul to go to Christ and learn of him. With tender compassion the invitation and divine appeal still calls, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." The invitation to learn of him is strong.

The young man did not lack a moral character. He had high respect for morality. He observed the commandments of God throughout his life. It is not necessary to break all of the laws of God in order to be pronounced sinful, for to offend in one point is to make ourselves guilty of all. As some one has well said, in effect, when flames burst through the roof of a house we do not wait to see just which individual shingle is burning, but we make known as quickly as possible the fact that the house is in flames. So we do not stop to learn just which one of God's laws a man transgresses when he sins, but we are right in our conjecture that he is sinful, and that if all restraint were removed, yielding to the natural impulses of his nature he would be condemned for still greater offenses. But it will be noticed that Christ's answer is the only proper one that could possibly be given to the young man's question, for he asked, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" I think he had in mind a plan of salvation by works. He wished to do some great thing for which he might purchase life eternal, and for such a method the commandments must be kept to the minutest letter.

The young man replied, "All these have I observed from my youth." He did not mean that he had kept every point of the law, for the words rendered "have kept" and "have observed" mean to have respect for and to use as a guide. He was a moral man; but as thousands do he did not stop with morality. How common are the phrases, "I am honest; I do not steal, or lie, or cheat; I am as good as the next man; I am better than many Christians. I am saved if they are!" Everywhere men are trusting in their own moral character for salvation. Of course we must be moral. Of course we must do good works. It is to our shame if we are not the best persons in the world to-day; but for a ground of eternal possessions, our morality is as dust; we have offended in a thousand points. Christ, our Sacrifice, our Satisfaction for a broken law, our Righteousness, is the only ground of salvation.

The One Thing Lacking

And as faith always saves, so faith is the only means. The young man realized that by none of his virtues could he be saved; and it is right here that the significance of Mark's expression appears: "And Jesus, beholding him, loved him." I am sure that Jesus loved him because of his earnestness; he loved him for his knowledge of his incompleteness; loved him because he knew where to go for help; for his teachableness and his beautiful morality. But more than for all these things Jesus loved him because, not lacking in these essentials to a stalwart character, he still reached for something higher; was not satisfied, like the multitude about him, with the lofty plane of morality. Thus beholding him Christ loved him and gave the one great positive answer to his question: "One thing thou lackest; go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, take up thy cross and follow me." And then we feel deeply for him when it is said, "He was sad at that saying, and went away grieved; for he had great possessions."

Give God the First Place

Mark you, he did not stop to argue, neither did he remonstrate with Christ, for as never before the truth dawned on him, that between God and him he had fixed an impassable barrier; God was his first choice, nor did he occupy the first place in his heart. And note also that there was broken the very first of those commandments that he had observed from his youth, namely, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Here then is the lesson of all lessons for us to learn to-day: Perfect surrender of all we are and have to God. Some of us only give him a part, instead of complete, voluntary submission of everything to him, so that our hearts may have no other gods and the life no other guide. This one thing the young man lacked, and wanting in that, he lacked the kingdom of God.

On whatever stage of life we may be, at whatever age, in whatever household, business, profession or church, let us with all the mightiest fundaments of character ask of God, individually and collectively, "What lack we yet?" that we may be complete in our surrender of all things to him and become perfect and entire, lacking nothing.

The Blackfoot Glacier

(See Cover.)

THE wonderful bit of Western Montana scenery that gives us our cover subject this week is located in the Lake McDonald region of that State. From one pinnacle of the great Blackfoot Glacier we look away to Citadel Mountain, and in the further distance the peak that still bears its Indian name, Going-to-the-Sun Mountain. The reproduction has been made from an artist's colored photograph and in the foreground shows one mass of the mighty glacier. The effect of the brilliant sunshine on the mountain of ice beggars description. A thousand opalescent shades of green and blue and purple travel with the sun across its broken masses, presenting one of America's grandest and most fascinating mountain pictures.

IF HE SHOULD COME

HE should come to-day—the Bridegroom come,
summon me away to his own home,
at would his welcome be from me, his own,
o long so trustfully have borne alone burden of the day, its dust and heat;
's bitter waters drank; who longed for sweet;
o yearned for human aid when ways grew rough,
listened for his word, "It is enough, ough, my weary child; come to my breast;
re's love awaiting thee, and peace, and rest"?

e should come to-day—my Lord should call;
uld gently breathe my name, my All in All;
uld speak the blessed word, the sweet word,
"Come!"
haste with joyful feet, though lips were dumb;
uld go to him I love, who long has led on life's lonely march, clouds overhead, storms o'ershadowing my way so dim;
flee to his dear arms, who trust in him;
welcome him with joy, and not dismay,
e who loves his own should come to-day.

LAURA E. NEWELL.

'Han' Him Down Gentle"

SOUTHERN minister, whose
A father was a large planter and e of the good masters of the old uth, relates an affecting scene of boyhood days.

In an autumn month, there was a ath on the plantation. A very old gro was dead, and the father and n went out to the burial among the urners, to see the faithful old ser-nt laid away with others who had ne out from the "quarter." On aching the grave, the negro women od to one side under the trees, clad homespun frocks, with large headths folded about their heads. The ly burial service was a prayer made a most pathetic tone by an old neo man. As the body was being lowed into the grave, the man who od there to receive and guide the fin said: "Han' him down gentle, ya! Han' him down gentle! His nes is ole."

On behalf of many old people alost as helpless as if dead, the pitiful rds sadly need to be spoken. Old rents, old preachers, old people who ve no closer ties than those of com-n humanity—how often their old arts, and even their old bones, ache reason of the carelessness and ghness with which they are treated.
A stranger called to get the ministo officiate at the funeral of his ther. "Oh, yes," he said, in reply some expression of sympathetic inrest, "one hates to lose a mother; did her duty by us as long as she s able, but, you see, she had out-ed her usefulness. When father d some years ago, he left nothing mother to live on, and she was too and feeble to work. We couldn't t her into the Home for the Aged, so had to take care of her. There re five of us children and we agreed keep her at our houses year about.
t when my turn was out, she wasn't ong enough to be moved, so I had re than my share. It was pretty rd, for she had outlived her useful-ss, and she was so helpless that she uired a lot of waiting on."

Yes, they have "outlived their use-ness"—these very old and worn-out es. They cannot serve us as once ey did. They may even be childish w, unreasonable, and need much at-tion. But do not be cross and hard ward them; do not neglect them; ow them all possible tenderness and mpathy. "Han' 'em down gentle"
Jesus' sake, whose "little ones" ey are. "Han 'em down gentle!"

Elizabeth Porter Gould struck a h-sounding note when she wrote:

Put your arms around me—
There—like that;
I want a little petting
At life's setting;
For 'tis harder to be brave
When feeble age comes creeping
And finds me weeping
Dear ones gone.
Just a little petting
At life's setting;
For I'm old, alone and tired,
And my long life-work is done

WHAT'S THE MAN GOOD FOR?

ONE day a lover of art was rummaging through an old storeroom where many discarded articles left over from auction sales were thrown together. Lying on the floor, face downward in the dust, he noticed an old painting in a broken frame. Instinctively he picked it up, feeling a sort of indignant protest rise to his tongue that any canvas bearing the work of an artist should be so abused.

As he turned the picture to the light for examination, disappointment and disgust made him forget his protest. The painting was marred and dingy, but he saw plainly that it was crude and gaudy in the extreme, full of false perspective, wrong proportions, rough blemishes and ugly colors. "Why in the world should any one paint such a thing—or keep it after it was painted!" he exclaimed. "It is utterly worthless."

By force of habit he dusted off some of the dirt from the picture and looked closely to find the painter's name, but it seemed that no one had been willing to acknowledge the work with a signature. A glimpse of something else, however, almost hidden, but faintly gleaming through the wretched daub, caught the eye of the connoisseur and thrilled him with sudden emotion. He gazed long and earnestly at every part of the canvas; then he took it to the auctioneer and offered to buy it. The man laughed. "Sure! glad to get rid of it; never could sell it. Give you oil painting, frame and all, for a dollar."

Carefully wrapping up the soiled and scarred old painting, the lover of art took it at once to an artist friend who began skilfully and tenderly to cleanse away the filth and the vulgar painting which some evil hand had daubed upon the canvas. Little by little, as the careful work of cleansing and restoring went on, wonderful lines and colors lying beneath came into view, until at length the priceless work of a master artist was revealed.

NO NEED to tell you the story of the lover of men who went down among the discarded human wrecks of a great city and found a soiled, broken-down man, literally on his face in the dust. No need to tell you how evil companions had covered the real man with an ugly caricature. No need to say how he was knocked about, and scarred, and rejected as worthless; how the city custodians of such as he were glad to get him off their hands. No need to recite the thrilling tale of how the human connoisseur, the lover of men, took him where he might be cleansed and restored, and the priceless work of the Master Artist be again revealed. The wonderful story has been told again and again of men reclaimed. You have had a part in such work, and it is the noblest work given to men and women this side of heaven.

The Bowery Mission is doing this work earnestly, faithfully, night and day throughout the year, but you are doing it, or may do it through the Bowery Mission. The misery and crime which are lessened and prevented and the multitude of men who are lifted up and redeemed by this work, place the whole country under an obligation of sympathy and support.

From every State in the Union men and boys have been attracted by the glitter and the gay life of New York. Hope beats high in the breast of many a boy who comes to the great city to find a fortune. So often, in the crowding, crushing struggle, he fails to grasp the prize; so often through misfortune, or evil companions, or appetite, or lack of work, he goes down and out. Don't blame him; perhaps he is weak and friendless. Few, indeed, are really wicked. Perhaps he is discouraged and hardened by the thought that no one cares for him. He would not admit it, but he is hungry and starving—for love.

The Bowery Mission is his Good Samaritan. But what can the Bowery Mission do without you?

READ the items and figures in the following statement, just completed, for the year ending June 30, 1912. Do more than read it—statements and figures are so formal and cold. Take a single homeless, shamed, unhappy man, and think of him as a brother, a father, a son, a husband. Think of him; follow him step by step from the home he left. Watch him in the struggle. He does not fall at once, nor willingly. He puts up a good fight. The odds are against him. He grits his teeth and tries again. Why doesn't some one stand by him? Just a little encouragement in time would save him. He doesn't understand. Day by day he is losing his grip. Hope and purpose fade from his eyes and die out of his heart. There he goes—down—I cannot reach him to lift him up. I can only send a lover of men to him from the Bowery Mission in my stead.

Study these items and figures, showing the work of the Bowery Mission, and translate them into human lives. One man lifted up, and loved, and saved means so much. What does it mean when one is multiplied by tens of thousands?

SUPPOSE the great army of men who have been lifted up and cleansed and redeemed by the Bowery Mission should march in a long line past your home, and should look up with bright, eager faces at your window, and give you a ringing cheer of manly gratitude and promise. How your heart would glow within you at the knowledge that your love and your money helped them to new life!

Read over the figures again, of the food given to the hungry, the employment given to the out-of-work, the Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners carrying cheer into poor families, the blessed bread of salvation given freely to famished men eager for love and life. It may all be your work—nay, it must be yours if it is to go on. Give to its support and upbuilding now, as the bitterness of winter is coming on. Give gladly and generously, for your gift is a gift to humanity and to Christ.

THE ETERNAL SUN

DON'T fret when clouds have hidden
The sun away from sight.
No cloud can last forever,
And soon or late the light
Will pierce with golden lances
The mists of earth, and then
The glory of God's sunshine
Will flood the world again.

The clouds that hide the sunshine
A little time away
Will make it seem the brighter
Because they were so gray.
And so, because we miss it
When shadows intervene,
We all the more shall prize it
When there's no cloud between.

Learn, heart of mine, the lesson
Of sunshine and of shade:
There comes a time of trouble;
Grief makes the soul afraid.
And in our human weakness
We oftentimes forget
That somewhere in God's heaven
His sun is shining yet.

O fretful heart, be patient
And in this faith abide—
Forevermore there's sunshine
Upon the heavenside.
Oh, think, and take new courage—
Be brave, and learn to smile—
Beyond the clouds of trouble
God's sun shines all the while!

General Booth's Will

THE following is a brief summary of the late General Booth's testamentary dispositions: By his will, which (except as to the appointment of his executor and the confirmation of the appointment of his successor) deals only with the properties held by him as general of the Salvation Army or on any like public trusts, he formally vests all such properties, both real and personal, including copyrights, in his successor as the general for the time being of the army to be held by him upon the trusts affecting the same.

By three codicils he deals (1) with his small private property, the net value of which amounts in American money to $2,342.16. This he gives to the Salvation Army, with the exception of certain private papers and memoranda, which he gives to his eldest son, the present general; and a few articles chosen by himself, which he gives as mementos to each of his children and children-in-law.

By the codicils, the general also deals with property of the present estimated value of $25,416—subject to duties and some expenses — representing moneys—which, as is well known, were many years ago settled by the late Henry Reed on the late general for his private use. It was this provision which enabled General Booth throughout his life to draw no stipend or remuneration from the funds of the Salvation Army. This settled property the late general divides among his children—Mr. Bramwell Booth, Cather, Marian, Herbert, Eva and Lucy—in exercise of the power given to him by the settlement. By the will the general appoints his successor to be his executor.

Just a Word About Covers

I CONSIDER the paper admirable, and, as an artist, it seems to me little short of a tragedy that those excellent reproductions of paintings, which are appearing on the covers, should be printed on such paper and folded so as to be scarcely suitable for framing. It is a great thing for such art to be put before the people, even though in such perishable form.

Very truly,

MRS. S. M. COBB.

Lewis Institute, Chicago, Ill.

The above letter prompts us to call the attention of our subscribers once more to the fact that a splendid collection of the pictures referred to may be obtained through our Circulation Department. These reproductions are on a fine quality of heavy paper and are thoroughly suitable for framing or passe-partout.

THE national assembly of the suffragists at Philadelphia, November 21-26, focuses public attention on the organized Votes for Women Movement. Every State is represented in this convention, the forty-fourth in its list of national gatherings. The meeting is called by the national officers in support of the resolve "never to waver in the effort to obtain the right to stand side by side with the men in this country in the mortal struggle that shall bid perish from this land political corruption, privilege, prostitution, the industrial slavery of men, women and children and all exploitation of humanity."

The convention is a time-keeper of advance. It records, since the last meeting in 1911, that there has been well-defined progress in the suffrage movement in this country and abroad. The Norwegian Parliament has passed a law admitting women to almost all public offices on the same terms as men. The new republic of Portugal, under the new electoral law just passed, admits to the Parliamentary franchise a limited number of women over twenty-five years of age, who are qualified and have passed a certain educational test. The new Chinese National Parliament at Nanking has granted equal suffrage to the women of China, subject to the same restrictions as men—that is, they must be able to read and write, must be property owners, and twenty years of age.

Women are now voting on school questions in two States, added this year—Kentucky and Louisiana. Arizona and Michigan legislatures have submitted the question to the people. In Ohio, the constitutional convention passed the proposal for a suffrage amendment to eliminate the word "male" from the election statute. This was lost; but the suffrage movement "has suffered defeat victoriously" (as Mayor Newton Baker of Cleveland expressed it), and is going ahead on the "initiative and referendum" that was gained. The Wisconsin, Nevada, and Oregon campaigns have also attracted the attention of the forces of evil which have had a very busy year in their efforts to combat and destroy the rise of woman's influence in the State.

Wisconsin has been especially active. Novelty has marked the movement there. A Suffrage Marine Corps was formed for boat trips on the State waterways, speeches being made at all the docks. The workers have been selling washing machines and holding bargain sales to raise funds for the cause. In Kansas, where women already have school and municipal suffrage, they have been running for office in almost every county; in order to secure full suffrage they have conducted a very vigorous campaign in all sections of the State. The Michigan Grangers, sixty thousand strong, pledged themselves to support the women's vote and against every legislative candidate who did not favor equal suffrage. In Oregon the workers had a rose festival and have held hundreds of outdoor meetings. Great activity has been displayed in other States. There have been suffrage parades in many places, including Maryland and New York. The New York workers have held yacht meetings, stopping at every dock to address the crowds. The Chicago stenographers have formed a suffrage alliance. Summer Chautauquas have been fertile sources of seed-sowing in Indiana and elsewhere. In South Dakota a new suffrage league has been formed, dividing the State into four districts for effective work. Men's leagues have been formed in several Iowa cities and many clubs have been organized. A bill has been introduced in the United States Congress to enfranchise the women of the District of Columbia.

California women, who gained the franchise last year, have registered as voters in large numbers and are eager to help the campaign States. They have formed clubs to study citizenship and to promote improved legislation including equal pay; the eight-hour law; joint guardianship; property rights, and raising the age of consent to twenty-one years.

Dr. Anna H. Shaw
President, National Association

Pennsylvania (where the convention meets this year) has the distinction of being the State in which all the political parties have endorsed the women's vote. Among the noted speakers at the Philadelphia convention are Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago; President Thomas of Bryn Mawr College, who conducts the College Night; James Laidlaw, of New York, who conducts the National Men's League for Woman Suffrage, special night; Miss Julia Lathrop, Children's Bureau, Washington; and Baroness Bertha von Suttner, of Austria, the author of "Lay Down Your Arms."

During the convention of the National Equal Franchise Association in Philadelphia, Independence Square will ring with eloquent pleas for Votes for Women. Six platforms will be erected for the speakers, who include the best known of the national workers and organizers, among them being Rev. Anna Howard Shaw; Miss Caroline Lexow; Mrs. Ella Stewart; Miss Harriet M. Mills; and Miss Rose Schneiderman. During this meeting Mrs. Charlotte Pierce Olmsted, Philadelphia, one of the veterans who attended the first convention of suffragists in Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1848, will read the "Declaration of Rights," issued that year.

During the convention week, a dozen active leaders will campaign about Philadelphia, holding meetings. The largest mass meeting will be that of November 24, in the big Metropolitan Opera House, North Broad Street. This will be a Thanksgiving service in honor of the campaign which is being conducted in Ohio, Oregon, Michigan, Wisconsin, Kansas and Nevada.

THE RULE OF AMERICAN WOMEN

BY EVELYN BAKER DODD

HISTORY teaches us that when this country was first settled, and for generations following, the women were in the background. We have little mention of them. They kept silent in the churches and out of public life, remaining strictly in their own homes, where they undoubtedly wielded a powerful and lasting influence. In song and story we learn that they spun and wove and looked well to the ways of their households. There was no question as to their "rights"; having all the liberty they desired, they never dreamed of lack of freedom. And thus the country grew and prospered.

The forefathers had not their advice in public affairs, nor needed it. They brooked not interference from women—which really was never attempted—nor would men be admitted in council, unless found to be "qualified"; and so the nation was cemented and grew into one of the great World Powers.

After a while, there was a "rattling among the dry bones" of household duties. They were soon called "drudgery." The maternal tasks that were once labors of love became "monotonous," irksome, and beneath the dignity of women, who, being equal with men, were fitted for higher spheres of action. Thus they reasoned. The leaven spread with marvelous rapidity. The foot leaped from the cradle and into the arena of public life. The ranks have been swelled along the years, until the twentieth century beholds them full panoplied at the polls in five "nations"—sovereign States.

The country has grown marvelously in material wealth—in everything that is embraced in that comprehensive word "success"—a development wonderful and rapid beyond human calculation—and women are everywhere in evidence. They rule outside now, where once they ruled in the home; but, like everything in nature, and art as well, when diverted from the appointed place and use, there is confusion, and in the end disaster. We are startled to hear the question asked, "What shall it profit a man (or nation) if he gain the whole world" and lose those highest qualities without which neither man nor country can hold that dearly bought success which, alone, can no more support the pillars of government than fibers of straw?

The foundation of the State must be of rock, not sand, and women's shoulders are not strong enough to bear the burden, nor to support it after it is built. Lacking strong mental fiber and full muscular development, possessing as they do a hypersensitive nervous system, if they rule at all it must be with other forces. Therein lies the danger. Tyranny in its worst form results, a tyranny that will fall first and heaviest on the shoulders of women themselves—on the women in the "file"; for it is a well known fact that women cannot sit in judgment upon the sins of each other, nor can they rule each other with that mercy required by justice and charity. The few splendid exceptions but more forcibly prove the rule. Then, where to turn for relief, if women are once given full powers?

In the meantime, man, thrown out of his province, as a consequence will have degenerated; his arm will be weakened, his hand will have lost its cunning, his brain cells from disuse will have deteriorated, and timidity will take the place of courage. You think a "henpecked husband" a lamentable thing? So it is, but what of a henpecked nation? Women by nature are more cautious than men. There while they are considering, "making up their minds," real progress passes and they are left to follow, not to lead. They are also more tenacious, obstinate and prejudiced than men; consequently, more provincial. Above all else, they abhor a compromise. It is all or none for them, and they generally demand all. They do not take kindly to negotiations. They have a liking for details. "Enterprises of great pith and moment" do not appeal to them. Women would never have built the Panama Canal nor would they demand government ownership of Alaska. How long, then, under the rule of American women, will this nation remain a World Power?

You may think they do not want to rule—only vote. Women will never be satisfied simply to cast a ballot. Above all else, they love and admire fame. Ambition in their breasts is a consuming fire. Once they were contented with fame for husband or relative; now they strive to have it for themselves and they are going to get it at all hazards! They have ruled in the home; now they aspire to rule in state and nation. They have won in five States and are pressing on to victory in others, while men look on with an indulgent smile as if only a kind of pin-money were taking place, not at all realizing that their own high prerogatives are menaced. Let the power already gained and the use made of it be examined to determine what women have accomplished with it. If ever a [illegible] broom sweeps clean it is when it is new; if not the[illegible]here is little to be expected of it.

WILSON AND MARSHALL ELECTED

AT THE general election on November 5, the Democratic candidates, Woodrow Wilson and Thomas R. Marshall, were chosen as President and Vice-President of the United ates by an electoral majority which is almost unecedented. While the Democrats were confident fore the final struggle, the result far exceeded eir expectations. Wilson carried thirty-seven ates, including California, Massachusetts, New rk, New Jersey, Ohio, Maine, Wisconsin, New mpshire, Delaware, Connecticut and the whole e of Southern tates. Colonel oosevelt's strength rprised many, alough it did not fulthe expectations of s confident supports. He carried a numr of States, however, cluding Illinois, wa, Michigan and nnsylvania, more an enough to give m a good lead over resident Taft. As is edition goes to ress, the returns om several States e still incomplete, though the latest rures will not change e position of the ndidates. It is estiated that Governor ilson will have 400 tes in the Electoral llege, 266 being necsary to a choice.

Throughout the untry the voting as very heavy, the ather being favorle in most localities. almost all the ates, the rural vote as polled early. vernor Wilson carid his own State by ,000, and he also rried Ohio, Presint Taft's State, by ,000. Colonel Roosevelt had 40,000 plurality in nnsylvania, and he also carried Illinois, although a smaller vote. Maine, for the first time in ty years, went Democratic, and gave Wilson 00 plurality. New York went to Wilson by a mendous landslide, and also elected a Democratic vernor.

When the results of the vote throughout the untry became known, Colonel Roosevelt was the st to congratulate Governor Wilson on his elecn. He sent him a telegram which read:

"The American people, by a great plurality, have nferred upon you the highest honor in their gift. ongratulate you thereon.

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

Other telegrams poured in upon the successful ndidate at his home in Princeton. The governor spent the evening quietly with his family and a few political friends. Returns were received by telephone in the library, and when at last the confident announcement of his election was sent over the wire, Mrs. Wilson was the first to receive it. She went over to the governor, who stood before the open fireplace. The big grandfather's clock had just struck ten. "My dear," she said, "I want to be the first to congratulate you." This was the first of a series of greetings which lasted half an hour. Then he was told that there were several hundred Princeton students eager to see him. He had heard them cheering outside, and smiled as he gave consent to their admittance. When they were ranged up before him, their faces shining with enthusiasm, the governor said in serious tones:

"I have no feeling of triumph to-night, but a feeling of solemn responsibility. I know the very great task ahead of me and the men associated with myself. I look almost with pleading to you, the young men of America, to stand behind me, to support me in the new administration. Wrongs have been done, but they have not been done malevolently. We must have the quietest temper in what we are going to do. We must not let any man divert us. We must have quiet temper and yet be resolute of purpose. But let us hear them all patiently and yet, hearing all, let us not be diverted. I know what you want and we will not accomplish it through a single man nor a single session of the houses of Congress, but by long processes running through the next generation."

Colonel Roosevelt, too, had a little gathering of newspaper men at Oyster Bay, at almost the same hour in which President-elect Wilson was addressing the Princeton College students. The ex-President led his visitors out to the veranda and gave them this message to the public:

"The American people, by a great plurality, have decided in favor of Mr. Wilson and the Democratic Party. Like all other good citizens, I accept the results with entire good humor and contentment. As for the Progressive cause, I can only repeat what I have said so many times: "The leader for the time being is of little consequence, but the cause itself must triumph, for its triumph is essential to the well-being of the American people.'"

He concluded with: "Now, gentlemen, I wish you good-night."

President Taft learned the result of the great battle at the polls while in the home of his brother, Charles P. Taft, in Cincinnati, and in the same room where he heard the news of his victory over Mr. Bryan four years ago. Now, however, the bulletins were not those of triumph, but of defeat. Even as late as six o'clock—just an hour before the returns began to come in—the President believed he would have a safe majority in the Electoral College. When the result came over the 'phone, he preserved his characteristic good-nature. Later he issued a statement in which he says: "The election of Governor Wilson to the Presidency means an early change in the economic policy of the government in reference to the tariff. If this change can be made without halting prosperity, I sincerely hope it may be." He also sent the following message to President-elect Wilson:

"I cordially congratulate you on your election, and extend to you my best wishes for a successful administration. WILLIAM H. TAFT."

Democrats elected governors in New York, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Texas, Ohio, and nine other States. Congress will probably show a majority of 145 Democrats in the House and eight in the Senate.

VICE-PRESIDENT SHERMAN DEAD

THE Honorable James Schoolcraft Sherman, Vice President of the United States, and candidate of the Republican party for re-election to that office, died at his home in Utica, N. Y., on October 30. though Mr. Sherman had been in seriously bad health r some months, the public generally was not aware of and the sudden news, announced a day or two before s death, that he would probably not recover from his ost recent attack, was a decided shock. On October 28, s physician, Dr. Fayette N. Peck, issued a bulletin in nich he said: "Mr. Sherman has been sick all this year, e to condition of the kidneys, hardening of the arteries d softening of the muscles of the heart." Throughout e last hours he lay in a state of coma, with the exception a brief interval of about fifteen minutes, in which he cognized and spoke to his wife and Dr. Peck.

When the end came, at 9:42 o'clock, Mr. Sherman was rrounded by his wife, his three sons and their wives, o brothers, and a brother and sister of Mrs. Sherman. lls were tolled in the City Hall at Utica and in the urches throughout the city, and the news, flashing over legraph wires, brought regret to many persons in all alks of life and to many assemblies in session. Presint Taft was attending a dinner, at which nearly twelve ndred guests were present, celebrating the launching the battleship New York at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. though the program of speeches was not completed, the resident asked that "the assemblage adjourn in honor of e Vice-President's memory, and that no further proceedings be taken." Ex-President Roosevelt heard the news in New York, as he was leaving Madison Square Garden after his address at the rally of the Progressive Party. He at once sent a telegram of condolence to Mrs. Sherman for himself and Mrs. Roosevelt. All campaign activities at Utica were suspended until after the funeral, which took place on November 2. Governor Johnson, Progressive candidate for Vice-President, was to have spoken in that city on the 31st, but canceled the engagement. A Wilson-Marshall banner, hung across one of the principal thoroughfares, was removed. Leaders of his own and the other political parties expressed themselves as griefstricken by the loss of their genial and gifted friend.

Mr. Sherman was born near Utica in 1855; was graduated from Hamilton College in 1878; became a lawyer and was elected mayor of Utica in 1884; was elected in 1887, when only thirty-two years of age, to the House of Representatives, where he soon became a prominent and influential factor in Congress. He held positions on many important committees, was an expert on Indian affairs, directing much important Indian legislation, and was reputed to be the best parliamentarian in Congress. No other representative has been called on so often as he to preside over the deliberations of the House when sitting as a committee of the whole, and some of the greatest House debates of recent years were conducted with Mr. Sherman in the chair. When, on his election to the vice presidency in 1908, he became president of the Senate, he introduced the innovation of appearing in a business suit,

The Testing Time

IN DISCUSSING the general condition of religious journalism in this country, the Christian Standard of Cincinnati, one of the ablest denominational religious weeklies, asks pointedly: "What is the matter with the denominational press?" That something is the matter there can be little doubt. One needs only to look around him to note the many changes that have taken place recently. Old publications, veterans in the religious field, have passed out of the struggle, while others have merged their interests in the forlorn hope of pulling through. It is undeniable that there has been a heavy mortality rate among denominational publications, which is not to be accounted for by any ordinary explanation. They do not lack ability; and their loyalty to the interests of their wing of the great Church of Christ is beyond question. What, then, is the matter?

Searching for the explanation, the Standard finds it, or something very near it, in the suggestion that the denominational press is weak-kneed and lacks the moral and spiritual backbone to stand out boldly against the encroachments of Romanism, and to denounce the Papacy as the arch-enemy of religious freedom in this republic. The fact is that the testing time has come when every Protestant newspaper, whatsoever its denomination, must show its colors and step bravely to the front on this great issue, or it must inevitably fall to the rear and be mustered out. We have reached the crossroads where we must choose either the path that leads to a new Reformation, which shall revitalize and unify Protestantism; or the road that leads to dishonor and defeat, and bow to the triumph of the Romanist campaign to "make America Catholic."

One by one, the best and ablest of our religious journals have already come to the front on this issue and more are on the way. We should like to see every Protestant publication doing its duty as the reflector and historian of public opinion on this great question of our day. We should welcome such fraternal concord among the various Protestant denominations as would inspire all to put themselves officially on record concerning the aggressions of Rome as the Methodist, the Lutherans, the Presbyterians and Episcopalians have already done. This is a conflict in which united action will win the day; not a conflict in any physical sense, but a warfare of high principles and truth against error, in which the whole nation is vitally interested. Out with your flags, brethren of the denominational press, and let the whole world see where you stand!

An Appeal from the Balkans

THIRTY-FIVE thousand men killed and wounded during the first nine days of the Balkan campaign! Hospitals crowded and many wounded soldiers unprovided for! Women and children left destitute, with no men to cut trees for their winter wood, or bring fodder for the stock, or earn money to buy food, which can be secured only at famine prices! The harsh Balkan winter coming on! Pain, desolation, and death!

A CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee has been organized at Sofia, and our readers have the opportunity of repeating the splendid acts of self-sacrificing charity with which they have so many times in the past amazed the world and cheered the hearts and saved the lives of suffering men, women and children. The time has come; it has rushed suddenly upon us when the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family can demonstrate that they are still the same grand army of relief—in the name of the gentle Christ. What they did for China, for Armenia, for Cuba, for Finland, for Italy, and for other nations, as well as for our own America, in times of famine and flood, earthquake and fire, and persecution, they will do again for the brave people of these little Balkan States, which have drained themselves of their manhood, leaving weeping women and hungry children to face winter and want and sorrow undefended.

Already these brothers and sisters of ours have held out their hands asking us to come to their relief. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is cabling $250 to the relief committee in anticipation of contributions, that the work may be begun at once. All contributions will be forwarded to Sofia by cable. The committee requests that every donor state whether he wishes his gift applied to the care of the wounded soldiers or for the wives and children.

The present campaign will doubtless be recorded as one of the sharpest, bloodiest, most amazingly impetuous in all history. Turkey being forced to the wall after what seems to have been a decisive battle, intervention by the European Powers may follow. But the wounds in flesh and hearts and fields will be long in healing. Brave men have gone to the firing line; brave women are bearing burdens of want and grief; we are asked to match their courage with our charity.

An Introduction

LET us have the pleasure of presenting to you a new friend of ours, Pollyanna. It is quite certain that you're going to like her, for she's the most charming little person you ever met. Here's how we'll make the introduction. We have secured the right to print as a serial one of the finest stories THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has ever given its readers, and the first chapters will be in the November 27 issue. This story is

"POLLYANNA"

It is from the pen of Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter, who has charmed so many thousands with The Story of Marco, Into Still Waters, The Transformation of Margaret, etc. Pollyanna is the best yet. Mrs. Porter always tells us a story that weaves its way in and out of dear, homely, real American homes and through hearts of the sort we meet every day. This time she brings us the story of a wonderfully lovable, elfin little girl who, with her strange "game," is the figure round which revolve mighty changes in the lives of those she meets.

Mr. Stockton Mulford, the artist who is making the pictures for the story, came in the other day with the first ones. He has been studying the manuscript and its characters so that their hearts may be reflected in their faces, and his enthusiasm is immense. "Why," he says, "I never knew of but one story along anything like the same lines, and I think this has it outclassed every way you take it."

An Explanation

SEVERAL readers have written asking why the news of the recent attack on Colonel Roosevelt did not appear in our issue of October 23. The explanation is that, owing to its widely extended circulation, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is obliged to send its regular issue to press twelve days in advance of the date of publication in order to secure simultaneous delivery. Thus the issue of October 23 went to press on October 11, three days before the occurrence in Milwaukee, a full account of which appeared in the issue of October 30. This is one of the incidents occasionally inevitable in the production of a paper of large circulation, like that of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It may be added that not one of the following weekly publications of national circulation printed the news of the event as early as October 23: Collier's Weekly, The Literary Digest, Leslie's Weekly.

Where Do You Stand?

THERE is probably no joy within human re[ach] that can equal the joy of kindly service. Go[od] deeds have not loud voices, but they are never al[to]gether hidden or silent; they speak for themsel[ves] at the proper time, however modest the doer.

A quiet little lady—a "home body"—said one [day] to her husband, "John, I have a confession to mak[e]"

"Well, what is it? Something dreadful, no doub[t]"

"It depends on how you look at it," she s[aid] quietly. "I've been t-e-r-r-i-b-l-y extravagant."

"Out with it, little wife," said John.

"Well," she said, "you know that money I h[ave] been saving for a while past. I have spent it. N[ow] there!"

"Good! I suppose a new dress or something"

"N-o," she interrupted. "But I found out twe[lve] poor families in our district, and I have arran[ged] that in these twelve homes they will eat a Than[ks]giving Dinner at our expense, yours and mi[ne]. They are very poor and cannot have such things [for] themselves, John, and I thought—"

What she thought, however, did not appear, [for] she was interrupted at that point by a kiss.

"Good little wife!" said John. "Your heart [al]ways leads you right. I hope they will enjoy [the] dinners, but the less said about these things [the] better—I mean in a public way."

"Yes, John," said the little wife, "for Jesus [Him]self said, 'Do not your alms to be seen of men,' and n[ot] of our other neighbors will know it."

THIS little woman was a missionary. In a q[uiet] and unostentatious way she was carrying [the] Gospel of love and kindness into twelve homes [of] poverty. This is precisely what THE CHRIST[IAN] HERALD Family Circle has been doing all th[ese] years, and the editors of the paper are thankful [for] the co-operation they have had in this good wor[k].

Let us tell you of another sweet-souled woma[n], a housewife, like the first. She did her own ho[use]work, her cooking, her tidying up and the rest o[f it], and yet she found time to visit three hundred ot[her] homes into which she introduced her favorite pa[per], THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the result that [she] sent us 125 new subscribers. She was a home m[is]sionary of the first order. Still another not[able] instance of missionary service is that of a man in a Virginia prison who, having found Christ th[ere] while reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, got th[ree] hundred other persons to take the paper, and [as] the result of his work is a revival in that pri[son]. These three cases are absolute facts.

OF COURSE, it is not within the power of ev[ery] reader to spend so much time in circulating [THE] CHRISTIAN HERALD, but there is probably no m[em]ber of our CHRISTIAN HERALD Family who co[uld], not, if he or she made the effort prayerfully [and] earnestly, send us one or two new subscribers. I[f] every member of the Circle were to do this, send[ing] only a single new subscriber apiece, we would co[me] very near touching the million mark this sea[son]. Just think of the splendid opportunity for miss[ion]ary service. A united effort on the part of [our] friends would help us to accomplish what we h[ave] been striving and praying and hoping and labor[ing] to do for years past.

YOU can do this, if you will. With God's l[ove] and by devoting a few hours of your spare tim[e] the task, you can make your favorite journa[l] weekly messenger to a million American hom[es]. What a mighty agency our Family Circle would [be] one million strong, banded together In His N[ame] for consecrated service! That is our goal, and [we] want you to help us reach it NOW.

All that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done in [the] past, all the good work it has accomplished at h[ome] and abroad, all the splendid Christ-like humani[tar]ian campaigns it has conducted, are due in ev[ery] case to its readers. We have been praying [and] working and hoping that this year the field of [ser]vice may be greatly enlarged, and that 1913 ma[y be] a year full of rich blessing to every house[hold] represented in our Family Circle, and better [than] all the years that have gone before.

WHAT will you do, dear friend—you who [read] this article—toward helping us reach the [mil]lion mark, and to multiply our present opportu[nity] for service? If you will send in with your [own] renewal one new subscription, both subscriptio[ns] together will be accepted at the special rate of $2.25. Let us hear from you at once, and le[t us] have the pleasure of enrolling you as one wh[o is] ready to help us in making the Family Circle a [mil]lion strong—the greatest united power for g[ood] that Christian journalism has ever known.

An Epoch-Marking Memorial

ABOUT the middle of September there was dedicated in Castelfidardo, Italy, a monument to General Cialdini and the Piedmont soldiers who under his command won the tle against the Papal forces led by General noriciere, which freed Italy from the rule of the ican. The unveiling took place on the fifty- nd anniversary of the victory, and was attended a great gathering of Italians prominent in politi- professional and social life. King Victor and en Helena were present at the ceremonies, the en loosing the cord which held the veiling of the nument. The monument itself is a colossal work, represents years of effort on the part of its lptor, Vito Pardo. The project was started in 2 under the direction of a national committee t had the patronage of the te di Torino. The actual k of completing the statue an immense one, for the res of the soldiers are nine in height and the mounted re of the general over fif- feet. Nearly seventeen s of bronze were used in the struction of the monument, over six hundred and fifty s of stone went into its com- ition. The entire work while in sections required forty- cars to carry it to its final tion. The interior of this at work of art is devoted to nemorial room which con- s relics of the mighty ggle it commemorates. All nations of the world have into stone and bronze record of important events, of heroic characters that e had a part in the founda- , perpetuity, or progress of country. The monuments ress the gratitude to bene- ors, are a lesson to the liv- and are an inspiration to ater devotion to country. s the hope and prayer of Christian world to-day that may cease, and the Prince Peace may rule the world h love. A simple monu- nt of gratitude to God was ed early in the history of the Hebrew nation.

en shall ye answer them, That the waters of Jordah were off before the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord when it ed over Jordan; and these stones shall be for a memorial the children of Israel forever. (Josh. 4: 7.)

A Boulder of Copper

MONG the curiosities removed to the new Museum Building at Washington was that of a boulder copper three and one-half feet long, three feet e, and one and one-half feet in thickness, weigh- three tons. The metal mass has an interesting ory. For ages this remarkable mass of copper on the west bank of the Ontonagon River in the per Peninsula of Michigan, where it was known many years by the Chippewa Indians of that on. It was not until 1766, however, that the white man, Alexander Henry, an English ad- turer and trader, found this remarkable speci- . In 1841 Julius Eldred, a hardware merchant Detroit, purchased the rock from the Chippewa ians, on whose lands it was located, and two rs later, after many difficulties, succeeded in nsporting it down the Ontonagon River, ough Lake Superior to Sault St. Marie, and nce to Detroit, where it was placed on exhibition a brief period. Soon after its arrival the gov- ment claimed it, and toward the end of 1843 it shipped to Washington and deposited in the d of the quartermaster's bureau of the War partment, where it remained until 1860, when as transferred to the Smithsonian Institution. s remarkable boulder is perhaps the first siderable quantity of copper found in the Lake perior region, a district which has since become of the most important copper-producing terri- es in the world. The museum specimen, though e and interesting, is by no means the largest d piece of copper ever found. The largest cop- specimen ever discovered was that found in 7 in a Minnesota mine. It measured forty-five in length, twenty-two feet at its greatest width, more than eight feet at its thickest part; was ninety per cent. pure copper, and weighed 420 tons. Copper of fine quality was mined in olden Bible times. Ezra weighed the costly vessels to be used in the service of the Lord; among them

Twenty basins of gold, of a thousand drams; and two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold. (Ezra 8: 27.)

Rich Hermit Was Poor

MARINO MERLINO, a hermit seventy-three years old, died in Philadelphia the other day. Dying unattended by a physician or nurse, the police were called in to care for his body and arrange for the funeral. The officers looked through a dilapidated valise, and found it crammed full of bills of small denominations. A trunk they discovered to be full of silver coins from nickels to dollars. Bank-notes of large denominations were secreted beneath the carpet. They were spread neatly over the floor so that no lump betrayed their presence. The silver pieces and paper bills amounted in all to $30,000. Besides, bank-books were unearthed that represented a balance in his favor in savings banks of Philadelphia of $100,000. He liked the clink of the silver and the rustle of the bills better than human voices, and preferred the company of his material wealth to that of human souls. How many comforts of life he denied himself which he might have had for the interest on his money! How many widows he could have fed and orphans he could have clothed! How many pains he could have eased, what pitiful conditions he could have improved with the proceeds of his money without reducing the principal one cent! How close he could have gotten to God's heart by a right use of his money for the church in the name of his Master! But no; he had no room for anything else but the love of money, which made his a poor, pitiable, lonesome, selfish, wasted life, a failure and a mockery. There is a deep mystery about this hermit Merlino. No one knows how he got his money, nor where it is to go now he is dead. These words of Christ come to mind now:

Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided? (Luke 12: 20.)

Centenarian Visits New York

MACAGOR WISE, aged one hundred and nine years, of Beaver Brook, N. Y., visited New York City the other day, the first time in twenty years, and was as much of a curiosity to the city as the city with its skyscrapers, subways and other wonders, was to him. To a reporter he gave some interesting incidents of his life. He thus referred to his fighting the Indians, and to his enlistment in the Civil War: "It was on the Susquehanna," said the veteran backwoodsman. "The banks came down steep on either side and the Indians were in ambush on both sides waitin' for us. They trapped us and pretty near killed every one of us. I escaped all right, and when I ran about half a mile I saw Rufus Wood, a friend of mine, come runnin' back along the trail as fast as he could, followed by an Indian. I put a bullet through the savage an' dropped him. Rufus, he turned aroun' and looked at him and then he yelled, 'Look a' here. It's Old Nick.' And sure enough it was Old Nick, the chief of the tribe. Yes, when the Civil War came I couldn't keep away. I went down to Trenton one day in 1862, and I saw the boys enlistin'. They were all enthusiasm an' it just got a hold of me." "But, Uncle Macagor, you must have been nearly sixty years old then," interposed the reporter. "Yes, I was fifty-nine. But I enlisted all right." "Couldn't they see you were over the age limit?" "They knew I was the best marksman that ever joined the army, and they wanted me." He spoke of his wound and hospital experience. He said his father took him to see the first railroad built in the country, and that he was an old man when the telegraph and telephone came along. He has good eyesight, a strong grip, a little flush of color in his withered face, enjoys life, was happy as a child seeing New York, and returned to his farm, of which he still has the management. He is within eleven years of the age of Moses when he died, and the old gentleman says he intends to live a good while longer, as his father lived to be older than he, and he expects that his life clock will run as long as his father's did.

And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died; his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. (Deut. 34: 7.)

A Cave Tomb

SOME little boys of Brooklyn, none of them over twelve years of age, organized a band of "boy bandits" and worked for four weeks digging a cave as a headquarters for the Indian fighters and Black Avengers. Willie Bloom, aged nine, and Johnie Pecorella, aged twelve, concluded they would sleep in the cave on a bunk covered with hay. They did so the night of October 28. Their parents missed them and looked everywhere in vain for them. The next morning it was found that the roof had fallen in on them and smothered both of them to death. Whatever parental responsibility there may have been, whatever wild Indian stories may have been read, the city with its atmosphere of pillage and murder is much to blame for a crop of boy bandits. Vice and crime are constantly before their eyes, and it is in the air they breathe. We pity rather than blame these little fellows. Of them it can be said:

Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child. (Prov. 22: 15.)

MEN OF VISION FOR LEADERSHIP

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE story of the Transfiguration teems with inspirational and practical lessons, but the central purpose of it all was the preparation of chosen men by a vision of the real Christ and of heaven for service on earth.

"After six days." The time of this vision, that prepared men for divine service all the week and all through life, was the Sabbath, no doubt—the Friday evening with which the Sabbath then began. It was then that Jesus took to his coronation his cabinet, Peter, James and John, his only companions at the raising of Lazarus and later in Gethsemane's agony. It was not favoritism but fitness that gave these men their great opportunities. They were by no means perfect, but they were the best fitted of all his disciples and apostles to understand and appreciate these visions of the power and love of Christ. Let us catch the practical lesson in passing that while worth is not always rewarded in this world, men who thoroughly fit themselves for some place usually get there sooner or later. Young men who appreciate so well the significance in athletics of the words, "He is fit," should remember that the man who would be "fit" for the greater achievements of life must also train and restrain himself. A boy of fifteen entering a college class of older men determined in his own mind that four years later he would be class historian, one of the four chief honors. He began at once to make full notes of all significant events in the history of the class and of its individual members, and when the time came he was unanimously elected, because he was the best prepared for the work. In our relations with God there is no exception to the law of "the survival of the fittest" and the exaltation of the efficient.

"Went up into the mountain." No one who ever traveled through Palestine or carefully studied its topography could have any doubt that what was, even in Christ's day, known as "the mountain" could be no other than snow-capped Mount Hermon, which towers daily before the traveler in solitary pre-eminence, like a marble cathedral—the fittest place for the coronation of One who was King of all nature, King of heaven above and earth below, of Jews and Gentiles. It is pertinent to note also that companionship with Christ takes us to the mountain-top of joy. And as the sherbet sold in the hot and dusty roads of Syria is cooled with the snows of Mount Hermon, so it is from the vision of Christ that we derive the sweetest consolations for life's vexing hours.

"Apart by themselves to pray." Only four present at this prayer-meeting—yet who will say it was not worth while? What a rebuke to those who give up a prayer meeting in summer or winter because only a few will attend! An orthodox doctor of divinity said in 1911, "The prayer meeting is a consecrated nuisance." If any of them are, it is the fault of the pastor or his helpers. There are thronged prayer meetings, pulsing with the heart-throb of a helpful Christ, in which half a dozen are on their feet at once. No prayer meeting ought to be given up wholly to telling experiences, but chiefly to 'hearing Him' who speaks from heaven in his Word, and replying in brief prayers; and the end should not be to "get a blessing," "to be fed," but to get ammunition and training and orders as soldiers of Christ.

We need to pray with others that we may comprehend with all saints those Christian truths we might not learn alone; but we need also to go "apart to pray" with "Jesus only" every day. A Roman Catholic girl who had stopped praying to saints and commenced praying to Jesus, and who was watched and persecuted, went away into a coal-bin, and in the dark and dirt prayed till, as she said, "it got as light as day." (See II. Cor. 4: 6.) In one of our larger colleges for girls, a special feature of the daily life of the household is the morning and evening "silent time." At the opening and closing of the day there is a brief period, marked by the strokes of the bell, during which all the house is quiet. Every pupil is in her room. There is no conversation. No step is heard in the corridors. The whole great house is as quiet as if all its five hundred occupants were sleeping. There is no positively prescribed way of spending these silent minutes in the rooms, but it is understood that all whose hearts so incline shall devote the time to devotional reading, meditation, and prayer.

Mount Hermon, Where It Is Believed the Transfiguration Took Place

A Christian man of intense business enterprise and activity was laid aside by sickness. He who never would intermit his labors was compelled to come to a dead halt. His restless limbs were stretched motionless on the bed. He was so weak that he could scarcely utter a word. Speaking to a friend of the contrast between this condition and the times when he had been driving his immense business, he said: "Now I am growing. I have been running my soul thin by my activity. Now I am growing in the knowledge of myself and of some things which most intimately concern me." George Herbert's quaint lines contain wise counsel:

> By all means use some time to be alone;
> Salute thyself; see what thy soul doth wear.
> Dare to look in thy chest—for 'tis thine own—
> And tumble up and down what thou findest there.

"And as he was praying, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his face did shine as the sun; and he was transfigured before them; and his garments became glistering, exceeding white; so as no fuller on earth can whiten them." "We beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" (John 1: 14). "We were eye-witnesses of his majesty, for he received from God the Father honor and glory" (II. Pe 1: 16, 17). This combines the descriptions of thi wonderful scene not only from Matthew, Mark an Luke, who got the story from others, but also fro John and Peter as eye-witnesses. No doubt th apostle James, who was martyred before the Ne Testament was written, may have given his obse vations to Matthew as a fellow apostle.

The transfiguration was really but the temporar unveiling of the hidden Kingship of Christ, "th glory he had with the Father before the world was. The Sabbath previous he had told his apostles tha he must be crucified—as if a preacher told h church officers he was to be hung—and he had con forted them with the assurance that some of the would live to "see the kingdom of God come wit power." This revelation of his Kingship was partial fulfilment of that promise. The "glisten ing" white garments were such as kings wore, an proclaimed his royalty. Th transfigured cloud and hea enly voice expressed th heavenly Father's approv of the coronation. But th transfigured flesh proclaime that his transfiguration w not like that of Moses at S nai, from without, but fro within. Here was a Kin who had a right to put h crown on his own head.

But note that it was du ing a human act, one i which he bids us share, o which he performed as a Sc of Man, that the glory can upon him. "As he praye the fashion of his count nance was altered." And le we should think we may n also be changed in outwa appearance by inward dev tion, Paul uses the san Greek word when he co mands us, in God's name, "I ye transfigured by the r newing of your mind," th is, by the regeneration your heart (Rom. 12:2). S the trees are transfigur after the winter by the inn life bursting out in leaf a flower and fruit. Jesus sa to the Father, "The glory that thou gavest me ha I given them," as if to make clear the fact that v too may be transfigured.

The skeptics say that the transfiguration w only the sunrise in the face of the half-awake di ciples. But let them explain Christ's transfigur tions of men and nations since then; thieves a drunkards made into honest citizens and altruist welfare-workers; pagan Europe humanized; sava islands civilized. How many things the touch Jesus has glorified! Bethlehem and Nazareth, on despised villages, are as well known and more e teemed than London and New York. The litt lake of Galilee, about twelve by seventeen miles, the best known and most loved lake in the worl "Samaritan" was a word of reproach, but the wor recalls the word chiefly in speaking of the "Go Samaritan." In each Christian life Jesus transfi ures doubt into faith, sorrow into joy, temptati into strength, death into victory.

"And there appeared unto them two men, Elij with Moses, in glory." Death then does not end a Moses was 1,608 years old at the time of the tran figuration and Elijah about a thousand—he h been 932 years in heaven. All the philosophy Greece does not give us so much assurance of a pe sonal immortality as this one well-attested reco which shows that heaven is not "far away" b close at hand, and that personal identity continu far beyond this life, and also interest in this worl redemption. Note, however, that there is no record th any one but Christ talked with these heavenly sain

IN THE OPEN PARLIAMENT of Sunday school superintendents at the International Sunday School Convention in San Francisco a few ago, which was conducted by Marion Lawrance, the general secretary, the following questions and answers were brought forth. Because of their pertinence to the Sunday school problem at all times they are repeated here:

Q. What should be the superintendent's last word in dismissing the Sunday school? A. Invitation to church; prayer; benediction—something that will fix the lesson truth.

Q. Should organized adult classes be present at the opening and closing exercises? How much time should they have to themselves? A. Better that all should be together in the opening exercises, but that large classes should be dismissed from their own class-rooms.

Q. To what extent should an organized class be independent from the school? A. None; it has a bad effect for any class to be independent from the rest.

Q. What is the best plan for maintaining a helpful council meeting of officers and teachers? A. Have definite plan for meeting; have devotions; have speaking; consider one phase of the school at each meeting.

Q. How may the teachers' meeting be successfully conducted in schools using the Graded Lessons? A. Have general business council, and then divide under the leadership of departmental superintendents. Graded unions are a good thing for this.

Q. What can be done with young people recently converted, so they will not lose their interest? A. Set them to work.

Q. To what extent should church membership be pressed upon scholars who have confessed Christ? A. Line them up with church. They should by all means be urged join.

Q. How may a superintendent cultivate reverence in the Sunday school? A. By be reverent himself.

Q. Should a superintendent suspend indefinitely incorrigible boys and girls? A. N never have seen one; love is the better way their hearts. It will win every time.

IDOLS OF GOLD

BY FLORENCE GUERTIN TUTTLE

A Story, Complete in This Issue

YOUNG Ludwig, Baron of Saxony, stood on the stern deck of an ocean liner and watched his past recede. Behind him were his traditions, his training, his early associations; his amily with its ancient castles, its empty coffers, its ristocratic delusions, its pathetic attempts to rasp and retain a feudalism already extinct. Be-ore him lay America, its Goddess of Liberty hold-ng the scroll of his future in her firm, strong ands.

Ludwig did not deceive himself as to that future. e knew that, younger son though he was, he was ie modern straw at which the expiring family ride collectively clutched. His elder brother was opelessly invalided. The title and mantle of dig-ty must some time descend upon the younger n's well-set shoulders. Affairs were still con-ucted upon a subtle, medieval, rather ian an open, Twentieth Century asis, in Saxony. Yet Ludwig under-ood the occasion for his trip to merica quite as well as if it had been delicately discussed. They hoped it ould be a "mission," even as his an-estors had assumed crusades. They rusted that he would fill the family xchequer after the ancient and ap-roved custom of honorable gentle-en—he was to marry money. Vul-arly speaking, which in Saxony was odernly speaking, he was expected charm and entrap a million-dollar rincess. Would he do it? He looked ver the foaming white wake etched the vessel through a sea, now reen, now blue, and told himself that depended. It depended upon the irl. If she wished for a fair ex-hange—he shrugged his shoulders. e would sacrifice himself to the fam-y pride. He would bury his hopes. ut he would not pretend to a passion e did not feel. Far out on the hori-on flitted the girlish ghosts of his outhful fancies. Mockingly they eemed to wave a farewell of white ands to him. His eyes shot out long-istance, good-humored smiles in re-irn. He felt a sense of confusion, lmost of disloyalty, at realizing how eerfully he left those airy figures. he real woman, the woman for whom man would fight with every inch of is manhood, had not yet challenged im. The Great Experience, before hich all others become dwarfed, had ot arrived. And if it should? His ews came together firmly. His shoul-ers lifted. He came of generations men who had died fighting for their dies. He would be true to the in-incts of his race.

He checked himself here with a eptical shrug. Experiences such as e had dreamed of did not fall to any. About him he saw harassed umanity, bravely making the best of ounterfeit affinities in lieu of genu-ne. The poetry, the fine aroma and ssence of life, was probably not for im. He must console himself with ne prose of an American princess. t least the binding would be beauti-il. His critical taste would discrimi-ate as to that. Yet how little ecompense, he thought, in possessing n edition de luxe in covers when—his humor as-erted itself—the pages within came to mean Paradise Lost."

He began to stroll the deck. Doubtless there ere million-dollar princesses on board among the uman freight. With a half scorn of his quest and whole-hearted interest in the new scenes ahead, he t his gaze fall politely, almost flatteringly, on the orms in the steamer chairs. He encircled the deck ithout seeing a face that invited a second scru-ny. In no eye did the spark of life beckon. oredom was written on those not frankly given ver to slumber. If he could have discovered only ne face, man or woman, to whom life was a thing be lived, the great and exciting adventure, he ould have found some way of opening communica-ons. If he found any interest expressed, any in-rrogation, it was a weary "How long? How long ust we endure each other and this daily, deadly, olling monotony, before we reach terra firma?"

The shouts of children at play on the deck below rrested him. He leaned on the railing and over-ooked the travelers of the second class. He saw at the shrill voices came not from children but from dwarfed men and women. He remembered that on the boat was a troop of midgets who were to appear in a spectacle in New York. Their antics amused him. He lingered by the rail. They seemed to be looking excitedly in one direction. He followed their eyes. Down the deck, at full speed, a girl was running. After her came two men midgets. In the stern the little company of dwarfs watching the race jumped up and down. "Come on! Come on! Come on!" they cried in a Southern European patois. On the girl flew. Ludwig could see her face now. Her cheeks were flushed. Her eyes smiled. She was enjoying to the full every ounce of energy she was expending. Here was some one who was really living! Before he realized what he was doing Ludwig was leaning over the railing cheering to hearten her, "Hasten, Made-

Drawn by Wilson C. Dexter

The girl came nearer and spoke rapidly moiselle, hasten! See! They are gaining on you!"

The girl heard the voice. Without looking up, she quickened her speed. A few yards more, and amid the delighted screeches of the little people, she touched the goal. Then she sank breathless upon a bench, the midgets swarming around her.

"Hide once more!" they pleaded. "Play hide-and-seek once more." She raised her eyes to the first-class passenger deck and met Ludwig's amused glance. Then she shook her head at the dwarfs and motioned with her hands for them to disperse. Ludwig, fearing that his presence embarrassed her, lifted his hat and left the rail.

When he had left the scene he could not tell whether or not the girl was pretty. Animation had been uppermost in her face. He remembered only a slender blue serge figure flying down the deck as not many girls could run, with the fresh, unspoiled joy of living radiating from her as she ran.

"I'd like to paint her as a modern Atalanta," he said. Like most foreigners trained to be non-useful, he had dabbled in art. "I'd—I'd like to race with her myself." Then he turned into the reading-room, and was soon lost to present events.

The next day, after wandering around idly all the morning, Ludwig was drawn, almost against his will, to the rail overlooking the second-class deck. The girl was there. She was reading to some American children. Her face looked grave now. He pronounced her interesting rather than pretty. He began to wish vaguely that she would be interesting, or might become interested—in him. Would she never look up? He wanted some sign of recognition from her. Just then she raised her eyes and for the space of a second met his glance directly. But, without the slightest indication of ever having seen him before, her eyes swept over him and wandered out to sea. He was not even an adjunct of the marine view! Her interst in him, as a human being, even after his interest of yesterday, was clearly nil. This was a novel experience. In Ludwig's little kingdom he had been a kind of Ahasuerus to whom every Esther only waited the lifting of his scepter to approach. He laughingly admitted that he liked this new attitude. He supposed it was American independence. And it spurred him on to attempt to conquer it.

The next morning he purloined a few lumps of sugar and went below to the second-class deck. The ponies used by the dwarfs in the New York performance were housed in the bow. As a means to an end he meant to cultivate the dwarfs. Only a few first-class passengers developed sufficient energy to see the ponies. The Italian stable boy was alone with them, save for a woman and one dwarf. Ludwig recognized the graceful figure. It was Atalanta! He was afraid she might think that he had followed her. But it was plain that she was not thinking of him at all. She was making the rounds of the ponies with her small escort, and was absorbed in reciprocating courtesies as he solemnly introduced her to each small horse.

"This my ponee, Babette," Pedro explained, stopping by a rotund little animal. "I ride heem—in show. Babette, smart Babette do tricks. But have care, Mademoiselle. Babette jealous. Babette ugly."

As he spoke Babette pointed her ears, rolled her eyes till they showed red, and snapped savagely at the girl's arm. Quick as a flash, something forced Babette's head upwards and held it firmly, while a voice of authority said: "Steady, Babette! Steady, girl!" For a moment the pony struggled, as Ludwig rose over her, still holding her by the mane, gazing steadily into her eyes. Gradually the pointed ears relaxed. Slowly the red disappeared from the eyes. Retaining his hold with one hand, Ludwig reached for a lump of sugar with the other. Babette ate the lump greedily and whinnied for more. Ludwig laughed boyishly, patting her face.

"Shake hands, Babette, and I'll give you more sugar." Babette hesitated. "Shake hands," the man who had mastered her insisted. Slowly the pony lifted a small hoof and put it daintily in Ludwig's palm.

"Good girl!" he said, shaking the hoof heartily and rewarding Babette with a second lump. "Nice Babette!" as the velvet nose rubbed his arm.

"You show-rider? You do trick?" asked the midget who had watched the scene in wonder. Ludwig smiled.

"No show-rider. Do tricks—a little—in army. Like horses—that's all."

The girl came slowly forward.

"I am greatly indebted to you," she said simply. "Babette meant mischief. She was jealous of Pedro's friendship for me." She smiled her thanks and turned to go.

"Must you go?" Ludwig found himself saying. "Won't you and Pedro tell me about the ponies? They are so clever. They seem a jolly lot."

Pedro, finding a sympathetic listener, slipped his hand fraternally into the blond giant's who had so wonderfully tamed Babette, and led Ludwig around the stalls, giving a dramatic account of the virtues and failings of each horse. The girl accompanied them. She had that unconscious poise of manner —or was it absence of manner?—that seemed to id him, although she was with- concealment. In their talks she ealed that she was a settlement rker, with a salary. Both her par- s were alive. Whatever their sta-, Ludwig felt that they must be tlefolk. Atalanta had that digni- l reserve and a certain freedom of diality, that are rarely united ex- t in those of assured birth.

Sometimes he led her to talk seri- ly of life and its purposes; of the vice she believed so passionately s required of each, while Ludwig ibed "a new set of values." Some- es they played and romped with lro and the other midgets, with om he had become the best of ends. A few times they sat in nce on starlit evenings, while Lud- bit his lip to keep back the words felt should not be uttered. The l's sanity, her freedom from the metry of the women to whom he had n accustomed, helped him. He was scious that marriage was not the amount issue of life to her. She s the only woman he had ever met o was in love with a Great Idea— idea of serving others.

Often she told him stories of the ttlement, the amusing side of the ldren's attitude towards her, as wn in brilliant gifts of paper es, or subtle attempts to duplicate idely her simple gowns. Sometimes told of the sodden, colorless lives the parents; of flashes of genius in ldren with no opportunity to fan spark; of childish figures, white- ed and pinched, exploited in work- ps, with no future but soul-destroy- toil—like that of their parents. even found himself longing to help , longing for power to transform idle park and forests into wealth at he might pour at her feet to do th as she chose.

He intended to . Hitherto she had met his earnest trenchment on the personal with a ile that acted as a gentle, restrain- hand holding him with a firm "not ." But she did not smile to-night. Moved by a sudden impulse, he said: ou know why I want to come, Ata- nta? I must meet your people."

"Wait," she urged. "Wait a week— month, till you have seen America."

"You do not mean that," he said ietly. "You know that waiting uld not signify. The men of our use know their own minds. I have en patient. It was not easy. I have spected your position. I must see u in your own home to-morrow ght."

She looked at his set face with its al of determination, and with a oman's soft pride on her own, said: Come, then, to-morrow night."

The next evening he went. He lived rough the day, getting his luggage t of the customs and settling him- lf in a sky-scraping hostlery which d been recommended. He ate a soli- ry dinner to a distracting musical companiment in the palm room. at it is doubtful if he saw the young omen who eyed openly the distin- tished stranger with the foreign air. He called a motor and gave the auffeur the address she had given m. He wore evening clothes, as he ad evenings on the steamer when he ught the lower deck, with a military pe thrown over them.

The motor stopped at a house simi- r to others in a block. He rang the or-bell. A man in livery responded.

"My man seems to have made a mistake," Ludwig said shortly. "This is not No. —, East Eighty-seventh Street, is it—the home of Miss Montrose?"

"That's our number, sir, but no such person lives here."

Ludwig consulted the address. It was certainly the one she had given him. He had been silently repeating it all day.

"I beg your pardon," he said, turning away stiffly. He did not wish the man to see the depth of his disappointment.

"Wait a moment!" A voice Ludwig knew well sounded over the footman's shoulder.

Behind the man stood Atalanta. He hardly knew her. A long, dark gown accentuated her slenderness, leaving her arms and throat bare. Ludwig stepped back as if caught in a steel trap. A quick, mad sense of having been fooled swept over him. He felt like beating a retreat.

"Jennings will take your hat," the girl said quietly. Her eyes commanded him. He surrendered his wraps to the man, and followed her into the long drawingroom. Soft lights cast a mellow glow over antique rugs and beautiful pictures. Over the girl's head his eye took in a masterpiece known the world over. His brows contracted.

"Are you — visiting here?" he queried.

Before she had time to reply, two people came from the vista of an adjoining room. The man was tall, with a bright, nervous glance and an imperious, alert manner. His face looked strangely familiar. The woman was small, and moved slowly as if conscious of her weight of jewels. From diamond tiara to glittering shoe buckles she sparkled—all except her eyes. They looked world-worn and weary.

"I want you to meet my parents. They are leaving for the opera," the girl said.

Ludwig went through the conventions of an introduction in some way. He had a vague recollection of the man, in a kind, businesslike manner, offering to put him up at the club; of the woman thanking him for having helped break the tedium of a voyage for her daughter, and hoping to have the pleasure of his company at dinner the following night.

When the front door had closed behind them, Ludwig strode to the girl.

"What game is this? Has the last week been merely a farce for you? Why have you been masquerading? Why aren't you what you appeared to be? Aren't you real?"

The girl threw back her head and looked at him fearlessly.

"Yes, I am real."

"Yet this is your home?" His eyes wandered again over the marbles and priceless porcelains scattered about.

"It is my father's home," she corrected.

"Idols of gold!" he quoted scornfully. "Why, the place reeks of them!" He checked an unpleasant laugh. "I would better bid you good evening."

She placed herself between him and the door.

"I could not tell you on shipboard," her voice delayed him. Her head drooped. "I could not spoil—that perfect week. It was all true what I told you. I am a settlement worker. I live with the workers on the East Side. This is not my home. It is only the accidental place where I stayed before I knew what was worth while."

"And your father's name?" he asked half dazed.

"Is Wallace Cunningham. Yes, the railroad king. I'm not proud of his title, nor of his fortune. I know too well the system under which it was built."

Wallace Cunningham! Ludwig knew now why the man's face was familiar. He had seen it often in public prints, not only as a railroad magnate, but as a philanthropist and connoisseur of art.

He sank upon a divan and covered his face with his hands. The girl came near and spoke rapidly.

"My father and I think differently about life. But he is fair. He lets me live in my own way. I don't belong here. I nearly stifle in these surroundings. There is no prosperity, no rest for me while I know of the life of this city below. I had always longed to travel second-class with the people I care for. The opportunity came suddenly, ten days ago. The friends who were to cross with me failed me. My father had engaged my stateroom. One thousand dollars was the price. We needed about that sum," her voice faltered, "for some work at the settlement. The captain knew me, knew my father. I persuaded him to make the change in staterooms, and give me the money. All the way he watched over me, kept my secret. To avoid publicity, I took my mother's name. When I saw your—your interest, I couldn't tell you the truth. There had been a procession of men who had cared for me—for my father's sake. I could not undeceive one who seemed to care for my own."

He removed his hands. His face looked haggard and years older.

"You don't understand," he said wearily. "I can't speak now."

Her eyes searched his.

"It isn't a pleasant confession, but you'll have to know it. I came to America to marry—something like this." His hands indicated the surroundings. "I came seeking 'Idols of Gold'."

"I divined it," she said quietly. "When the captain told me of your name, your people, my intuitions told me the truth. You would have sacrificed yourself for your people. But you threw your idols overboard when you went to the railing of the steamer that first day that we talked."

"Thank you," he said simply. "I think I did." He arose slowly.

"Will you excuse me now? I must adjust myself."

"Wait," she replied. "Do not go until I return."

She went swiftly upstairs. A maid removed the shimmering gown and brought her the blue serge of the steamer. In a few minutes, arrayed for the street, she returned to the drawing-room.

A gleam of gladness came into Ludwig's eyes when he saw her.

"Atalanta!" he breathed involuntarily. She went straight up to him. Her eyes glowed softly with the highness of her resolution.

"Every word that I spoke on the steamer was true. This is not my real home. But you had to see it. You had to see the place I had evolved from—left behind. I want you to know my real home—my work, my comrades. The car is waiting to take me back. Will you come?"

"Do you mean that?"

"Yes, but that's not all," she said softly. "It isn't often a woman asks a man to lead her life. Yet if the lifework is big enough for two, she can. I couldn't live in a toy kingdom. I couldn't spend my days flitting around a toy throne. Up to a few days ago, I had expected to live my life—do my work—alone. The man who follows me must be great enough to lose his life—to live and work with me, here."

"Will you let me try?" he eagerly asked. Her eyes shone with pride in him. In another moment he had taken her in his arms. When at last they moved toward the door, they were laughing like children to hide the mist that dimmed their eyes.

"Let's pretend we are motoring around the deck of the steamer," she said as they ran down the steps.

"We'll have Pedro for best man," he replied.

"To the Settlement," she told the chauffeur.

Ludwig handed her into the limousine and followed, still retaining her hand.

"To the new life," he said as the car glided through the glare of Fifth Avenue toward the darkness of the East Side.

after it has grown old in service. Now is the accepted time to determine if the States have gotten value received for the serious gift of a franchise to women. Let us see: In Utah, where women are truly in bondage, "they have not voted out polygamy. They did not vote out Senator Reed Smoot, a Mormon, when all the women in the country clamored for it. Twelve States do not allow children to work at night; Colorado, Wyoming and Utah have no such law. Twenty-eight States provide for factory inspection; Wyoming has none at all. Twenty-one States have juvenile courts, which they secured without the vote of women, except Colorado, in which last-named State the salaries of women teachers are lower than those of men teachers, while the husband and wife are jointly liable for the family finances. Thirty-eight States compel seats for women at work; Idaho has no such law. The best laws for women and children are not in the States where women vote."

This is a poor showing! A worse state of things than where men alone conduct the affairs of state and government. It can never be better, even though the suffragists sweep the country from Maine to Florida.

Women do not recognize the fact that "the overcoming of force or power must be by a greater force," and this they do not possess. They prove their weakness in the spectacular masquerade and show of a strength which they have not; in the splutter and noise and physical tactics they adopt. They seem to ignore the fact that the weapons with which their greatest victories have been won throughout all history have not been carnal, but the most powerful of all influences: gentleness, tenderness and goodness in life, which assert themselves only in some form of silent conflict, the "rôle that changes weakness into strength."

There should be a halt called now; acquiescence and encouragement should be withdrawn and women advised to return to their homes, where they are sadly needed, and to cast all their talents and influence there—to do the work which is their especial mission, and which cannot be consigned to men—a mission so great that if they should vote from now until doomsday they could not equal it in magnitude.

Women are needed in the homes to stem the tide of crime that is sweeping over the land—crime in high places as well as in the slums, which indicates the lack of right training of the young and the absence of high moral influence. These criminal boys and girls, men and women, have mothers upon whom rests the responsibility of right training. They have neglected their children, who are well-nigh motherless and homeless, and have allowed their race for so-called freedom to absorb all their time and interest, to the ruin of their own offspring, their country and themselves.

There may not be originality in stating that one must be either born to rule or trained through generations to rule, but there is great truth in it. The American woman, pampered, self-indulgent, without poise, lacking stability, impatient of restraint, highly emotional, undisciplined, has no claim to either.

AN APPEAL FOR THE WAR'S VICTIMS

ing freedom and protection for the Chris- and non-Christian inhabitants of Turkey. Samonov, our school has been for ten days f soldiers and we were unable to have our s. But 1,500 men come twice a day for their , as their kitchen is in our school-yard. ave been having Gospel meetings every for the soldiers and three times on Sun- The church was always full in spite of weather. Many of these men have never e heard the Gospel. Many of them were shed with New Testaments. They have all appreciative listeners. It has been a sea- of good sowing. May God bless the seed To-morrow these men leave for the ier, and five thousand more will come here.

ev. R. H. Markham writes from okov, Bulgaria (October 5):

The mandate was issued that y Bulgarian who had ever borne s should report within twenty- hours to the regiment in which he once served. Since Bulgaria is a tary kingdom, that order meant every able-bodied man of fighting should leave his work, his city, his family, and at once take up s. Every horse and wagon, every and cart were also demanded for tary service, and within five days garia was left a commonwealth of , old men and women, deprived of y laborer and every means of r.

Some thousands of peasants were ting in line before the barracks to ive their military clothes and arms. r by was a little group of women. looked very sad and downcast, and oldest one of the little group was ping. When questioned as to the se of her grief, she gave vent to a sionate outburst. She knew noth- of history nor of oratory, but she very decided opinions about this ilization.

'Why do I weep?' she cried. 'Why I weep? Do you see these four nen here with me? Do you see the ding babies which two carry on ir backs? We five are left alone, there in that line, waiting to ch into Macedonia, are my four s, the husbands of these women, fathers of these babies. At home ten more children! We have no ses, they are taken for the war. winter wood is in the for- yet we cannot haul it. No doctor eft in our village. Our school is t, our stores are closed. Our money scarce, and prices will double. r village is on the exposed frontier ard Turkev. Oh, you ask why I ! Because my cattle are taken, my ses are taken, my sons are taken, I I, an old woman, am left alone h helpless grandchildren.' And n followed an outburst against the cedonians, whom she blamed for her troubles. Very few women in lgaria are as vindictive as this old ther, but none of them are seen to ile, and many, many weep."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received appeal by cable from a committee evangelical Christians in Sofia, ing for aid for the sufferers by the ent war. Pastor Furnajieff, who chairman of the committee, is well wn to the readers of this paper as occasional correspondent for sev- l years. During the war along the cedonian border some seven or ht years ago, he, with Rev. Dr. rk, the American missionary, Pas- Popoff, and a number of others en- ged in missionary work, did excel- t service in connection with a relief d then raised by our readers. The r which has just broken out, how- r, is of such vast proportions that suffering is widespread. Even re distressing is the condition of the lows and orphans, who have been reaved of their natural protectors this terrible war. All through rvia and Bulgaria, as well as in re distant Greece and Montenegro, re are thousands of husbandless men, who are left in destitution h their little children. All kinds of foodstuffs have risen to famine prices. The heavy expenditures involved in the war against Turkey have strained the finances of the allies to the last point. The appeal is made to Christian America through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in behalf of the wounded and the destitute women and children, and it is hoped that it will not pass unheeded. Associated with Pastor Furnajieff in Sofia are other pastors and leading citizens of the Bulgarian capital, including Mr. Atanasoff, banker, Dr. Temcoff, physician, both graduates of the American mission. They will work in co-operation with the Balkan Red Cross in relieving the wounded, and will also include in their relief work the widows and orphans, as far as possible.

We invite all of our readers to have a share in this Christlike mission of life-saving and succor. War, with all its miseries, has visited these unfortunate provinces. It is not ours to question as to the issues involved; all we need to know is that tens of thousands of fellow-creatures are sick unto death, and that multitudes are helpless and starving. We desire that every reader sending a contribution should indicate whether it is to be applied toward the wounded or in aid of the widows and orphans. Address all contributions to the "Balkan Relief Fund," CHRISTIAN HERALD Office, Bible House, New York City. Every contribution will be duly acknowledged and forwarded by cable. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already cabled $250 to the Relief Committee in anticipation of the gifts of its readers. The masses of Servia and Bulgaria are of the Oriental Christian Church, but in this charity there will be no discrimination, and Serb, Bulgar, Montenegrin, Greek, and even Turk, if in distress, will be recipients of your bounty. Send a prayer with the gift, and a blessing will follow. Above all, send quickly.

NO MEDICINE

But Change of Food Gave Final Relief.

Most diseases start in the alimentary canal—stomach and bowels.

A great deal of our stomach and bowel troubles come from eating too much starchy and greasy food.

The stomach does not digest any of the starchy food we eat—white bread, pastry, potatoes, oats, etc.—these things are digested in the small intestines, and if we eat too much, as most of us do, the organs that should digest this kind of food are overcome by excess of work, so that fermentation, indigestion, and a long train of ails result.

Too much fat also is hard to digest and this is changed into acids, sour stomach, belching gas, and a bloated, heavy feeling.

In these conditions a change from indigestible foods to Grape-Nuts will work wonders in not only relieving the distress but in building up a strong digestion, clear brain and steady nerves. A Wash. woman writes:

"About five years ago I suffered with bad stomach — dyspepsia, indigestion, constipation—caused, I know now, from overeating starchy and greasy food.

"I doctored for two years without any benefit. The doctor told me there was no cure for me. I could not eat anything without suffering severe pain in my back and sides, and I became discouraged.

"A friend recommended Grape-Nuts and I began to use it. In less than two weeks I began to feel better and inside of two months I was a well woman and have been ever since.

"I can eat anything I wish with pleasure. We eat Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast and are very fond of it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Do Not Putter With a Corn

Don't pare it, for paring often causes infection. And it merely takes off the top layer.

Don't use petty, unscientific treatments. Such things bring only brief relief, and the corn goes on forever.

The modern way is Blue-jay. It is used today on a million corns a month.

It stops the pain instantly. Then a wonderful wax—the B & B wax—gently undermines the corn.

Within 48 hours the corn lifts out, without any pain or soreness.

This invention gives a way to end the corn forever—a simple, scientific way. Go now and get it. It is folly to have corns.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

THE "Answered Prayer column has strengthened my faith," writes Mrs. W. C. W., of Hamilton, Ont. That is exactly the purpose of the column. The people of God need many things, but what they need above everything else is faith. Faith grows as testimony is heard; what God does for some he will do for all, if they will put him to the test.

G. F. R., Pa., writes: "I wish to acknowledge that God has answered many prayers for me, and three very important ones lately. I will be very grateful to you for publishing this. I have had such a sick mother, and the Lord has so graciously restored her to health, and I want to acknowledge it in this way." This friend continues, very wisely: "With our meager knowledge we are not competent to judge what is best for us, and I thank him for some ungratified wishes, as I now see it was best for me."

"A great trouble hovered over me," writes a reader from Quebec, P. Q., "and I saw no way of escape. God has turned my sorrow into joy. I wish to thank him for his great mercy."

Another grateful mother writes from Virginia: "I wish to add my testimony to God's goodness. He has heard and answered my prayers for my boy and some friends. I am hoping and praying for still greater blessings."

H. W. writes from Vernon Center, N. Y.: "I wish to acknowledge a complete answer to prayer in God's taking from my life an affliction that had oppressed me over eighteen years." Mrs. S. M. D., Baltimore, Md., writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering many prayers, and especially in restoring three of my loved ones who were very ill." Here is the note of joy again: "I wish," writes M. S., from Crary, N. D., "to acknowledge that God has answered many prayers, and especially one which has made me very happy."

"Our son had undergone an operation and the doctors gave us no hope. We went to God in prayer, and he answered, and our son is well to-day. We praise his holy name." This letter comes from Mr. and Mrs. J. C. K., of Seaton, Ill. "Gospel measure" was in the answer to this prayer, acknowledged by H. E. W., Palmyra, N. Y., who writes: "I want to add my testimony to God's faithfulness in answering prayer. He has answered my prayer and given me a blessing greater than I could ask or think." Truly we have the same Lord to whom Paul prayed, and of whom he said that he "is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think."

Acknowledgment of answered prayer have also been received from:

Tomatoes and Lemons are Solvents; Green Vegetables are laxative, etc.

YOU like most people, are probably taking too much starchy food:—rice, bread, pastries, etc. Substitute plenty of lean tender meat, fowl, game, fish, curdled custard, green non-nourishing vegetables and juicy fruits in correct combination and quantities for your special needs for a few days or weeks, taking no starchy food, and you will be surprised at your gain—clearer eyes, stronger brain and a body more alert. Abstinence from starchy foods creates a much bigger appetite for meat, fruit and vegetables. If you take correct quantities of digestible brainy foods, YOU CAN INCREASE YOUR BRAIN POWER FOR ANY SPECIAL STRESS OF BRAIN WORK.

If people suffering from a slight or severe complaint were to take nothing but grapes, pears or other juicy fruits for a day, or if possible for longer, they would find their pains and abnormal symptoms decrease. Any person unable to digest juicy fruits needs special dietary advice.

Correct Natural Foods Restore Health

I have professed in myself the symptoms of various diseases by eating certain wrong foods, or, in the case of some symptoms, by taking certain right foods in excess, and I have restored myself to normal health in a few days by correcting my diet.

The great benefits of a temporary non-starch diet for sufferers from nearly all classes of diseases are explained in a most interesting way in four booklets:

(1) "The New Brainy Diet System. (2) Diet vs. Drugs. (3) Effects of Foods. (4) Key to Longevity. A correspondent writes:

"The lists of daily foods which increase brain power, promote longevity, cleanse congested liver, etc., are worth untold dollars."

THE NATION'S VOICE ON ROME

MORE LETTERS FROM PASTORS AND OTHERS ON THE PAPAL PLAN TO "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC"

THAT the discussion of the Romanist avowal of a purpose to "make America Catholic" is taking a wide range and exciting attention, not only in our pulpits and universities, but among all classes, is made evident from the many letters in the subject that continue to reach THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We print another instalment of them below:

Protestants Should Unite.

I AM delighted with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is indeed "toting fair" (using Southern brogue) with all Protestants—and no doubt would with the Roman Catholics if they would confine themselves to religion.

I have been a close observer of the political and other non-religious movements and activities of Romanism for twenty years—since I was eighteen years of age—and now, as an editor of an American country newspaper, I place the facts — some every week — before my readers. I feel it is my duty and God-given privilege, and as long as the Master grants my stay on His footstool, I shall continue. The American people, in their spirit of love and liberty, have been too careless, too unguarded, and have permitted the hierarchy to get our courts, law-making bodies and departments of our government in the clutches of the papacy.

I have met many good Catholic citizens—good people as men, however they may be as to religious convictions—but regardless of their good citizenship, they are bound to a foreign potentate, above loyalty to our nation; and though these good citizen-Romanists live on all sides of us, we cannot, as true patriots, hesitate to condemn the grasping, politico-religious organization which craves power to overpower our "Land of the Free."

I am a member of the "Disciples" (Christian) Church; but the word denomination should be cast to the four winds in dealing with this question. Our Protestant bodies should form one solid phalanx, with Christ as our commander, not the Pope! Why cannot the Protestant world unite on Christ, and with him as King and creed overthrow all the devices of the evil one, and thus counteract and repudiate that brazen plan to "make America Catholic."

The writer is but one of thousands who most assuredly will unite on this question and gladly support THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as well as all our religious press, in carrying this fight to the finish.

HERB LEWIS.

Gravette, Ark.

How a Canadian Author Regards Romanist Influence in American Politics.

THE only reason, besides the tolerance of Protestants, why we can live with Roman Catholics, is because there are so many of them who are better Christians and citizens than they are churchmen. But the policy and polity of Rome are ever the same, and wherever the rulers of the church think they can gain an ascendancy, they strike. Her position has been well described by Veuillot, whom Lecky quotes in his Democracy and Liberty: "When you are masters," said Veuillot, addressing Protestants, "we claim perfect liberty for ourselves, as your principles require it; when we are the masters, we refuse it to you, as it is contrary to our principles."

It has been well said that "the voice of history is the condemnation of the Church of Rome." She is everywhere the enemy of personal liberty in every shape or form, and every lover of religious and political freedom should earnestly oppose any advancement of this power in the land. The manner of opposition is difficult to determine. It is our policy to be tolerant and to give a fair field to all free citizens; and then it is a matter of faith that we should be kind, loving and hopeful of good. But when an organization enters a free country and arrogates to itself tyrannical authority over the lives of thousands of citizens, insults the purity of thousands of homes, and sweeps into illegitimacy thousands of well-born children, it seems as though the limit of tolerance had been reached and a time for firm but kindly action had come.

What has divided Protestantism to offer against a united church that has her altars in every land? Even the use of Latin in her services has its advantages, for it presents a means of communication to the stranger in a strange land. Is there a claim for parades and secret societies, even with a training with real arms? Who has surpassed Rome in these? Behold the greeting to Cardinal Farley in New York, the Congress procession in Montreal, with its miles and miles of flower-strewn streets, and with all manner of civil and military accompaniment! Behold the Knights of St. John in their parades in Toronto and Washington! Then, Rome enters all municipal and federal politics and brings all the pressure she can to obtain positions for her own children and to punish those who do not grant her her wishes. If Protestants put forth any such efforts, or decry Romanism in her machinations, they are dubbed "narrow" and "bigots" and enemies of free and fair play. But the Catholics may do it with impunity, or it is passed over with a shrug or a smile, "That's Catholics for you. They are always at it." Their political machinations ought to be severely met in that field, and wherever ecclesiastical pressure is apparent, it should be resented. I know of no other way in which Roman aggression can be met and the agents of Rome taught that they will not be tolerated in American politics.

The Diversion of Public Funds to Parochial Schools Should be Stopped.

THAT the Roman Catholics are endeavoring by all possible means to secure the ascendancy in political affairs in the United States is evident from the testimony of their leaders. The Protestant Church ought to unite in opposing all efforts to divert the public funds from our public school system to aid in any way the parochial schools of the Roman Catholic Church. The unhappiness and injustice manifest through the dictation of the Roman Church regarding the religious training of the children of mixed marriages is deserving of emphatic and continuous condemnation.

The Roman Church has always been a menace to the highest interests of our Christian civilization.

A Great Campaign of Publicity and Enlightenment the Best Means of Checking the Roman Peril, Writes Pastor Schoenfeld.

ROME, whereby we understand the papal system, the hierarchy, and the teachings specifically papal, is beyond a doubt, from the standpoint of evangelical Christianity, an evil, and from the standpoint of American democracy, a menace. "Has the time come when we must arise and with all vigor combat Rome?" There never was a time when this was not the duty of evangelical Christians and of loyal Americans, if Rome they rightly understood. The question of Rome's size and growth has, in my judgment, nothing to do with the attitude to be taken, except as it may compel one to realize how urgent and important is the zealous fulfilment of one's duty. In passing, let me say that the growth of Rome, except by accessions through immigration, appears to me a negligible item. Moreover, the mere size signifies nothing. In a moral combat the issue depends upon the moral purity and strength of the contestants and upon the arm of the Lord Almighty.

But right here it must be emphasized that, both as true Bible Christians and as true American citizens who realize the only right relation of church and state to be that of complete separation, neither interfering with the other in its proper sphere, we must distinguish between the fight against Rome on religious grounds, as a church, and the fight we must make against her on civic grounds, as a State, or as citizens pure and simple. Religious liberty for all, without exception or discrimination, is one of the fundamental teachings of Protestantism and one of the fundamental principles of our country. The Roman Catholic Church proclaims itself the only true and saving church of Christ. Hence she cannot do otherwise than strive to induce all men to embrace her teachings and enter her communion. And never can evangelical Christians or genuine Americans seek to deprive her of that privilege, unless it should appear that she endeavors to deprive others of the same privilege, or employs means and teaches doctrines by which she places herself in irreconcilable conflict with those principles upon which rest the sovereignty of the State, civil and religious liberty.

Every Christian worthy of the name must be intent upon the conversion and salvation of the whole world, and, to that end, upon the proclamation of the whole counsel of salvation revealed in God's Word, pure and undefiled, and hence upon the suppression and eradication of every error, particularly of such error as, in his conviction, subverts the very foundation of the Christian faith. Now, this is just what we believe the specific papal teachings to be, and hence we consider it a duty of love toward the Romanists themselves to uncover and prove their peculiar papal teachings soul-destroying perversions of the Gospel of Christ. We must, therefore, as a church, combat Rome; but as the work of the church is purely spiritual, so, also, we contend, no church is justified in fighting Rome, except with spiritual means, the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God. It was this Luther ever contended for and insisted on. And by no other means did he gain his tremendous victory than by teaching and preaching the Word of God, and by proving the teachings of Rome, attacked by him, contrary to and without foundation in Holy Writ.

Rome cannot object to our inquiring into the position into which she forces her members in relation to our government by her teachings on the sovereignty of the Pope, the right relation of church and state, the duties of Roman Catholics in civic matters toward the Pope and the church, and the proper sphere and functions of the state. Nor can any Romanists rightly object, if their fellow citizens, having by such inquiry reached the conviction that the Roman Church is not purely a church, limiting itself to spiritual purposes and spiritual means, but in very truth a religio-political organization, meddling with the business of the state, dictating the political action of its members, seeking political control and public subsidies, or special privileges and preferments, and that the laity and lower

How Palmolive Conquers Hard Water

Palmolive is able to do more than mere soap, because of two oils—Palm and Olive. These two oils are scientifically blended in Palmolive. This is why Palmolive is so different from any other soap. This is why it produces a full, creamy lather in hard water as well as soft.

Palmolive thoroughly cleanses, then nourishes. The oils do this. Famous historical beauties used olive and palm oils for their complexions. Today these two beautifying oils are blended in a pure soap—Palmolive.

Free Jar of Palmolive Cream

Send us a band from a cake of Palmolive Soap and we will send a sample jar of this beauty-bringing face cream.

Large Size 50c

Baby's First Bath is in Olive Oil

The first bath an infant gets is in olive oil—before water is allowed to touch the sensitive skin.

Then Nurse and Doctor prescribe Palmolive for the child's future bath. For they know Palmolive contains the needed olive oil. Since Palmolive is the best soap for baby's delicate body, you may be sure it is the best for yours.

Unwrap a cake of Palmolive. Observe the light green hue the oils give it. There is no artificial coloring in Palmolive.

Note the inviting fragrance—the dainty Oriental odor—the suggestion of rare oils and spices. It's pure enough to eat!

Palmolive costs less at 15c than many mere soaps at a lower price, for it remains firm and compact even when reduced to the thinnest wafer.

ergy submit to all manner of politi- l interference and dictation by the gher clergy, and especially by him o claims not only supreme spiritual vereignty, but also supreme tempo- l sovereignty, raise a loud outcry d take a determined stand against e Roman Church as a political ma- ine and against the individual Ro- anist as an untrustworthy citizen. e duty of every loyal citizen is ithfully and fearlessly to uphold the ndamental law and principles of the untry against all inimical forces, if cessary against his own church. st so, every citizen must take an en stand against every fellow citi- n whom he finds, no matter through at influence, in disagreement with e fundamental principles of our untry.

Carefully examining the teachings Rome, the decrees of the Popes and e public pronouncements of its prel- es high and low, and finally the ac- al doings of the Romanists, who can se his eyes to the fact that Rome is menace to our country, to all true mocracy and to genuine civil and ligious liberty? And this because she tally disagrees with the fundamen- l conceptions and principles of any al democracy and of true American- n, does not stand for a free state d for freedom of all churches and ligions in the state, for complete paration of church and state, and r the freedom of the individual citi- n in the exercise of his citizenship, r for freedom of speech and free- m of the press, but claims for the erarchy, and for the Pope in par- ular, sovereignty in all matters, mporal no less than spiritual, and, cordingly, strives in making Amer- a dominantly Catholic, to secure r herself, and specifically for her erarchy, dominance in all matters, subjugate the state and make an d of all liberty, as understood by nuine Americans.

Why else should the Roman prel- es not be satisfied with the freedom establishing and maintaining their vn parochial schools, and instead rever demand what they claim their share of the public school nds, and demand, too, that all edu- tion be turned over to the Roman atholic Church? Why else denounce e public school as ungodly and orse and call for its early destruc- on, since, under the principle of com- ete separation of church and state, l religion must be excluded from all ate schools and all parents be left ee, if dissatisfied with the State hools, to establish schools to their vn liking? Why else, though de- ouncing the public school as vile and cious, should they yet permit and ven urge their people to become achers in and trustees of these hools and members of the boards of lucation? Why else should they for- er seek public subsidies for their aritable and other institutions and r their nuns the right to teach in overnmental schools and institutions their nun's garb, and in divers ays endeavor to incline the pupils id inmates toward Romanism? hy else declare that "our govern- ent will never be right until more omanists are elected and appointed public office, local, State and na- onal"? Why else demand public and ficial recognition for those whom ey please to call "princes of the ood"? Why else discriminate in olitics and business against all who e not Romanists, or who will not un- ly favor them? Why should they ek to inject Romanism into every olitical election and campaign? Oh, es, we well know what retort will be ade; the assertion: "You compel us do this in self-defense, since you rever cry out against us as though, ecause of our faith, we must be ared as dangerous characters, and r the protection of all that is dear to e American heart should be barred from all public offices." That such outcry has been made who will deny? But ere the Romanists can plead such outcry and the action resulting therefrom as an excuse for their demands and behavior, they will have to be able to show that the charge made against them is not warranted by the facts in the case.

As often as a cry of warning is raised against Rome's political pretensions and machinations, the Romanists cry back: "You are attacking our church, our religion." How can it be otherwise, since by its doctrine on "the power of the keys" the Church of Rome becomes a political body, and a political body utterly at variance with all that is fundamental and essential in American democracy? It was the knowledge of this fact that moved the great patriots of former days to utter their oft quoted warnings to the American people to watch over their liberties and to vigorously resent and resist the first onslaught made upon the principles of American democracy.

We have no hatred against the Romanists. We desire peace with all men and we wish the Romanists to enjoy the same rights, liberties and privileges as ourselves. But we also mean to retain for ourselves and those who shall follow us the precious rights and liberties we now possess and enjoy. We desire the American Republic to continue as the home of the free and the haven of refuge for all who may be persecuted elsewhere—especially if persecuted because of their faith or religion—until the end of time.

What then shall and must we do? We must, first of all, seek to unite all loyal patriots that we may oppose to Rome's united strength a superior force, frustrate her improper meddling in politics, prevent her intimidation and domination of politicians and public officers, newspapers and business men, make an end of her threat of boycott against all who resist her unjustifiable encroachments, political and otherwise, and we must make an end likewise of her attempts to suppress and crowd out from publications, schools, colleges and libraries all history, ancient or modern, which, while true, yet reveals her in an unfavorable light. We must unite to keep the Roman Catholic Church from getting into the public trough. "No land grants, no money grants or subsidies for sectarian or church-owned and controlled institutions whatsoever," must be our slogan. And we must unite to compel all public servants to stand out against Rome and to uncompromisingly enforce our laws and principles, and to maintain and protect our American institutions. We must unite in an effective, country-wide educational campaign, draw the Romanists out into the open, seek to truly Americanize them and thus induce them to join us in standing for the complete separation of church and state, and to demand of their church to recant what is in opposition thereto, and to cease meddling with politics and the business of the state; in short, to limit herself to the conduct of religious or spiritual work by means that are purely spiritual.

A TEXAS READER'S VIEW

The rule of life seems to be to make known our complaints under all circumstances, and to refrain from words of praise except on rarest occasions. I wish to violate this rule and take enough of your time to say to you that I appreciate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more than any magazine or periodical that comes to my desk. The first two things that receive my attention are the sermon and the editorial department, but every line in the paper is worth reading. The cover page is always a thing of beauty, and it inspires us to seek better things. Christianity in New York City and in Texas should be the same.

May your efforts be blessed with success.

Moses and Elijah were sent from heaven chiefly, no doubt, to represent the court of heaven in the earthly coronation of Christ. Probably everybody would say the selection of Moses was inevitable in such a case. He is the greatest of the mortals of any age—so recognized when we hear in heaven "the song of Moses and the Lamb" (Rev. 15: 3). He reached the Land of Promise at last by a bridge from Pisgah to Hermon through heaven, reminding us that every noble yearning unfilled on earth shall be in some way fulfilled in heaven. It is more surprising that for the other heavenly delegate, Elijah, the rough countryman was chosen, rather than Isaiah, the eloquent scholar. The choice puts a great endorsement upon moral and civic reform work, to which Elijah was most of all devoted. "It would appear as if they had been sent to comfort the Saviour, and perhaps (as afterwards the Saviour himself did to the two disciples going to Emmaus) to show him 'in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself'—how his sacrifice was foretold in the prophets and prefigured in the offerings of the tabernacle and the temple."

The profoundest truth in all this story is that Jesus at this coronation hour looked from Hermon forward to Calvary as the real end and object of his earthly mission, and "spake of his decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem." What beauty this incident gives to the words about him in Hebrews 2: 9, "Crowned with glory and honor, that by the grace of God he should taste death for every man." It is the coronation of self-sacrifice—the same truth that is pictured in Revelation by a throne on which was "a Lamb as it had been slain."

Some one has coined the phrase, "the ecstasy of self-sacrifice," which might fitly be used as the title of the Transfiguration. There is little real joy in selfishness—only a temporary pleasure. Ecstasy waits for Christ-like, unselfish service.

"The transfiguration was the culmination of Christ's perfect life in the flesh; and his ascension might then have followed had it not been that he had taken on him the sin of the world for which he must die. As he was to be Lord and Saviour of both the living and the dead, it was meet that he should be glorified from both conditions."

"It is good to be here." The three apostles, unable yet to understand how their Messiah could be both a sovereign and a sufferer, had fallen asleep, but were awaked when Christ's glory struck their faces, and Peter, seeing that Moses and Elijah were planning to leave, declared: "It is good to be here, and if thou wilt let us build three booths, that Moses and Elijah, as well as our Master, may remain long to make us happy on this glorious mountain top." But the apostles became "sore afraid," as a bright cloud immediately swung low like a chariot and bore Moses and Elijah from sight, in swift rebuke for Peter's words that seemed to rank Moses and Elijah as equals with Christ. Out of the cloud came a voice, in more specific rebuke: "This [not Moses or Elijah] this is my Son, my Chosen, hear ye him. And when the voice came, Jesus was found alone." Here is the resting-place for any troubled by discussions about the Old Testament—"Hear ye him." Turn to the Gospels and see what Jesus said, and rest on that. The highest reason is to accept his word on whatever he speaks as the supreme specialist on religion by almost universal acclaim, using our imperfect human reason only on the things of which he has not spoken.

Alarmed at Christ's grandeur, the apostles were comforted by his "Be not afraid." This vision was their preparation to bear the shock of the crucifixion, and of their own martyrdoms later.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Mrs. E. B., Winfield, Ia. Please explain Mark 13: 20. Who are the "elect" spoken of?

The elect are those who truly believe—the whole body of true believers. Election into the family of God is through personal faith, and as it is the divine will that none should perish, and that "whosoever will may come," all who come in repentance and faith are assured of acceptance. "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." The "eternal decree" of election, therefore, means clearly an eternal purpose to elect, in pursuance of a plan which offers salvation to all who voluntarily accept in contrition, repentance and faith. It is in no sense to be understood as implying arbitrary selection of certain individuals to eternal life without cause or condition. Those who repent and believe are of the chosen, or the elect, it being the divine purpose to save all who meet these conditions. Why else are we commanded to "make our calling and election sure"? Scripture has no record of an elect unbeliever.

G. P., Valencia, Kan. 1. Please interpret Luke 14: 26. 2. Scripture often speaks of God being sorry for what he has done or said. What is the meaning?

1. A better meaning is found in the parallel passage in Matt. 10: 37, which is to be accepted as the true rendering. The sense to be conveyed is that we should be willing to give up all that is nearest and dearest for his sake, when the test comes. 2. Though, in a sense, speaking after the manner of men, God is said to have repented, this needs explanation to make it clear. The writer in Genesis describes God in anthropomorphic terms, simply because these terms were the only ones that could be understood by men. But God does not change (Num. 23: 19; James 1: 17) nor is he affected by sorrow as all men are. He has set up his statutes for the sons of men and his laws for the government of the universe; yet he has left man free to choose between good and evil. When man sins mightily and persistently (see Gen. 6: 5) then God's retributive laws come into operation. He is then interpreted as changing, i. e., his mercy and long-suffering having been exhausted. He is now to show himself a God of judgment.

N. J. D., Moore's Hill, Ind. 1. What is the meaning of Isa. 51: 6? 2. What is a Sabbath day's journey (Acts 1: 12). 3. What were the "high places" so often spoken of in the Old Testament? 4. What was the "shew-bread"?

1. It was a forecast of the purification by fire through which the present earth and its surroundings will have to pass (II. Pet. 3: 7-10) to prepare them for the eternal state to follow (II. Peter 3: 13); a change, a transformation and not annihilation. 2. A Sabbath day's journey was the prescribed distance that might be traveled by a Jew without violating the sanctity of the Sabbath (see Ex. 16: 29). It was approximately three-quarters of a geographical mile, and in any case not to exceed 2,000 yards. 3. They were the places usually chosen for temples or altars of heathen worship. 4. The consecrated bread, made in twelve cakes or loaves, which lay upon a table within the ark in the tabernacle. It was unseen by the people and lay in the sanctuary and was eaten by none save the priests as a part of a solemn rite.

P. J., Morgan, Minn. The printed article you enclosed, discussing the character and location of heaven, shows that the writer has not given much thought to the subject. To indicate the location of the future world is, humanly speaking, impossible. It is, as has been disclosed to us, the abode of God's highest spiritual creation. "My Father's House," Jesus called it, with "many mansions"; it is the "place prepared" for all who love and serve the Lord here when they are ready to pass over yonder. Where it is, we may conjecture but cannot determine; if God in his wisdom had seen fit to inform us, we should know, but he has not done this. For the rest, as to its location, we are satisfied to leave all to be disclosed in His own good time, remembering that the reality of heaven is attested by the Saviour who said: "If it were not so, I would have told you."

A. S. T., Feeding Hills, Mass. Are we to understand that Matt. 5: 42 and Luke 6: 30 are to be understood and practiced literally? Should we not ask for the return of articles lent people who never voluntarily return borrowed goods or money?

The beautiful precepts of the Sermon on the Mount become intelligible only as we accept the foundation principle upon which the whole structure of Christian ethics is reared—namely, that we should, not in a formal, perfunctory way, but in a genuine and definite and practical fashion, love our neighbor. To love another means to be heartily interested in his welfare, to care for his comfort and advantage. But a Christian has many duties aside from those to thoughtless or covetous neighbors or strangers; he must "provide for those of his own household"; he must take care of his possessions and instruments with which he is fulfilling his obligations and doing his work.

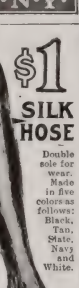
UWANTA



$1 SILK HOSE

Low Price Superior Quality

Double sole for wear. Made in five colors as follows: Black, Tan, Slate, Navy and White.

Silk Hose for Women—with a GARTER-PROOF TOP OR WELT—

Knit on two separate machines—the stocking proper and this Garter-Proof ribbed top, which extends over the knee, where the strain comes. This means if a "ladder" or a "run" starts in the top it cannot go beyond. Think of what a saving in your stocking bill this would make! Ordinarily, once a run is started it spoils the looks of the stocking. Not so with UWANTA SILK HOSE—Besides this splendid feature: Being knit on two machines, the top section makes special provision for the knee, giving great elasticity just where it is necessary and preventing the families bursting of the hose when kneeling. The UWANTA has all the advantages of a seamless stocking—no seams under the foot—but, unlike any other seamless stocking on the market, has perfect fit—it hugs the ankle and fits everywhere without the seam under the foot or at the back, which is absolutely necessary in a full fashioned hose.

The leg and foot of this hose are made of 20 threads of the best Japan tram silk. The sole and ribbed top are of 4 threads of best silk lisle, heel and toe of 6 threads; will wear longer than any ladies' hose on the market. The dyes is the very best and we guarantee fast colors. We also make this hose in Silk Lisle for 25c; Heavy Silk Lisle—double sole, high spliced—3 pairs for $1.00, and Spun Silk at 50c. We send these postpaid upon receipt of price and willingly refund money or send a new pair upon receipt of unsatisfactory hose.

AGENTS WANTED to cover every city and town to sell this line of Men's and ladies' hosiery. We also make a full line of Men's Hosiery, all high grade, protected by our trademark and guarantee. Write for territory and terms.

A housewife, for instance, is under no obligation to lend an improvident neighbor things that she needs for her own children. And if she does lend such things she is justified in asking for their return. Again, we have a right to consider the welfare of the person who asks to borrow; often lending would do him harm, just as indiscriminate almsgiving sometimes does harm. Our real concern must be for the best interests, spiritual, mental, physical, of our brother. We must genuinely love him; then use prayerfully our judgment in the details of our dealings with him.

V. R. C., Latonia, Ky. Describe the present flag of the United States.

The official flag of the United States now consists of seven red and six white stripes, and a blue canton on the field of which are arranged six rows of stars, eight stars in each row. Before the admission of Oklahoma and New Mexico (July 4, 1912) there were six rows of stars, so arranged that the first, third, fourth and sixth rows had each eight stars and the other two rows seven stars each.

discarding the traditional frock coat and silk hat. He regarded the work of the Senate as a business to be conducted in as matter-of-fact fashion as any other serious business enterprise, such as the many commercial enterprises with which he was identified as officer or director.

Mr. Sherman was a man of such striking and unfailing geniality that he won, among his political and business associates, and even to some extent among the public, the affectionate soubriquet of "Sunny Jim." That he was brave as well as genial was evidenced in his insistence upon making his set speech of acceptance when the renomination for the vice-presidency was tendered him on August 21, against the urgent advice of his physician, on which occasion he stood in the hot sun and spoke for more than half an hour, and in insisting, in spite of a definite command from the doctor, upon leaving his home to register at the polls not more than two weeks before his death. Mr. Sherman's death left his party leaders in great perplexity. His name had already been printed on the ballots in many States, and while the National Republican Committee had the authority to name a substitute, it was too late to do so. Neither legislation nor precedent has been found which could guide in the present perplexity.

General Notes

—ONE OF THE LEADING papers in Texas, the Waco Times-Herald, discussing the question of the Romanists' plan to "make America Catholic," refers to the symposium of views presented in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as "for the most part a fair and temperate discussion of the issue." The Times-Herald regards it as "a thing incredible" that the Roman Catholic prelates and press would deliberately set themselves to work to unite the Church and State in this country." It has heard from the lips of Catholic priests a disavowal of any such intention. Doubtless there are men within the Roman Church who disapprove of that church's political propaganda; but they constitute a very small minority. If the Times-Herald will take the trouble to look into the subject more thoroughly, it will reach a different conclusion. There is no more vital topic challenging the serious attention of the American press than this, and it would be well for every fair-minded newspaper—such as we take the Times-Herald to be—to investigate the matter fully with an open mind, and then let the people know its judgment.

—THE SUBJECT of the "Second Coming of Christ" is attracting much attention both in England and this country, especially in view of the threatened dismemberment of Turkey in Europe. Recently a Sunday was set apart by the Ministerial Union at Denver (Col.) when twelve ministers preached upon the subject from a Scriptural point of view. The movement attracted general interest, the churches were crowded and the newspapers next day devoted whole pages to the subject. A similar concerted gathering took place in London, England, a short time ago. A movement has been set on foot in New York, in which it is hoped upon a given Sunday united action may be taken which will not only stir the metropolis to an interest on the subject, but that other cities may catch the fire. Such representative preachers as Drs. C. Woelfkin, pastor Fifth Avenue Baptist Church; J. Haldeman, First Baptist Church, and Dr. A. B. Simpson, of the Christian and Missionary Alliance, are taking an active interest in the matter, while the Rev. J. H. Jowett, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, has the matter under special consideration. It is proposed to form a Prayer Union with the object of making special supplication to God that interest in the general subject may spread. Rev. A. Sheldrick, who has been lining up the churches in New York, will be glad to receive the names of any wishing to join this prayer union or offering any suggestions. He may be addressed to the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE FLAG IS A BEAUTY

We received the flag O. K., and we thank you for it. It is certainly a beauty, and the paper is getting better all the time. It is liked by every one who sees it. After reading mine I give it to a friend. He, after reading, takes it to the almshouse for the inmates there to read, and the good Lord only knows what good is accomplished by it. We recommend it to all.

OUR YOUNGER READERS

THE national anthem of Japan, among all other national anthems, is said to be the most poetical and the most spiritually lovely. Translated into English it is like this:

Until this little grain of sand,
Tossed by each restless wave,
Shall grow to a cloud-girt mountain,
Towering above the land;
Until the drop of morning dew,
Beading this blossom's rim,
Swell to a mighty river,
In age upon age untold—
Joy unto joy add manifold
For our blest Sovereign's sake.

AN ANNIVERSARY LETTER

In Which There Is a Prize Offer to All Boy and Girl Readers of The Christian Herald

MY DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: With this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it is two years since we have been having pleasant times together in our Cozy Corner. Two short years ago this big and lively department was only a dream, an ideal. To-day the dream is a delightful reality, and the ideal, like all true ideals, is darting farther ahead, leading us onward toward what beautiful goal who can tell? Perhaps the very best token that I can give you at this anniversary time is the assurance that dreams, best of dreams I mean, do come true. Faithfully held to and backed up by high purpose and unselfish work, dreams change themselves into real things, and on the radiant ladder of our visions and hopes our lives broaden out and become more useful. Do not be afraid to have dreams and hopes, ideals and visions, my boys and girls; but rather be regretful if you haven't them.

As an anniversary gift to be backed up with one stroke of high purpose on your part, I want to send to each and every member of the Cozy Corner a group of eight beautiful pictures in colors. The pictures are 15x12 inches in size, and are all ready to passepartout and hang up in your room. Our space here is too limited to tell you anything further about them, but if you will send me a letter saying that you would like to have the eight lovely pictures, and are willing to do the one single stroke of purposeful work of which I shall tell you, I will have them sent to you, with my love, for Thanksgiving Day.

Wishing you all good luck and trusting that God will speed us with delight and purpose on our new year of good times in the Cozy Corner, I am

Ever lovingly and faithfully yours,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

P.S.—A Pretty Experiment

FILL an ordinary tumbler with perfectly clean water, and with a sharp knife scrape from the inside of a lump of gum camphor a few small slivers into the water. The camphor will go through all kinds of curious and rapid motions until you will declare that the slivers are alive. If you want them to stop dancing, dip a toothpick in turpentine or other thin oil, and touch the end to the surface of the water. The bits of camphor will instantly stop dancing, and this experiment will show you with what wonderful rapidity oil spreads over the surface of water.

WHO GIVES US OUR THANKSGIVING DINNER?

ON THANKSGIVING DAY little Dorothy said,
With many a nod of her wise curly head,
"The cook is as busy as busy can be,
And good-natured too; oh, 'tis easy to see.
She gives us our Thanksgiving Dinner."

"Oh, no, little Dorothy," answered the cook;
"Just think of the trouble your dear mother took
In planning the dinner and getting for me
The things that I cook; so 'tis mother, you see,
Who gives us our Thanksgiving Dinner."

But mother said, smiling, "You are not right yet;
'Tis father who gives us money to get
The things for our Thanksgiving Dinner."

But father said: "I earn the money, 'tis true;
But money alone not a great deal can do.
The butcher, the grocer, whose things we must buy,
Should not be forgotten, for they more than I Will give us our Thanksgiving Dinner."

What Makes it Spin, I Wonder?

But the jolly old butcher laughed long and laughed loud:
"That tender fat turkey does make me feel proud;
The one for your dinner; but then you must know,
The turkey was raised by the farmer; and so
He gives you your Thanksgiving Dinner."

Then mused little Dorothy full of surprise,
And feeling that now she had grown very wise:
"But yet all the others had something to do;
The miller and butcher and grocer helped too,
And father and mother and good-natured cook;
I never before knew how many it took
To give us our Thanksgiving Dinner."

But what do you think? Had she found it all out?
Or was there still more she might learn about
Who gives us our Thanksgiving Dinner?

Delicious Drinks made with Welch's

Welch Grape Punch

For a dainty, unfermented punch, take the juice of three lemons, juice of one orange, one pint of Welch's Grape Juice, one quart of water, and one cup of sugar. Add sliced oranges and pineapple and serve cold. This simple recipe makes a drink that has never been surpassed.

Sparkling Punch

One pineapple, four cups of sugar, three cups of boiling water, one cup of freshly made tea, six lemons, six oranges, two cups of Welch's Grape Juice, two quarts of charged water. Grate the pineapple and add to boiling water and sugar and cook fifteen minutes, then add tea and strain. Cool, add fruit juice and turn into punch bowl, and before serving add charged water.

Welch Grape Ball

Many people, especially men, do not want a sweet drink, but they want something with a tang to it and something that really satisfies thirst. The addition of a charged water to Welch's, say half and half, gives a drink with snap and sparkle. Use an eight-ounce glass, in which place the grape juice, adding a lump or two of ice and the charged water.

Camel's Hump

Use tall glasses. Allow half as many lemons as there are persons to be served. Wash and dry lemons, peel with continuous rind, taking in such a manner as to leave a round knob or hump at each end. Cut in two at center, and hang half of a rind in each glass, permitting the "hump" to hook over edge of glass. Put two tablespoonfuls of crushed ice in bottom of each glass, add one teaspoonful of lemon juice to each glass, pour on one-third of a glass of chilled Welch's Grape Juice, and fill glass with chilled charged water. Serve this very refreshing beverage with two straws in each glass.

Grape Lemonade

For each quart of well-sweetened lemonade allow a cup of Welch's Grape Juice. Chill and serve.

Welch's Grape Juice Served Plain

Served alone, Welch's Grape Juice is most attractive and delicious. See that it is chilled properly, that the glasses in which it is served are also cold, and select those which are attractive in form and fine in texture.

In serving Welch's Grape Juice place the glass on a small dainty plate covered with a paper lace or drawn-work doily, and lay two drinking straws tied with narrow violet ribbon across the plate. A sweet wafer or salted biscuit may be added.

Fruit Cocktail

Fruit cocktails are delicious, served at the commencement of a meal.

Fruits
One tablespoonful confectioner's sugar.
Welch's Grape Juice.

Place a spoonful of chipped ice in the bottom of small punch glasses, arrange ice cold fruits upon the ice and cover with a rich fruit juice. Welch's Grape Juice will be found invaluable in the making of fruit cocktails, as it is deliciously palatable, blends well with all fruit juices and is always ready for instant use. Use to a glass, four or five large sliced strawberries, a tablespoonful of shredded orange pulp with a little of the juice, a teaspoonful of sliced pineapple, and bits of banana and peaches, cherries and white grapes. Sift over each glass a tablespoonful of confectioner's sugar, and fill with Welch's Grape Juice and any other fruit juice one may prefer, using equal quantities.

A Grape Mint Julep

This fascinating summer beverage is making a decided hit, especially in Southern circles. Into about half a glass of Welch's Grape Juice crush the tips of about twenty mint leaves (don't use the stems), add a teaspoonful of sugar. After this has "drawn" for about two minutes strain into a tall glass filled with ice cracked about the size of a walnut. Add two straws of orange and serve with sprigs of mint sticking out of the glass, so that in drinking one must bury the face in fragrant mint.

Welch's with Olive Oil

When you take olive oil do it in this delightful way—pour two ounces of Welch's Grape Juice in a small glass and add the olive oil—really delicious.

Welch Grape Paste

Break one ounce of white sheet gelatine in pieces, add three-fourths cup of Welch's Grape Juice, cover and let stand two hours.

Put one pound of granulated sugar and one-half cupful of water in an agate saucepan, bring to the boiling point, add the gelatine, again bring to the boiling point, and let simmer twenty minutes. Remove from the fire and add the grated rind of one-half orange and three tablespoonfuls of lemon juice.

Rinse a pan with cold water, pour in the mixture through a sieve to one inch in depth, and let stand in cold place until firm. Remove from the pan, cut in cubes and roll in confectioner's sugar.

The Appropriate Beverage —

Welch's Grape Juice

"The National Drink"

The many delightful ways in which Welch's may be served in the home circle and at the family table make it a part of the good cheer of the household.

The hostess who serves Welch's as a beverage or dessert at her informal or formal social affairs knows that she is adding the happiest sort of touch to her hospitality.

Welch's is the pure, unchanged juice of the finest Concords. It brings to you the freshness and deliciousness of these splendid grapes with all the health-giving qualities that Nature has put into them.

On this page we give part of the recipes found in our beautiful booklet, "The Hostess and Welch's Grape Juice." In addition to the many recipes for dainty desserts and beverages there are suggestions for social affairs. The booklet will be mailed to you free on request.

Do more than ask for "Grape Juice"— say "WELCH'S"—and get it

If, for any reason, you cannot buy Welch's of your dealer we will ship a case of a dozen pints, express prepaid east of Omaha, for $3.00. Sample 4-ounce bottle, mailed, 10c.

Dainty Desserts made with Welch's

Welch Grape Sherbet

Welch's Grape Juice, one and one-half pints; water, two pints; sugar, one and one-half pounds; juice of three lemons. Freeze medium stiff. Take the whites of two eggs, and two tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar, beat thoroughly, then stir the froth into sherbet. Freeze as hard as possible; remove the dasher and stand aside for an hour or so. Be careful to pack well. The best mixture for all freezing is four parts ice to one part coarse salt.

Welch Grape Ice Cream

One pint Welch's Grape Juice, one quart fresh cream, one pound granulated sugar. Bring one-half cream to a boil in a double boiler and add all the sugar. When cool add other half of cream and grape juice. Freeze.

Welch Grape Water Ice

Welch's Grape Juice, one pint; juice of two lemons; juice of two oranges; water, one quart; granulated sugar, one pound. If the water and sugar are brought to a boil, then allowed to cool, the water ice will be found to have a smoother consistency when frozen. Freeze slowly.

Grape Juice Macaroon Cream

Place one and one-half dozen macaroons in a serving dish and sprinkle with one-half cup of Welch's Grape Juice. Place one pint of milk in a double boiler, add one-half cup of sugar and two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, which has been dissolved in a little cold milk. Cook ten or fifteen minutes, add a few drops of violet or orange extract, and when cool, pour over the macaroons. Set on ice to chill before serving.

Grape Tapioca

Mix one-half cup of quick-cooking tapioca and good half cup granulated sugar. Then take one pint Welch's Grape Juice and one-half pint water. Boil grape juice and water together. When this has reached a boiling point, add the tapioca and sugar. Stir until thoroughly mixed, and boil for three minutes. Pour in molds, cool, and serve with cream.

Grape Juice Bake

Pare and core apples for baking; place in pan, fill core space of each with granulated sugar, a good teaspoonful of Welch's Grape Juice, top with a piece of butter the size of a bean, and grate over a little nutmeg. Bake until apples are tender, basting a couple of times with the syrup which forms, and serve as first course for breakfast, or with whipped cream, as dessert for dinner or luncheon. Especially tasty and healthful.

Serving Grape Fruit

The grape fruit must first be prepared in the usual way. Powdered or confectioner's sugar is heaped lightly on the fruit, and its amount should be gauged by the flavor. Pour over the sugar two or three teaspoonfuls of Welch's Grape Juice. The fruit should be thoroughly chilled before serving, and the Welch's Grape Juice given time to permeate both sugar and pulp before bringing to the table.

Grape fruit prepared in this way is a delightful substitute for the soup course at the home dinner table. It is equally delicious as a dessert served surrounded by shaved ice and garnished with halved white grapes or candied cherries.

For Coloring

The use of Welch's Grape Juice as a harmless coloring matter will open delightfully dainty possibilities in the way of elaborating and decorating all sorts of desserts, puddings, cakes and home confections. By adding the fruit juice drop by drop, just the desired shade of violet may be obtained, from palest lavender to deepest purple violet, and this not only in the case of coloring icing for cakes, ice cream, etc., but a plain lemon jelly may be colored in the same manner, or the batter for a layer of "ribbon" cake, or the dough for a batch of violet cookies. In making marble cake part of the batter can be tinted lavender with Welch's Grape Juice, making a very dainty loaf cake.

Added to Mince Meat

Mince meat is also much improved by the addition of a cupful of Welch's Grape Juice instead of the rose water or fruit juices from home-canned fruits that are usually added. The use of brandy, cider or liquors of any sort is quite unnecessary.

Grape Crackle

One cup Welch's Grape Juice; one-half box (or two tablespoonfuls) granulated gelatine; one-half cup cold water; one cup sugar; one and one-half cups boiling water; rind and juice of two lemons (or three small ones); whites of three eggs. Soak gelatine in the cup of cold water for ten minutes; dissolve in the boiling water and add the grated rind and juice of lemons, sugar and grape juice, strain and set in a cool place. When nearly set, add the stiffly beaten whites of eggs and whip all until well mixed. Pile lightly in a decorative serving dish, or put into a mold to be turned out later. Serve with a thin boiled custard made from the yolks of the three eggs used.

Questions and Answers

Earnest Reader, Riverside, Calif. We are urged to give, lend, distribute, etc., in the Bible, and by so doing are pleasing God. We are also told to be obedient to our parents. May we give to those who need, if it is not particularly pleasing to our parents to do so, and still be favorable and sinless in God's sight? I have a friend who needs some money, which I would love to give, and which I do not need, but I do not believe my parents would like it if I gave any money to any one. What is the right thing to do?

You would do well to be guided by your parents' advice. Youth and inexperience should always seek counsel of older people, especially parental counsel. There may be some sufficient reason why you should not do as your heart prompts. Why not speak to them frankly on the subject, stating your feelings and your earnest desire to be helpful?

R. W. J., Henderson, Ia. The particular case to which Paul refers in I. Cor. 5: 5 is afterward explained in II. Cor. 2: 5-10, the sinner evidently having been brought to repentance in the interval between the two epistles. The persistent offender was to be subjected to the shame and mortification of exclusion from the society of God's people until such time as, having suffered for his sin, he became truly repentant, "the destruction of the flesh" (i. e., the overcoming of the desire to sin) having been accomplished through the power of the Holy Spirit working for his deliverance. There is nothing to justify the conclusion that such a result could be reached save through genuine repentance.

A. R. P., Schenectady, N. Y. 1. What is meant by the Milky Way? 2. A few weeks ago you stated the age and mass of the earth. How is the mass determined? 3. What causes the seasons? Why is it winter in the North when it is summer in the South?

1. The Milky Way or Galaxy is a wonderful river of light which seems to foam across the sky. It is supposed to contain countless millions of stars. It has been referred to as "Infinity's illimitable fields, where bloom the worlds like flowers about God's feet." 2. There are several ways of determining the mass of the earth. The general method consists in comparing, by means of what is known as a torsion balance, the force of attraction of a leaden ball of known mass and at a known distance from a small ball with the force of attraction of the earth for the same small ball (that is, its weight) from which the unknown mass of the earth can be ascertained. 3. The seasons are caused by the way in which the earth moves in its orbit round the sun. While moving on its annular course the axis of the earth is not perpendicular to the plane of the orbit, but subtends it at an angle of 66½ degrees, and this slant causes the parts of the earth in turn to come under the influences of the sun. In the course of revolution when the Southern hemisphere is presented to the sun, the Northern is turned from that luminary, hence it is winter in the North and summer in the South.

G. B., Des Moines, Ia. Four events will distinguish 1912 as one of the epochal years, viz.: the transformation of China from a monarchy to a republic; the upheaval in Mexico, reorganizing the social and political condition of that country; the emancipation of Portugal from the incubus of Romanism, and the European downfall of the "unspeakable Turk," stung well nigh to death by the Balkan States, which he has held in contempt and oppressed for centuries. Last and not least is the political revolution here at home, which changes the political map of our Union and introduces new policies demanded by the needs of the times.

Mrs. E. M. J., Deals Island, Md. Will you not write something about unanswered prayer? My husband and I prayed so hard for the life of my dear little six-year-old girl to be spared. She was loved by the whole community and was her father's idol. I am under a shadow; I cannot sing nor laugh as I ought to. I want you to say something on this subject for me.

In the first place, do not feel condemned because of your grief. There is no sin in being sad when losses and disappointments like this come. It is just missing the little girl that makes you sad, and that is something you cannot as yet put away. If she had had a kind friend, let us say, who lived in a wonderful home and wanted her to come and live with him; if he could guarantee that she would never have another instant's pain or trouble or perplexity, could promise that she would have the very best that life could afford for her happiness and development, you might let her go. But you would miss her sorely. Now when you realize the kind of a Father God is—how he loves not only the little daughter, but you and your husband, and all the circle of her friends, you can believe that the decision he has made in taking her to himself is the best decision. BULGARIA'S GREAT VICTORIES

CONSTANTINOPLE THE TURKS' LAST STAND ON EUROPEAN SOIL

[F THE Bulgarians succeed in forcing the Chatalja lines and advance on Constantinople, the Ottoman Government would be prepared to adopt the most extreme measures in order to void signing a treaty with the Bulgarians at Constantinople. It would pass over to Asia Minor and rganize resistance there, leaving the Bulgarians to ettle matters in Constantinople directly with the owers. At present, however, hope of defending ie Chatalja lines has not been abandoned." This the astounding statement wired by the London aily Telegraph's Constantinople correspondent n November 6, and it was based on the affirmation f the Foreign linister of the ttoman Cabinet. Ignominiously efeated, north, outh, east and est, the Turk tands ready to y from the Imerial City that Iohammed I rested from Constantine 459 ears ago. Only a w miles away— day's march for n army — the iege guns of the ulgarians are ounding down he last line of efenses at Chaalja. The shatered remnants f Turkey's once reat army is athered there or its final stand -a stand almost s hopeless as hat of Gordon at Khartoum. Outnumbered now lmost two to one by the victorious and elated Bularians, disorganized and poorly officered, the urks are clinging to a forlorn hope, while none of ie military experts entertain a doubt that they nce more face defeat.

Since the great three days' battle that was ought over the territory from Visa to Lule Burgas and which turned Nazim Pasha's army into a fleeing mob, the Bulgarians have swept the entire territory from Sarai to Tchorlu. In this great battle the outcome for a time seemed to hang in a balance. The Turks were at first successful on the left wing of the engagement, where they compelled the Bulgarians to retreat. The Bulgarian advance on the right was successful, and on the second morning of the battle, the Turkish main body was so broken that it degenerated into senseless masses of men without consistency or leadership or any power of resistance. On the third day the Bulgarians completed their great victory by the utter rout of Nazim Pasha's forces all along the line of battle.

Two days passed with no definite news of more fighting. The Bulgarians after their strenuous efforts were evidently recuperating and bringing up to this new line their wonderful Army Service Corps. During this time the despatches told of continued activities about Adrianople, which, in spite of the heavy bombardment of the Bulgarian batteries, still held out. The news of Greek successes in the south and of the occupancy of two more towns in the west by the Montenegrins was coupled with the announcement that the Servians had wiped northern Macedonia clean of all resistance by the Turks and were dividing their forces to aid the Montengrins before Scutari and the Greeks in their successful march to Salonica, and to take the place before Adrianople that had been occupied by the Bulgarians.

Then came the announcement from Sofia that another two days' engagement had been fought between the reinforced Bulgarians and the Turks along the line of defenses which the Ottomans had established between Sarai and Tchorlu. Here the resistance of the Turkish forces was that of unorganized desperation and the losses far exceeded those of the previous great battle. Every hospital in Constantinople is now crowded with wounded, as it is reported that 35,000 disabled soldiers have been taken back into the city. The Bulgarian advance has been greatly hampered by the fact that they are caring for not only their own wounded but are attempting to aid all wounded Turkish prisoners who fall into their hands.

On November 4 Turkey appealed to the Powers of Europe for aid, begging that they compel the Bulgarians to cease hostilities until peace could be arranged. To this note all of the Powers replied that it was impossible for them to act on such a

WITH CHINA'S WAR AND FAMINE ORPHANS

Preparing Thread for Weaving

A Group of the "Door of Hope" Girls

At Work at the Hand Loom

THE old, old fact that through wars and rumors of wars, through famine and pestilence, it is the women and children who in the end pay the greatest price, becomes even more firmly established as letters giving greater details of the recent struggle come to us from China.

A few enlightened Chinese are toiling ceaselessly to lift their native land from darkness into light. They number only a few thousands, and the weight upon which they pull is that of millions who know nothing but the heathen customs of their forefathers, superstition, squalor and the fear of famine. Many of those who have felt the combined sting of war and famine will never know for what they have suffered. To them it has meant only the breaking of family ties, privation and misery. In a summer letter from the Free Methodist Orphanage at Tsingkiangpu, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Fletcher say: "The thousands who have thronged our streets, begging piteously for food, and crying for help for their little ones, and telling us they were starving to death, show us only too plainly the great need of work among the children."

To those who, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have made it possible for them to carry on their orphanage work, Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher send their warmest thanks. Their efforts are now being directed to the preparation of the children for self-support when they leave the orphanage. "We have begun trades for them to learn, but as yet none of them have become proficient in their line of work. Eight of the boys and six of the girls are learning to weave cloth and make towels on the native looms. Others are making thread, while some of the boys prove to be handy at sewing, and are learning to make their clothes. The boys and girls get their own meals, the boys carrying the water from the Grand Canal, which is only about a quarter of a mile distant. We have just harvested our wheat crop, the girls cutting and binding their part, about one-third of it, and the boys two-thirds of it. They considered it great fun, and as it all has to be cut with a little sickle, held in one hand, while the wheat is held with the other, it necessarily takes some time."

Another interesting letter about Chinese children comes from Miss Ethel Abercrombie of the Children's Home of the Door of Hope at Shanghai. Writing on August 19, she says:

"The Children's Home of the Door of Hope has 180 children, all girls, 92 of whom are now being supported by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. During the month of August these children had their holidays, and as many as possible were given an excursion to some kind friend's home. The photograph I send shows a little group that were invited to the China Inland Mission. The little baby in the center had been in the Door of Hope only a fortnight when the picture was taken. We do not know the exact age of the baby; she says she is four years old, but that is Chinese reckoning, and may be either two or three years really. She can walk and talk, but every now and then goes off into a language of her own, which neither the foreigner nor the Chinese can understand.

"The wee mite came in with the scars of red hot irons across her body and a hungry cry of 'eat rice, rice' all the time. Now, after a fortnight in the Home, she can play, laugh and forget her hunger. Some one may wonder how we got hold of such a little child, and the answer is, that like the majority of the Door of Hope children, she was given to us by the police and made over legally, so that no one else has any claim on her. The police discovered that the child had been bought as a little slave and was being badly treated.

"Whilst the photograph was being taken, the baby caused great amusement by fanning herself vigorously and refusing to sit still. One little girl, the next but one to the baby's right, took it upon herself to admonish her very seriously, thereby utterly extinguishing her own self."

BULGARIA'S GREAT VICTORIES

one-sided proposition, as it really amounted to nothing more than giving the Turks a chance to reorganize and recuperate during an armistice. Then, too, Ferdinand, who now may truly claim that his title of "Czar of the Bulgarians" is no longer an empty one, has stated that the Turks must make their own appeal for peace to the conquerors.

The situation in Constantinople has caused great fear throughout the rest of the world that the wilder classes of the Mohammedans of the city may, in the face of utter defeat, get beyond control and start a massacre of both the foreign and native Christians. This brought about a most peculiar race. Along the Sea of Marmora, pursued by the Bulgarians, the remnants of Turkey's armies hurried back to the city, while on the high seas the ships of practically all the great Powers of the world were rushing to the Bosphorus that they may by their combined show of power quell any tendencies to Mohammedan lawlessness.

From Rodosto the reports announce that the fleeing Turks stopped to wreak a terrible revenge upon the defenseless Greek Christians. It is impossible yet to tell anything of the exact number that they have massacred or the amount of property that they have destroyed, but almost every report concludes with the statement that burning villages and the mutilated bodies of defenseless Christians mark the path of the retreat. One of the latest despatches says that it is now believed that the Bulgarians will see the wisdom of refraining from a formal triumphant entry into Constantinople. Such an entry would no doubt arouse the Mohammedan population to ungovernable fury, and yet to refrain from such a history-making climax to their successful campaign is something that will demand the greatest self-control on the part of the Bulgarians. Constantinople has been called "The Glory of the World." For two thousand years this city on the Golden Horn has been the goal of the ambitions of great military geniuses. Xenophon, Alexander, Constantine, Dandolo, Wallenstein, Napoleon and all the Czars of Russia since Peter the Great have coveted this key to three continents. Now a young nation stands the undoubted conqueror of this wonderfully historic ground.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S appeal in behalf of the widows and orphans of the Balkan War has reached the hands of its readers, and the first contributions are acknowledged below. We trust that there will be a speedy and generous response to this loud cry for help, and we hope that every reader will give his or her mite, however small, in order that lives may be saved and suffering alleviated. Every contribution should be addressed "Balkan Relief Fund, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York." THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already advanced $250 by cable, in confident anticipation of the gifts of its readers.

Many very touching incidents, showing the suffering and privation the people of the Balkans are enduring on account of the war, are related in letters forwarded by native pastors in Bulgaria to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Just as they did during the last war with Turkey, the Servians and Bulgarians, even the poorest, are making great sacrifices in aid of the wounded soldiers and also to help those unfortunate families whom the war has bereaved of their natural protectors. Cows, sheep, goats and clothing are given, for, as a rule, many of the people are too poor to give money. One poor widow, whose husband had been murdered by Turkish raiders (who had cut off her own left hand at the same time), gave her only cow to be used as food for the wounded. This woman, maimed as she was, tilled her own patch of land which furnished her whole living. Another woman, old and lame, gave a blue kerchief, saying: "I am poor, and this is all I can give; send it to some wounded soldier to wipe the sweat from his brow."

Knowing of the sufferings of their fellow countrymen at home, the Bulgarians in America are raising funds to help the wounded and the destitute. One group of women in Granite City and Madison, Ill., is doing a noble work in this way, sending the gifts for the relief of the wounded and the dying.

THE PRESIDENT-ELECT AT HOME

"The Little White House" at Seagirt, N. J.

The President-Elect, Mrs. Wilson and Their Daughters, Margaret, Jessie and Eleanor on the Lawn at Sea Girt

The Wilson Home in Princeton, N. J.

TWENTY-SEVEN years ago this fall there came to live at Bryn Mawr a young man by the name of Wilson, and a lady who had been his bride since the 24th of June. It was that date that Miss Ellen Louise son, the daughter and grand- ighter of two well-known rgian Presbyterian clergymen, s married at her grandfather's ne in Savannah to Woodrow lson. This young Mr. Wilson, ugh really only completing his dent career, had made quite a ne for himself as an essayist on ics of government. He had just left Johns Hopkins University to take a ir of history and political economy at the new college for women in the lish-named town.

At first the young professor and his wife lived at the edge of the campus, ere the dean and most of the other instructors had apartments. Later they ved to the pretty cottage on the old Gulf Road, that had been the parsonage a little Baptist church. In this, their first home, the Wilsons took great de and satisfaction. The long summer vacations were spent back in the rth amongst old friends and relatives. Mr. Wilson himself, you know, he son of a Scotch-Irish Georgian minister who was "stated clerk" of the thern Presbyterian General Assembly for thirty-four years. Here in the th the first two children of our President-elect were born.

Though the social life of the new college with its typical college atmosphere s most agreeable to the young professor and his wife, when an invitation to rger and older college came it was accepted. This call was from Wesleyan iversity, and the next home of the professor, now Dr. Wilson, and his little nily was just across the college grounds of the old New England university wn and looked out over the pleasant Connecticut valley. The next two years re spent in this quiet New England home, where the studous professor ved still more deeply into his beloved sciences of political economy and ernment, and where he produced his book The State. These were years of asant companionship with the families of the other pro- sors of the college, the social life of the town, and above with the young men of the classrooms. The Wilson home s a Mecca for them. It was such a quiet, homelike place, h such a quiet and motherly little woman as its mistress, t they all loved to come to partake of her good things and en sometimes with wide-open eyes to the comic limericks l humorous stories of the professor who could provide them h such stiff, though popular, courses of lectures when on siness bent.

In 1890 the chair of jurisprudence and politics at Prince- College was vacated by the death of Professor Alexander nson and the trustees elected to fill it the Princeton alum- who had made such an enviable name for himself during years since his graduation. So now back to his Alma ter as a doctor of law and of philosophy came Woodrow lson. He was now a man who was known in the world. s books and articles were being quoted and talked of. As public speaker he was popular, and as the head of a rming little family he was admired by all. Bringing h them the atmosphere of books and culture and high nking that had characterized their other two homes, Dr. lson and his family moved into a house in Library Place. ere he and his wife and their growing daughters lived until ew years after they built their present home from designs d plans which Mrs. Wilson herself had drawn. The story Dr. Wilson's connection with Princeton University need be repeated. Through the years that he saw it develop, up to the beginning his own presidency and during the years that he so ably directed its des- ies, his home was again a favorite meeting-place for those students who were tunate enough to be invited there. It was a most democratic home—a place which merit alone was a key—a place of good music and bright stories, deep versation on the destinies of government and delightfully old-fashioned, l domestic entertainment. A family shut in upon itself grows narrow and adually loses touch with the outside world. No such thing as this enters the ne circle of Dr. Wilson.

The university president's daughters were growing into young ladies and veloping along the lines that their education and associations made most tural. Miss Margaret Woodrow is a devotee of music; has a well-trained ratic soprano voice and was preparing for the concert stage. She had anned this winter to spend nine hours each day at her music and gymnasium rk. She and her younger sister Jessie Witherspoon are both deeply inter- ed in settlement work, and have become earnest and practical students of iology. It is not at all an uncommon occurrence to have them start off in morning announcing in a rather indefinite fashion that they are going to ne settlement or social workers' organization, and to have them telephone ne when evening comes not to worry as they have been kept one train later than they had expected and will be delayed for dinner. The youngest daughter, Miss Eleanor Randolph, is the artist of the family and inherits her artistic talents from her mother, who not only made a name for herself as a landscape painter of no mean achievement, but also studied architecture and planned to the minutest detail the charming Princeton house of stucco and Tudor beams—low ceilings and ample rooms and casement windows—in which the family now lives. Eleanor is perhaps the most socially inclined of the whole family. She has taken great pleasure in those social functions with which her father's governorship of the State of New Jersey has brought her in contact. As the State of New Jersey has no gubernatorial mansion and as the Princeton home is not large enough to accommodate very elaborate state functions, the Wilson family has done little elaborate entertaining. A few years ago Governor Wilson acquired the property at Sea Girt, N. J., that is now known as "The Little White House." It is here that the Wilsons have welcomed their friends in a hearty outdoor fashion, entertaining on the tennis court rather than in the drawing-room.

Mrs. Woodrow Wilson

The new lady of the White House is perhaps one of the most domestic women who have ever occupied the position of the First Lady of Our Land. Full of the gentle charm of motherliness, Mrs. Woodrow Wilson impresses every one as wife, companion and mother first, and all things that are required of such a type of woman follow easily and attractively in her wake. Enjoying the full confidence of her daughters, Mrs. Wilson is the inspiration and the delight of her home. One who spent a few days as her guest not long since said: "She impresses one much as did Mrs. Cleveland. She has the same sweet motherliness of character and disposition. I doubt if the new régime at the White House will be an astonishingly brilliant one in its entertainments, but of this I am sure: there will be many a delightful dinner and many a delightful reception where the personality of the presiding lady will pervade everything with the same sense of hearty, homely welcome that has made her Sea Girt and Princeton homes such delights to the family's friends and acquaintances."

Ever ready with the gentle word of wisdom and encouragement, she is invariably consulted on important and unimportant household and family matters. Alive in the domestic partnership of husband and wife, Mrs. Wilson is the ideal silent partner, the inspiration that is the quiet power behind the throne. The President-elect owes more than is apparent to the almost ideal wife and mother who with unfailing cheerfulness and dignity reigns over his home. It may sound trite to say that to children and parents alike the days of the children's youth, crowded with attendant cares and anxieties, filled with responsibilities and strenuous ambitions, were the golden age in their lives, the time to which the children look back as a priceless heritage and to which they attribute their beautiful and happy home life to-day.

The President-elect is known to a vast circle as a delightful host. From his photographs one would gain the impression that he was of a terribly serious, almost sad disposition, but the lines that tell this story disappear when his face is animated in conversation. His friends have often spoken of the swift play of expression that marks his interest as he listens, and the suffusion of kindliness and good humor that accompanies his reply. He laughs easily and heartily. He is a man of few marked mannerisms. His devotion to details is perhaps shown by the painstaking way in which he wipes his pen before he replaces it after using and the precision with which he arranges the objects on his desk. There might be a repelling grimness about this apparently cold precision were it not for the ready smile that animates his features as he plunges his hands into his trousers pockets and squares his sturdily built shoulders in a spontaneous fashion that marks his whole personality with good humor. It has been said of him: "Governor Wilson is a man of positive opinion, relieved by an eager sense of humor. He moves and speaks with unfailing poise, with good-natured certainty of himself. The prime thing is that he is real—real all through, from top to bottom. There isn't a sham anywhere in his neighborhood. He is chock-full of energy; he likes action, hugely, though he did remark at the end of one exciting day: 'After all, life doesn't consist in eternally running to a fire!' Conversation with him is a delight; his talk is rich in allusion, illustrated from broad personal acquaintance, marked by a wide-ranging sweep of interest and thought. Mr. Wilson is a great story-teller—in private he keeps his friends in hours-long gales of laughter; he uses simple words and strong words, but seldom slang. He loves nonsense verse and limericks, and often reels them off while he is getting acquainted with his audience. It is a rare and an arresting combination of traits that this man presents. Perhaps nothing sums it up more vividly than this: he reads Greek, and he writes—short-hand."

POSITIVE FAITH

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.*

TEXT: "For I know him whom I have believed." II. Tim. 1: 12, R. V.

SUPPOSE you are a seedsman and I come into your store one morning and say, "Spring is coming and I want some seeds for my garden. Please send up to my house a package of lettuce, turnip, beet, cabbage, and some flower seeds. I would like nasturtiums, some sweet peas, etc." You would sit in your chair, and without even moving, you say, "I don't know as I have any fresh seeds this morning that I can recommend. I haven't any new stock on hand, and it is doubtful if my sweet peas will sprout, and I don't know about the turnips or lettuce."

Would this Pay in Business?

If you were that kind of a seedsman, how many seeds would you sell, and how many customers do you think you would retain?

Suppose you are a grocer and I come into your store on my way down to my business and say: "Please send up to the house as soon as possible a pound of butter, a package of breakfast food, a dozen eggs, fifty cents' worth of sugar, a sack of flour, and a bushel of potatoes." You sit in your chair and without even moving you say: "I don't know that we have any potatoes this morning; I think we are all out, and I am afraid I cannot speak for the eggs; I don't know that they are fresh, and we happen to be out of sugar just at present, and I am afraid I cannot recommend the butter. We have not had any fresh butter in lately," etc.

If you were to act like that in the grocery business, how much groceries would you sell and how many customers would you retain in the course of a year?

Suppose you are a real estate man and I come into your office one morning and say, "I have just come to this town to make my home here because I like the looks of the place. I want a good-sized house for my family, and am willing to pay a good price, and have come in to see you about it." Suppose you were to sit still in your chair and say with indifference: "Well, I don't know as I have anything this morning; business is dull on account of the presidential election. I had some good lots last year, and some good houses, but nothing I can offer you now. Real estate is way down; nothing doing."

If you were to act like that as a real estate man, how much business would you have at the end of a year?

What Shall the Church Accomplish?

How much business will a church transact or Christianity accomplish on a basis of indifference or a lack of positive faith? We need to remember that Christianity made its beginning in the hearts of men who were absolutely certain of what they had to offer the world. There were no question marks about their business. There was no indifference about what they had to offer the public. All the preaching of the first century was absolutely positive and affirmative, and it was because of that that Christianity made its rapid growth.

It is well for the Christian and the minister and the church member of to-day to sit down quietly and put down a number of things that he really knows about his Christian faith. Suppose we make such a list along the line of Paul's statement to Timothy: "For I know."

The first thing I know in the way of a positive faith is:

The "I Knows" of Positive Faith

I know there is a God.

Jesus never tried to argue about the existence of God. He simply took it for granted just as he wants us to. There is not a single human being in the world to-day who in his heart does not really believe this great fact. We can easily imagine what would happen to this universe if there were no God and if the whole thing came about by chance. Christianity, of course, can make no progress in the world unless in the heart of every Christian disciple there is the most unquestioning faith in the existence of a personal God, who is the Father of us all.

I know he is a loving God.

This means something more than power or force which creates. Suppose for a moment that the universe were ruled by a God of hate, and consider what awful harm he could bring upon us every minute. We would never be certain of anything. We could never depend upon any law to govern anything. If God were all powerful and all hateful, he could make every minute of our lives miserable. Instead of that, human life is crowded with happiness if we simply obey his commandments. The knowledge that God is love and not hate is an absolute necessity of the Christian faith.

I know that I can choose between right and wrong.

Sometimes we think that money is the great thing in life, or pleasure, or power; but in our sober moments we know that to do right or wrong means more to us than all the money, or power, or pleasure in the world. Money cannot buy the greatest thing in our lives. We cannot sell virtue or love for money. They are beyond price. Whether we do right or wrong in the course of the day determines our happiness or unhappiness in the end. This knowledge is something about which we should have no doubt.

True Values

Character is of infinite value.

During this last summer Mrs. Sheldon and myself were out on a lake in a boat with some friends and narrowly escaped drowning. There seemed to be no possible hope of getting the boat to shore. The captain ordered us to put on life preservers and said the boat would surely go down. For four hours we were in the heart of a tremendous storm, which threatened every moment to send the entire company to the bottom. In those moments everything else seemed to be of no value by the side of life. All that we had on shore faded into insignificance by the side of simply being alive. In the long run we know that character is the only thing that can survive. We cannot take our money with us into the other country. Nothing is eternal except love and righteousness.

This is a piece of knowledge that means everything to the disciple, for that means that Jesus is an example and One who can help him live his life as he should. Among all the imperfect beings that ever lived in this world there has been One that has been perfect. That is a great help to all of us who are daily tempted and who need something more than human to help us.

Jesus' teaching is the best for the world.

When we compare Christianity with other religions we see at once the great difference. Christianity has done for the world what no other religion has done. It has brought about the civilization we now have. It has abolished slavery. After a while it will abolish the saloon and war and all great evils that now are a part of our lives.

His teaching of love to God and men, if practiced in business and politics and amusement and daily life, would transform people's habits and make them love one another instead of hate one another. The first Christians were called "those who turn the world upside down." Christianity is the religion which is always turning the world upside down, and in the end it will conquer.

I know I ought to practice his teaching.

If his teaching is the best in the world, and if obedience will make heaven on earth, I ought to be a Christian myself. I cannot escape the obedience I owe to him who came into the world to save people from their sins. He came to call me personally. This is a logical conclusion I cannot escape. Jesus himself said once, "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

This, of course, is a piece of knowledge that everybody has but very often forgets. It is w for us to remember that no matter how long li may seem, it will some time have an end. I oug to live conscious of that fact and act accordingly

I cannot prove this by science or by logic. I pend for this knowledge on what Jesus said about and simply rest my faith on his testimony. Wh he said, "In my Father's house are many ma sions; I go to prepare a place for you," and aga when he said to the dying robber on the cro "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise," th is the knowledge that gives the world eternal ho of a world which will be free from sickness and s from selfishness and from death.

Life's Great Inspiration

The hope of the world is in Jesus Christ.

It is not in political parties or universities or c ture or money. Nothing can ever change me hearts except a faith in him which will chan their habits and make them new creatures. Th knowledge underlies all the great life of the wo and is its constant inspiration and hope.

We need to-day a positive faith, which grows o of the positive knowledge we have. A minist which is not sure about the miracles or the resu rection or the power of Christ to change huma nature is a ministry which will never prevail. some of our churches are losing ground, if men a not going to church services, if preaching seer to have lost its power, it is because the pulpit a the pew do not sound a note of positive faith. M and women are hungry for the bread of life. Th want affirmations, not question-marks. They wa the things that are knowledge and not the batt grounds of theological discussions. The chur to-day should be preaching and living a positi faith. That alone can redeem the world.

Wycliffe's Bones

THE London Tablet is generally recognized the leading organ of the Roman Catholic Chur in Great Britain, if not in the whole Englis speaking world, but in the issue of October 19, 191 we find a curious departure from the accura which is usually supposed to characterize its co umns. It appears that a number of nuns who we expelled from Nantes, in France, ten years ago, b cause they refused to conform to the terms of t Associations Bill enacted by the French Parliame (made up of men at least born in the Roman Cath lic faith), invaded England when they "left the country for their country's good." A convent h recently been built for them at Lutterworth, t home of John Wycliffe, frequently called the "Mor ing Star of the Reformation." He died in 13 and was buried at Lutterworth. The writer in t Tablet was evidently under the impression that t reformer's body had been allowed to rest in pea after the interment in this quiet parish churchyar for after referring to the saying of the first mass the new chapel, he says, "While Wycliffe's reli rattled in his grave, the townsfolk of Lutte worth came sight-seeing." The facts, however, a that thirty-one years after Wycliffe's death, t Council of Constance issued a decree (May 4, 141 that his remains were to be dug up and burned an order which was carried out by Bishop Flemi in 1428 (Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., vol. xxiv., p. 711 the ashes being afterwards thrown into the rive It is easy to understand that Roman Catholic co leges and schools do not teach much about historic episodes of this nature, but it seems a little curiou that the responsible editor of so important a Pap organ as the Tablet should have allowed an error this kind to escape his notice, since the facts ha been so widely known for so many centuries. It an instance of how the rancor of Rome pursue even after their death, those who have opposed h errors or sought to deliver the people from h tyranny.

ONLY A SINGLE STRING

H FOR a thousand tongues to sing!" cried the poet whose passion for praise was beyond his power of expression. He had only one tongue to sing, but he was able to put praise upon millions of other tongues, which was far better.

Man so often wants to be the whole orchestra. The ambition for great achievement, the desire to wield a compelling influence in the world, the eagerness to count for something, all create a tendency to magnify the importance of numbers and majorities and to belittle the value of a single individual.

The orchestra is a noble and inspiring thing, whose power and beauty have been considered heretofore in these talks. It has been described as "the most eloquent, potent and capable instrument of music in the world." But the orchestra is impossible except as it is composed of individual instruments and players, each doing faithfully and well an appointed part. It may be that this single part is small and apparently meaningless by itself, but vital and indispensable to the perfect harmony of the whole. Some are appointed to greater honor and prominence, others must play minor parts. Some are given voices of great sweetness and range, others can utter but a single tone, perhaps harsh and unlovely if taken out of its place in the orchestra, yet adding strength to the whole. Not all can be first violins, not 'cellos, nor harps, nor flutes. The perfect orchestra needs the heavy tone of the kettle-drum and the clash of the cymbals.

It is a greater art to combine all the instruments into the harmonious union of purpose and melody than it is to separate them into individuals and find fault with their restrictions or lack of tunefulness. When we learn that every life, every voice, every strong natural characteristic has its rightful place in the great human orchestra, and that the Master Musician can play on every string, we shall realize that it is more beautiful to help bring each one into tune with all the others than it is to isolate any and criticize its lack of individual power or sweetness. Perhaps the very one we are most inclined to slight would first be missed by the Conductor when he calls upon his orchestra for a chosen work.

AWAY back near the last row, almost hidden in a corner behind other players at the final rehearsal for the grand concert, sat a little old man with a piccolo. He loved the music and his heart swelled as the majestic harmonies filled the air. The violins thrilled him with their sweetness, and the heavy stringed instruments satisfied his sense of grandeur as the mighty crescendos rose in response to the conductor's signal. His own little piccolo seemed insignificant and out of place. Its small, shrill voice suddenly offended him because it seemed to add neither sweetness nor grandeur to the wonderful music. If only he could play a trumpet, or a first violin, he felt that he could add the inspiration of his soul to the music and so render a service worthy of the great composer. But the mean little piccolo—why, no one ever knew he was there!

He hardly realized that while indulging in his discontent he had stopped playing. Suddenly, with an imperious wave of his baton, the conductor stopped the orchestra in the midst of one of its grandest bursts of harmony. All was silence for an instant that seemed an age. Then—"Where is the piccolo?" the conductor demanded. "I cannot go on with this piece without the piccolo." The little old man turned cold and then hot. His eyes swam in a mist, as the whole orchestra seemed to melt away and he saw only the conductor looking straight at him. He had been missed. The wonderful music was spoiled and could not go on because his little piping piccolo had stopped. Never would he falter again, for the whole orchestra and the great conductor himself were depending on him to play his part.

EVERY kind and every condition of string may have its place in the orchestra if only it is kept in tune. Some are coarse of fiber, and loose in tension, giving low tones; others are finer and are keyed up tight, sometimes almost to breaking; but across both the bow may be drawn by the musician who knows how to bring out their best tones. He knows how much stretching each string needs to keep it true to the key, and to blend its tone with all the others.

Some one has remarked on the fact that a low note in tune with others is not noticed, while a tone in discord with others, though insignificant in itself, will command more attention than many in harmony. It is a painful fact that there are persons who would rather make a discord and be noticed than harmonize and be obscure. Knowing that their powers rightly used may never bring them into conspicuous notice, they deliberately produce discords to draw attention to themselves. They would rather be notorious in meanness, or quarrels, or crime, than unnoticed in virtue—daring and sensational in hostile criticism or heresy than earnestly and obscurely to praise where praise is due, or to contend for the faith of our fathers.

Many a man or woman is like the string of the harp that refused to stay in tune. The celebrated harpist sat down in front of an expectant audience and began to play. Just as the hearers were becoming entranced with the exquisite music, one of the strings gave back a harsh discord. The musician stopped in dismay and tightened the string to bring it back in tune. Hardly had the unpleasant effect passed and the hearers were coming again under the sweet spell of the melody, when suddenly the string rebelled and answered the touch of the harpist with another discord. Of what avail was the perfect harmony of all the other strings? One discordant note ruined the whole.

Only a single string, yet chosen by the great Musician for a part in his perfect symphony of life. Only a single string, yet related to all the rest so closely in the harmony that they are depending upon the single string and cannot go on without it. Only a single string, yet the Master's fingers will gently touch it and expect it to respond in answer to his will. Shall the response be harsh with discord, or shall it be pure, and true, and tuneful as he expects it to be?

THE OFF OX

flourished it. He gave the farmer a little tap in play, and touched up the off ox. The ox responded quickly, and, now having the road to himself and gaining a grip in the snow, easily pulled the load and so got over the bad place, which had been made far worse by the struggling oxen. After they had got to fairly good road, the neighbor called them to a halt. The other ox, which had not gone very far, was caught and put into its place. Then the farmer turned to thank his friend.

"Well, did you ever!" he exclaimed. "I never saw anything like that and I can't account for it."

"Oh, that is easy," said the other laughingly. "You see, it was just this way: While the road was a bit bad, the load was not so heavy. The chief trouble was with the oxen, who were crowding, and both wanted the center of the road. That off ox is a good puller, and all he wanted was just to have somebody hold up the other end of the yoke, give him a grip on the road, and he'd pull the whole load himself."

And that is often the way with Him who said, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light." The burden is light because he is on the other end of the yoke. We often cause trouble by "crowding" him so that he cannot get a grip on the road, but when we bravely hold up our end of the yoke and go on, we find indeed that the yoke is easy and the burden light, and when we have our eyes opened to the truth, we realize that he has been the chief burden-bearer, and thus the goal has been won.

A Real Nobleman

PETER SCHOFIELD is one of the real noblemen of the world, although he is only a Kansas farmer. One day the people riding by the little country schoolhouse near the home of Peter Schofield found the following notice tacked on the schoolhouse door:

> The Lord has spared my stock. My horses have gone through the epidemic without loss, and I have twenty head to loan to my less fortunate neighbors, without charge, for plowing. Those who need are welcome to them.

This simple notice brought joy to many of the neighbors of generous Peter Schofield, for a stock plague had raged in the rural neighborhood and some of the farmers had lost all of their horses and were too poor to buy others. This plague was the worst disaster that had come to this part of Kansas since the days of the great pest of grasshoppers that swept thousands of acres of crops from the fields. This generous deed on the part of Peter Schofield proved that he was a man of a true heart and generous spirit, and all those who see things in their right perspective must agree with the writer who says:

"No title is more adorning and no honor is more enduring than the generous impulse which inspired this man to become a benefactor to the distressed in his community." J. L. H.

A Kindly Gift to the Bowery Mission

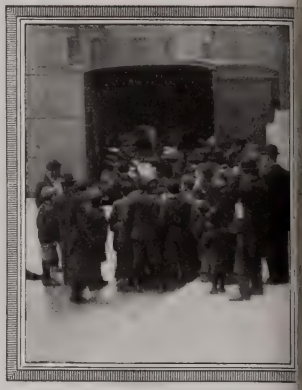
A FEW days ago Miss K. F. Ritchie, a refined, cultured woman from the South, called at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices, and left a package containing thirty-five pairs of wristlets to be distributed among the Bowery Mission men and boys, who stand in the Bread Line during the cold winter nights. She said she had leisure time and enjoyed making these wristlets and if she found they were appreciated, she would employ all her spare moments during the coming winter in making more. The poor men on the Bread Line, who have no home to go to, and no shelter to protect them from the cold winter blasts, will be very grateful for a kindness of this sort, and Miss Ritchie would feel amply repaid could she but witness the thankfulness shining on the faces when they learn that some one remembered them so kindly.

HOW THE RED STOCKINGS WERE FILLED

BY KATHLEEN NORRIS

Some of the Joy That Comes in the Morning

The Red Stockings, Stuffed and Crammed, and Ready and Waiting



A Moving Van for the Distribution

MOTHER was, of course, the first one to think about Christmas. Thanksgiving was barely over before she said to Dad, "I'm going to speak to Jones early this year about the tree." Later she asked him to look at a coaster, "not too expensive, of course, but a good strong one," and a day or two after that she carried Mary's new doll over to Grandmother's, so that Auntie could dress it beyond the reach of Mary's eyes. Packages began to arrive in the snowy twilights. Mary and Jack could perfectly well hear the "Oh's!" and "Dear me's!" over them when the grown-ups opened the boxes, and could hear Mother say "Oh, they shouldn't spend so much money on just toys!" and Dad add, chuckling, "But won't the kids go wild!" Mary and Jack feared that they might not get the pony, and probably had better not set their hearts on gold watches and the real cat-boat just yet; but there would certainly be the coaster and the doll, and something wonderful from the aunt in Paris, and something else from the California uncle, and enough games and candy and horns and books and skates and dishes and oranges and nuts and blocks and paintboxes and new mittens and new bedroom slippers and new sweaters and new school umbrellas to make the dining-room on Christmas morning, with the sun streaming over the glittering snow outside, and the fire dancing on the hearth inside, look like a toy-shop picked up by the foundations and shaken into the house.

"It takes so little to make them happy!" Mother and the aunts and uncles and Daddy say over and over, listening to their chatter, as the morning wears on, and the odor of roasting turkey begins to penetrate the house. "And they'll never forget these Christmases!"

They'll never forget them; that is the joyful truth.

Now let us suppose that instead of speaking to Jones about the tree, right after Thanksgiving—and in this case a Thanksgiving without a turkey, and with no mince pie—a mother who loved her children just as dearly as Mary's and Jack's mother did, had to begin to prepare their minds for no Christmas—no big dinner, no tree, no toys, nothing but the old familiar round of hunger and cold and privation. Suppose that when this mother's Mary came to her knee, to ask, with a quivering little mouth, if there wouldn't be just one little doll, she had to say no. Suppose that when Jack asked if they could hang up their stockings anyway, she had to try to dissuade them, to remind Jack that he was a big boy, and big boys did not cry; to cuddle little Mary in her lap and tell her about Daddy's sickness, and the rent-day coming, and the baby's sickness yet unpaid for. And if the children's faith in the Christmas saint proved stronger than even this, let us suppose this mother, with the bitterness of death in her heart, creeping under her thin blankets on Christmas eve, with her eyes still full of the vision of three little empty flapping stockings, awaiting the children in the morning. Only the God of suffering motherhood knows what those Christmas mornings are.

And the children never forget them, that is the terrible truth.

It is the children's holiday, it is the children who fill the shops with toys, and 'owd the streets with shoppers, and, without the children, gift-giving at Christmas-time would vanish from the land. And so it is to the children that we turn for a final solution of the Christmas problem, and it was through a child that it was found.

The child found a little picture that was published in Life some years ago—a picture of Santa Claus standing in a bare little bedroom, his troubled eyes upon the children asleep in bed, his empty sack hanging from his hand. The child's heart was touched by the picture, and he wanted to know if the terrible thing ever happened.

The lovely and motherly woman to whom he sent the picture is a member of the Brooklyn Tenement House Committee, and she showed the picture at the next meeting of the board, and the committee tried and tried and tried to think of some way in which the children of the rich could send a direct message to the children of the poor at Christmas-time. Nearly every mother had outgrown things at home, duplicated toys, surplus sweets and small treasures galore. But how could they have a Christmas-tree of the size that the situation in Brooklyn demanded, and how assort and deliver the right things to the right child if they did? And who could spare the time on Christmas Day anyway, and what is the use of toys and good cheer on December twenty-eighth or December thirtieth, if one's heart has been quite broken on Christmas Day?

The Board went home to think about it. One of them had as a dinner guest that very evening a nurse from the New York Presbyterian Hospital, Miss Mary Buley, and she, deeply interested, told her hostess that the year before every sick child in the hospital had had a big red stocking laid on his bed on Christmas morning, stuffed to the brim with delights, useful or amusing, but all selected for that particular child, and all his.

This was the nucleus. At the next board-meeting the Red Stockings were born, and although this was only in 1911, by this time thousands of them are marching gaily around the world. The women of the board bought yards—miles!—of red cambric that very day, volunteers were eager to cut, volunteers met at a hospital sewing-room to sew, volunteers sprang up everywhere to distribute, and, finally, stockings couldn't be given out as fast as they were wanted to be filled.

The rest really reads like a fairy-tale. A thousand stockings, fifteen hundred stockings, two thousand and more stockings were filled that first winter. The Children's Aid Society, the Associated Settlements, the District Nurses, the City Missionaries, Little Italy, and several other organizations investigated the cases, and poured in the names, and as the names came in, each one was printed a linen-backed card, "Katharine Edwards, 20 Green Street, nine years old," or "Thomas Bat 600 Union Street, infant," and sewed firmly to t top of a red stocking.

And then the busy Red Stocking Committee—wi the motherly woman who began the whole thir Mrs. James Sears Waterman, at its head—we about distributing empty stockings. They talked school children everywhere, and even the high sch boys wanted to fill Red Stockings. As for the gir they took them by the hundred—and another hu dred—and another hundred. Nurses and colle girls and clubs everywhere wanted them, and in viduals did the remarkable things that individua always do when such a chance arises. One wom always fills one hundred personally, buying litt coats and woolly lambs by the dozen, and fair filling a room with Red Stockings. Checks pour upon the committee, telephone requests for stoc ings, boxes of useful and delightful things, boug wholesale, come to the committee room.

And by December 20 they begin to come bac bulging, heavy, stuffed from their fat toes to t doll hanging out at the top, and perhaps tied to sled or a doll's carriage, or strapped flat to a b of good things that couldn't possibly be squeez inside. They pile up around the walls of the co mittee room like some queer Christmas tide of go cheer; and frantic women try to keep abreast of t terrific task of assorting them, and dividing the into districts, and classifying them under the nam of various associations. On, on, on pours the tid motors, carriages, sleds and delivery wagons bri them to the door all day long, and every arrivi stocking is filled to bursting; there is never a R Stocking that could accommodate even a gingersn more!

Just before Christmas all the parents are notifi by postal card that the children's Christmas stoc ings are waiting for them, and they call for them a long line of patient, shabby mothers and siste and old men and women—and say an awkwa "Thank you!" for them, and go away again, som times managing to carry as many as seven or eig of the enchanting, mysterious, enormous things on sled or cart, and meaning to try, somehow, to g them into the house when the children aren't abo and hide them until the morning of the wonderf twenty-fifth, as happier fathers and mothers a doing all over the world.

But of course a great many mothers and fathe foreigners, or invalids, or because of a tiny bab cannot come, and their Red Stockings are taken them—largely through the kindness of the Eag Warehouse and Storage Company, whose immen vans and entire staff of drivers are placed at t committee's disposal, year after year, and partl of course, by private motor-cars, whose owners ju can't bear to go home until these three for t O'Connors, and the two for the Schultz famil and the Charpentiers' four, have been delivere Brooklyn twinkles with Red Stockings on Christm eve, and children everywhere are asking big polic men if they know where the Red Stockings are.

The children who open those Red Stockings tal out, perhaps, a toy or two first—a doll that neve will breathe to her new owner that she has on a ne wig and new clothes, but that she used to be anoth little girl's doll, or a pair of skates that have bee to a repair shop, but are all the stronger for that and a package of dates, and a box of candy, and little sweater that has been beautifully washed, an has all its buttons sewed on tight, and a warm litt

TAKE it that a little rivalry—the good-natured kind—ain't a bad thing, bein' as the same spurs folks some considerable. But when Lem Dunkel dropped in at the forge one ornin' and told me that Lucy Landers had en-red a Jersey bull calf for the Woodsville County air, I was a mite disturbed. Right off I knew vas her dad that had made her do it, just to spite d man Krag. Old Krag's son, Polydore, had got bull calf entered too, a fine, beautifully marked rsey, and most everybody round had conceded at the critter would take the blue ribbon in the arlin' class.

"Didn't know Sim Landers had any prize-winnin' ock in his herd," I says to Lem.

"He didn't have, till he bought this here bull calf r Lucy," chuckled Lem. "Cal'late Polydore rag's chance for the blue ribbon this year's mighty m if what Sim says is true, and I 'low 'tis true ght enough, 'cause he showed me the critter's digree—blue ribbon takers every last one of n."

"Well," says I short, "young Polydore's year-' 's from winnin' stock, too. Just the same," I ys, "'tis bound to cause complications, which-er of 'em wins, and I call it downright mean of m Landers."

"You mean 'count of olydore bein' sweet on e girl?" questioned em.

"I do," I tells him, d Lem went off grin-n'. I felt sort of sorry I said as much as I d, knowin' his gos-pin', news-spreadin' ngue. You see, I'd own Lucy Landers d Polydore ever since ey was born, and two cer young folks than ey was never 'tended e old red schoolhouse the hill yonder.

Well, the news 'bout ucy Landers' new earlin' went the unds in no time. Of urse folks got to talk-', and first thing we ew there was two ctions in Woodsville unty, one side hold-' that Polydore's arlin' would get the ue ribbon, and the her side boastin' up ucy's critter fur first ace. 'Twas nigh as citin' as a presiden-il 'lection, and the sy old man Krag and m Landers glared henever they hap-ned to meet, you'd ve thought—and ought right, too—at they had it in for ch other to beat the nd. It sure did trou-f me a mite, as I said before, me knowin' the spirit the two young folks.

"'Tis like this, Flagg," said Polydore one day. 'd dropped in at the shop to have his brown colt d. "'Tis like this," he said. "Lucy's yearlin' a first-class animal, and can beat anything in oodsville County, so long," he said, "so long as ne ain't in the ring."

"Well," says I, "I cal'late you've got no cause to rry, then, bein' as you're so certain of winnin'."

"That's the trouble," he sort of groaned. "Any dge of Jerseys that's a judge at all has got to ve my yearlin' the blue, and just as sure as he es, 'tis all off 'tween Lucy and me."

"That so?" I says. "And why do you give up so sy?" I asks, though I knew why as well as he did.

"For me to beat her out will put me in bad with r father," he said sort of hopeless like. "He's sore ough now, 'cause of dad's gettin' the nomination inst him for sheriff."

"Look here," I says to the lad. "Which would you ther have, the blue ribbon—or the girl?"

"The girl—of course," he answered, starin'.

"Well, then," I went on. "Sure and it's easy tled, it is. Don't show the yearlin'."

"I've got to—else dad would never speak to me ain," he said.

"Then you want the blue ribbon more than you nt the girl," says I.

"No such thing!" shouted the lad angrily. "It's too late to back out now, and you know it."

'Twas sure a quandary the boy was in. I couldn't sleep that night for thinkin' of it, but I'll be jiggered if I could think of anythin' he could do. As he said, to back down now would only make things worse. It seemed ridic'lous, too, to think that so triflin' a matter as a blue ribbon was like to spoil a love match 'tween two such nice young folks as Lucy and Polydore, and I was that riled I could have taken the fool daddies of 'em and knocked their heads together.

The next day, the lass Lucy came snoopin' into the shop and sat down on the old nail-keg. She was a pretty slip of a creature, with brown hair and big Irish blue eyes that were always sort of laughin'. From the way she had of holdin' out her little chin, 'twas easy to see she'd spirit and pluck and fire, and I couldn't help thinkin' as I looked at her what a grand wife she'd make for a young chap like Polydore.

"Good mornin', Mr. Flagg," she said, flashin' the white teeth of her in a smile that warmed the heart of me to see. "Of course you've heard 'bout my yearlin'?" she laughed.

"Ain't you 'shamed," says I, "of startin' so much talkin' and makin' miserable the heart of a certain fine lad we both know, by reason of this same yearlin' of yours?"

The lass eyed me sharp. "So he's afraid of me," she said. "He knows he's beaten already," she laughed, throwin' back her head like she was tickled.

"No," says I, sober, "'tis not that he's afeard of."

Lucy's face went pink. "I'm no good at riddles," says she, tossin' her head.

"Sure 'tis no riddle at all, and you know it," says I.

The lass hung her head, and for a long time sat quiet as a mouse, not speakin' a word, and starin' thoughtful like into the fire.

"Well," says I, after a bit, "guessed the riddle yet?"

She didn't answer, and wonderin' what had got her tongue, I looked over to where she was sittin'. Well, if she wasn't cryin'!

"Why—Lucy?" I stammers, feelin' a mite awkward and troubled. I never could stand to see a woman in tears, though I cal'late there's times when adoin' the same sort of loosens things up in their minds a bit.

"I wish," said the girl fiercely, "that my wretched yearlin' was dead—or lost—or somethin'. There!" she said. "Now you know why I'm cryin'."

"Look here," I says to her, "don't you want to win the blue ribbon?"

"No, 'course I don't," she choked out.

"Dry your eyes then," I chuckled. "Polydore told me that your yearlin's a good one right enough, but that his is a sight better. So you needn't worry 'bout the blue ribbon not goin' where you want it to go."

"He said that?" questioned Lucy. "He's no judge of Jerseys then, Mr. Flagg, if he'll talk such nonsense. Why," she exclaimed scornfully, "he's got no chance at all 'gainst me."

"Well," I says, "if you're so sure your yearlin's the best, and so sure you don't want to win the blue ribbon from Polydore, why don't you withdraw the entry? 'Tis easy settled," I says.

"Don't I wish I could!" she answered hopelessly. "But 'tis no use talkin'—father'd never forgive me. He's set on spitin' old Mr. Krag, 'cause of that sheriff business—and Polydore—" she shook her head mournfully.

It was a week or so before I saw Lucy again, and then one mornin' she came gallopin' up to the shop on her black mare. The face of her was lovely to see, happy and smilin' and pink with excitement. Right off I knew that she'd got somethin' on her mind that tickled her a heap.

"Mr. Flagg!" she cried, springin' from the saddle and dancin' into the shop. "I've an idea that'll work!"

"That so?" says I. "I cal'late this same idea's 'bout that yearlin' of yours," I says.

"Never mind," she laughed, "what it's 'bout. I've come," says she, "to ask you to lend me a hundred dollars."

I sure was plumb foozled, and stood starin' at her wide open-mouthed and pop-eyed for certain.

"Well?" says she, sort of impatient. "Will you?"

"I ain't a money-lender," I tells her. "But seein' 'tis you, Lucy, that's askin', I 'low I will."

"All right," says she promptly. "I'll take your check, and give you my note for eight days."

"Shucks," I protests. "I don't want no note nor nothin'. I'd let you have a sight more than a hundred, Lucy, without such pesky things as notes of hand."

"Either you take my note for eight days," she persisted, "or you keep the check. I'll not borrow money without givin' security," she laughed. "Supposin' I don't pay you the hundred dollars back when the same's due," she went on, smilin' sort of queer. "What else can you do but sue me and attach my property—my yearlin', for instance?"

"Attach your—your yearlin'?" I stammers, not catchin' her meanin' right off. Then of a sudden, I saw what the girl was drivin' at.

"Your pa'll be fightin' mad at me, if I was to do such a thing," I argued. "Though," I added, "'tis not Sim Landers—or any other man I'm afeard to stand meself up to, old as I be."

"You'll not refuse me the little favor I'm askin' of you," she pleaded, breathin' quick. "I'm but a young girl," she said, "that's like to lose her lover if you don't."

The lass sure did have my admiration that day, and I let my eyes tell her what I thought of her as she stood there, all pantin' of breast, and blushin' like a wild rose.

"I'll do it," says I to her. "You're but a pair of yearlin's yourselves," says I, "and blue ribboners at that, and, though Timothy Flagg be a bachelor, he's not the man to stand idle when Love's flutterin' a broken wing."

The girl laughed triumphantly. "I knew you would," she cried. "I'll make out the note," she said breathless. "I got a form from the store, and when the time comes, you'll know what to do.

President and People

NOW that the election is a thing of the past, the votes counted and the decisive result announced, the country can again breathe easier. Governor Wilson has been chosen as President by a vote so large and emphatic that it leaves no doubt as to his being the popular choice. Both houses of Congress will be of the same party as the incoming President, who will thus have full support in all measures for the benefit of the people. It has been a tremendous political revolution; but nobody has got hurt, the other candidates accept the result in good spirit, the people are satisfied and the great quadrennial tumult has passed away, leaving good feeling everywhere. Colonel Roosevelt made a gallant fight, and carried with him such a following as to demonstrate the continued vitality of Progressivism. Buoyant and hopeful in defeat, he has made an impression upon the political history of the country that cannot be and will not be forgotten.

That Governor Wilson appreciates the magnitude of the task before him is made evident in his first statement to the people, in which he proclaims that every true citizen, "of whatever alliance, must now lend his full force and enthusiasm to the fulfilment of the people's hopes and the establishment of the people's rights, so that justice and progress may go hand in hand." They look to him for an administration which shall be mindful at all times that the power of the Executive is derived from the people themselves, and not from a party or faction—an administration in which the interests of the whole nation and not of any class shall be paramount. There are wrongs to be righted, inequitable laws to be amended, privileged interests to be regulated and controlled, and economic conditions to be ameliorated. It is a mighty task, calling for clear-headed statesmanship and wide vision. We trust and pray that Woodrow Wilson may find reinforcement in that superior strength which comes from a Higher Source to undertake his task without any distracting entanglements which would divert him from being, in the best sense, a people's President. May head, heart and hand work together for the general good. The country looks to him for an administration free from partisanship, and which shall at all times try to promote the general welfare, and thus re-establish national confidence in the restoration of that ideal state which has been best described as a government of the people, by the people and for the people.

Responsibility for the War

THAT the human race is still barbarian at heart is shown by the frightful war now devastating the Balkans and European Turkey, in which the dead and wounded already number over 100,000. Added to the horror of the battlefield are the still darker horrors of massacres of noncombatants by the Turks, and of the ruthless slaughter of defenseless women and children. It is the old, familiar tale of fiendish atrocities which invariably mark the path of Turkish armies, whether victorious or vanquished. Civilization has made but little impression on the mixed troops of the Moslems, and remembering their many outrages against the defenseless Armenians, Macedonians and Roumelians in recent years, Europe is contemplating with deep misgivings the probable fate of the non-Turkish population of Constantinople, should that city seem likely to fall into the hands of the allies.

Had the Powers of Europe been true to their pledges and had they lived up to their profession as civilized Christian governments, the present war would never have occurred. It would have been unnecessary, as the iron hand of Turkey, which has oppressed and brutalized and butchered her Christian subjects for centuries, could and should have been restrained. Every power in Europe, Greece and the Balkan States included, is pledged to take its disputes to the Hague Conference. There is no quarrel between them that could not have been satisfactorily adjusted by arbitration. But ignoring their solemn pledges to seek arbitration, they have taken up the sword as though there were no Hague Conference in existence. Italy, Austria, Russia, France, England and Germany must all bear a share of the responsibility for the Balkan slaughter, as with concerted action these Powers, or a majority of them, could have prevented the war, and they probably would have done so, had not selfish interests hindered them from taking the only course that was open to governments pledged to peace measures—early intervention, looking to the protection of the people of Macedonia. Failing the support of "Christian" Europe, and powerless to change the attitude of Turkey by any other means than force, the Balkans took what seemed to them the only course open to save Macedonia and protect themselves.

"All of Grace"

SPURGEON'S story of the old woman who hid in the garden behind her cottage when she saw her landlord coming to the front door is well worth retelling. The landlord was passing a few days later, so the story goes, and seeing his tenant, greeted her and said that he had called a day or two earlier, but had not found her in. Then the old lady confessed. She had not been out; but she supposed he wanted the rent and she had no money for him. Then her landlord laughed goodnaturedly: "Why, no, Margaret, I was not after the rent. I happened to have a sovereign I thought you would like to have. So I stopped, as I passed, to give it to you. Now, unfortunately, I haven't got it; I gave it to some one else."

So do we, again and again and again, miss altogether God's point of view, fail utterly to understand what he is at. We think he is after us; that we have something, or ought to have something, that he wants. We get scared and burdened and take to hiding, because whatever it is that God wants, we feel that we cannot give it to him.

How wrong this is! God comes to us kindly, with ineffable neighborliness in his heart. All sorts of blessings he has for us; all sorts of riches he wishes to bestow upon us. And we hide away, and close our hearts with the bars of doubt—so that not even God can bless us—for he cannot get his gladness into a soul that does not trust him and believe him to be kind. Whatever the nature or the size of the calamities which may have befallen us, there is instant peace for us, and the beginnings of joy, if we will but trust him at once. Even a murderer can be forgiven; will he not then forgive your sin, and blot it altogether out? If you are conscious of wrong things remaining in your heart, things that are un-Christlike, can you not believe that God has in his gracious hands the gift that will cleanse your soul? If there is failure or perplexity or burden, can you not reckon that he will take care of you, and tell you what to do?

You do not need to pay him anything; "Jesus paid it all." You have only to come bravely out from your hiding, go to the door and let him in. He will flood your soul with the golden sunshine of his presence and his power. He loves you, tenderly, personally, definitely. He comes to your home, he stands at your door, he calls you by name; he waits to forgive your sin and cleanse your heart and solve your problems and give you power for your work.

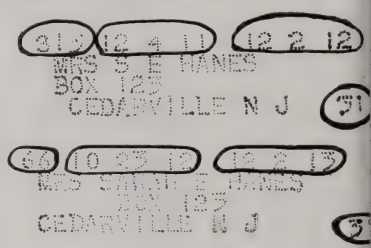
Expiration Dates and Other Figures

MANY of our subscribers are puzzled by a series of figures appearing on the wrapper in which their copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is mailed.

Each wrapper is addressed by a stencil. Stencils are cut on a typewriter with a special type which perforates the parchment paper. After the stencils are cut they are run through an automatic addressing machine, which takes each stencil and prints through it the name and address of the subscriber upon the manila paper wrapper.



When an order is received for a new subscription it is first given a number in the order in which letters are received in each day's mail. On the first label illustrated above, the number 813 means that the letter which brought this order was the eight hundred and thirteenth on that day. The order number is immediately followed by the date on which we received the order, that is: 12-4-11 (December 4, 1911). The next number on the label shows the expiration date, namely, 12-2-12 (December 2, 1912). In the lower right hand corner appears a number which is required by the post office. This number is the mail route number within that particular State. This route number is a great assistance to the post office for distributing magazines and periodicals.

The lower label shows that the subscriber renewed her subscription, her letter being the sixth on 10-23-12 (October 23, 1912), and that she paid her subscription till 12-2-13 (December 2, 1913).

Look at the addressed wrapper of your paper and see when your present subscription expires. Do not wait until that date to renew your subscription. It should be sent in several weeks in advance, as it usually takes about three weeks' time from the time your order is received until the new date of expiration can appear upon the wrapper.

Battleship "New York" Launched

THE warship New York, which, with her sister, the Texas, is the greatest of the country's battleships, was launched at the Navy Yard at Brooklyn the morning of October There were present at the exercises the Presi- nt of the United States, the Secretary and As- tant Secretary of the Navy, the commander-in- ef of the Atlantic squadron, the governor of New rk, many other distinguished men, and sixty ousand citizens as spectators. Commander John Bailey, barely thirty-five years of age, who had en charged with the responsibility of construct- g the vessel, touched the electric button that rted the New York on her way to the East ver. The battleship started slowly, glided oothly, and then shot into the water and out and der the Williamsburg Bridge, where she was ught by the tugs and towed back to e dock again. The sirens of four eat dreadnaughts, the whistles of ny vessels and factories on the ore, and the cheers of the sixty thou- nd people made such a noise that e "Star-spangled Banner" the band ayed could not be heard. The ship is 5 feet long, 95 feet wide, with a dis- acement of 27,000 tons. She has 14 ilers and engines of 28,100 horse- wer, with a speed of 21 knots. Dur- g the luncheon that followed the unching, the President expressed his tisfaction with the New York, and oke in praise of the new Pennsylva- a to follow. President Taft was the est of the enlisted men of the navy at e Sands Street Naval Young Men's ristian Association in the afternoon, d said: "I congratulate you from the ttom of my heart that there are such od women as Miss Helen Gould and hers, who are able to provide such lendid institutions as the Naval oung Men's buildings. There was a ne, my lads, when it was thought in der to be a good sailor one had to be ble to get drunk quickly. I am glad at day has passed, and to-day the uejackets and marines of our service e gentlemen, aboard ship or on shore. ey are men, gentlemen, who can be pended upon to respect the flag, and necessary to give their lives in its fense. My lads, the heart of all merica goes out to you." The United ates is now a great world power, and the present conditions the battleships ed to be needed to protect our rights nd maintain our standing, and yet ese great iron engines of destruction em a mockery to the best civilization nd to Christianity. It is to be hoped at by the very heavy armaments of e nations of the earth there may me to the conscience of the world the aste, the folly, and the wickedness of ar for ambition, or conquest, or im- ined wrongs, and there may dawn at day foretold when

They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Isa. 2: 4.)

Starts Run on Bank

THERE was a run on a savings bank in one of the cities of New Jersey the other day, which threatened serious consequences. As early as 6:30 o'clock in the morning, two hundred persons had formed in line, awaiting the opening of the bank doors. Although the law of New Jersey allows that a sixty days' notice may be demanded by bank officials before deposits can be withdrawn, the president of the bank did not avail himself of that provision and paid all who came with checks, and the excitement subsided. The cause of all the trouble was a Hungarian, who was intoxicated and came out of banking hours for money, and being refused, he told all his countrymen that the bank was broken, and hence the panic of depositors. Financial credit is a delicate thing, that can often be destroyed by a breath of suspicion. And it often happens that the breath of falsehood will injure an institution as much as that of the truth. If this incident of the run on the bank started by the ignorant, babbling tongue of the drunken depositor can be said the word of the apostle about a dangerous tongue:

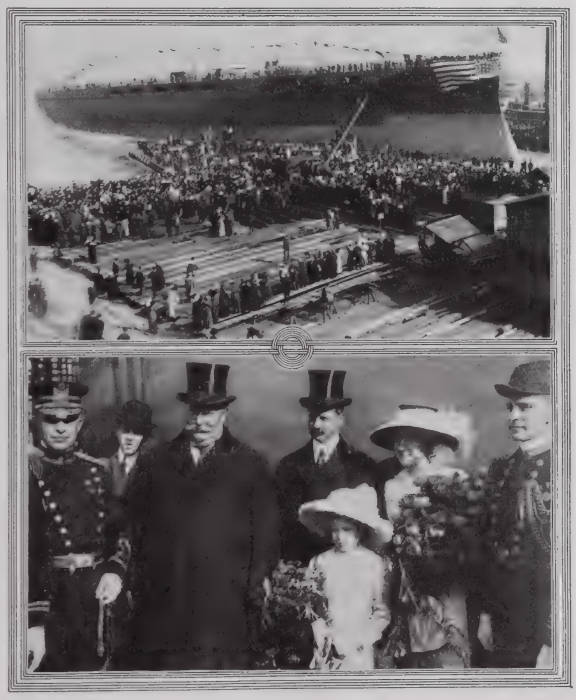
Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth! (James 3: 5.)

Shipwrecked Captain

CAPTAIN FRED GODFREY, master of the three-masted schooner John Maxwell, wrecked the other day on the shoals of New Inlet, N. C., was the sole survivor of the ill-fated vessel. Soon after the ship struck the rocks, about three-quarters of a mile from the beach, the mate and five men launched the lifeboats. Before the boat got a hundred feet it was upset and all were lost in the furious storm. Pilmos, the steward, and Captain Godfrey stuck by the wreck. Pilmos let the line of the life-savers slip through his numb fingers, and then in desperation he plunged into the sea, and, struck by a timber, he sank and perished. The captain, who was lashed to a mast till it fell, then fastened himself to a timber of the ship and through twenty-four hours of intolerable suffering drifted toward land and was pulled ashore. He could have used the words of Paul:

I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep. (II. Cor. 11: 25.)

The Great Battleship "New York" Slipping into the Water



Pres. Taft, Sec. Meyer, and Miss Kathleen Fitzgerald, Who Named the Ship

Fights Typhoid Successfully

THE State of Kansas has instituted a vigorous and successful warfare against typhoid fever. Whenever the vital statistics report of a city shows an unusual number of deaths from typhoid fever, an expert medical inspector from the State University is hurried to that city on the first train. He takes samples of the water and sends them to the university for analysis. Finding typhoid bacteria, he takes over the water supply system and instals a portable hypochloride plant for its purification. The plant consists of three large tanks that are set up outside the city pumping station. The mains are cut and run into the tank. In the first one the water is treated to remove whatever dirt may be in it, and in the second tank the water is given a hypochloride of lime bath. It passes into the third tank, where the lime is precipitated, and then the water goes into the water mains clear and free from all bacteria. The State furnishes the plant free of charge, and the work of the sanitary expert does not cost the city a penny. While the Federal and State governments are justly busy in finding cures for cholera among hogs, and tongue, lung and foot diseases among cattle, and gaps among fowls, it is a matter of the greatest importance also to safeguard the health and lives of the citizens, and to make a speedy and successful fight on such a fatal disease as typhoid, such as the State of Kansas has made in its movable water-purifying plant. The curative powers of modern medical science call to mind the physical healing of the Great Physician, and of the spiritual health of which it was a type.

But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings. (Mal. 4: 2.)

Rare Chinese Antiquities

THERE was a notable shipment of Chinese antiquities from the collection of Mr. A. W. Bahr in Shanghai to an art gallery on Fifth Avenue, New York, for exhibition. The shipment includes about two hundred paintings, dating from the seventh to the fifteenth century, many pieces of Chinese stone and marble sculpture, bronzes, porcelains, and specimens of pottery. Of peculiar interest in the exhibit are two hundred coins, dating from fifteen hundred years before Christ to 400 A.D., and a collection of banknotes of the Tang dynasty in the sixth century. These banknotes are made of a peculiar kind of paper that crumples like silk, yet shows no creases. The system of currency was exactly the same as that of our American banknotes of to-day. They represented the promise to pay of private banks, and were guaranted by the government. Each bill is dated and has printed on its surface rings of a size varying with its value, so that the illiterate could not be deceived. These specimens are eloquent witness to the fondness for the beautiful, and the enterprise of the dim centuries of the past. It is a question whether the museums preserve, or the excavations have revealed, any coins or banknotes more ancient than some of these. Some of them are dated almost as many centuries back of Christ as are between us and Him who held a Roman coin in his hand and made it preach a sermon on the duty of the Christian to the state.

And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and superscription? They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's. (Matt. 22: 20, 21.)

Named Baby After President

MR. AND MRS. J. Y. KYDER, of Denison, Texas, have done their part to prevent race suicide by giving to their country three healthy boys, born October 29. The parents determined that if the baby should be a boy he should be named after the President elected on November 5. As triplets were born, there was no difficulty in realizing their ambition to name a child after the President-to-be. So they called one William Howard Taft Kyler, another Theodore Roosevelt Kyler, and the other Woodrow Wilson Kyler. The day before the election the parents sent a telegram to the White House, announcing the birth and names of their three boys, and Assistant Secretary Brahny sent back a telegram in the President's name, wishing the triplets long life and prosperity. It has been the custom in all ages to call children after the great men of the world. In this country there have been babies named after every President. Almost any way we turn we can find a George Washington, a Thomas Jefferson, an Andrew Jackson, an Abraham Lincoln, a U. S. Grant, a William McKinley, a Grover Cleveland, a Theodore Roosevelt, or a William Taft. There is One in this world above every earthly potentate, with a name greater than theirs, which we may bear, and which it will be our glory to bear; it is that of Christian, after Christ, who is Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come. (Eph. 1: 21.)

THE CHILDREN OF THE WORLD FOR JESUS

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE best exposition of this story of the demoniac boy was given by one who said nothing about it—but he made a picture that speaks louder than words to those who have eyes to hear. I refer to Raphael's Transfiguration, which pictures not alone the transfiguration of Christ, but also the transfiguration of his three chief apostles, and two transfigurations of the boy—one by the devil, the other by Christ. It is this last transfiguration of the boy that is the real subject and object of the picture. As a skilled teacher would say, the demoniac boy is "the point of contact"; for this picture, the greatest painting in the world, is not a case of "art for art's sake"; it is a lesson, a sermon on how to beat the devil and save the boy.

I fear many who look at it do not really see it as the artist manifestly intended it should be seen, from the bottom up and back again. The message of this picture is addressed to those in every age who feel deeply, almost disheartenedly, the sins and sorrows of this world. Their boys, and their neighbors' boys, and other friends seem to be under the domination of evil to such an extent that neither loving parents nor sympathizing neighbors can break the spell. To all in such anxieties this message comes, as if spoken by Andrew, who, in the sad scene, is pointing up upward to a help that will be adequate, though his own efforts have failed.

There is help coming from the transfigured Saviour-King and the men of vision who have prayed with him at the verge of heaven. Such help can come by nothing but by prayer. Prayer will call the great Physician, and by prayer you may bring your devil-possessed children and neighbors to him. He who has been transformed by evil influences in his own life, or of heredity, or of social environment, shall be transfigured again by the renewing of his mind, beholding, as with open face, the glory of the Lord from character to character. To this end was the Son of God manifested.

The message is so especially appropriate to the Men and Religion work for boys that this picture might well be an illustrated seal to remind the workers that men of vision must not, will not, remain immersed in the work of their own particular organization when duty calls them to fight in the open to save the boy. The International Sunday School Association reports thirteen millions, under twenty, in all Sunday schools, and twenty-three millions of the young people of the United States under twenty years of age who are not in Sunday school. Taking out all who are under five years of age—and many of those should be in Sunday school kindergartens—there are more millions of children and youth outside of Sunday schools than in them; and those who are not in Sunday schools are very few of them in churches, and very few of them are getting religious teaching at home or in any other school. We are shut up to the horrible fact, which should make it impossible for any good man to be inactive in this matter, that one-half the children and youths of the United States are in the streets' school of evil on the Lord's Day and every day, and alas, many of the parents don't care, and in many cases there are no anxious apostles seeking to bring relief.

Few public schools give due attention to moral and religious training, and if they all did so, there would still be five millions unreached, for so many do not go to any day school, public or private. We have just secured these statistics from the United States Bureau of Education. And the Census adds other awakening figures that should rouse us to save the boys, namely, that in the "registration area" (about half of the United States) sixty thousand more males than females died last year—nearly twice that for the whole country—and three-fourths of these deaths come between twenty-five and sixty-four years of age, when the harvest of "wild oats" is reaped.

The great crusades for health against tuberculosis and hookworm and infant mortality and other physical ills have reduced the total harvest of death twenty-five per cent.; but in the face of this, death beyond forty are increasing, especially among men. There is one reasonable explanation of the fact that the average boy hasn't as good a chance as a girl of a strong and long life, and that is, that more boys than girls are led into sinful and foolish habits.

Now that we have heard the great appeal of the picture and the fire-bell statistics that show the peril of our own American boys, let us look through the lesson with intense watchfulness to see what it will teach us as to when and where and why and how we should save the boys, for we are surely the ones that should do it.

"They saw a great multitude, and Scribes questioning with them." Raphael condenses the whole Bible description; the afflicted demoniac boy, with strained muscles, wild eye and foaming mouth—an epileptic lunatic, we should regard him. On hand is the distressed father and despairing mother, their faces hardly less agonized than the boy's. On hand stand sympathizing friends and critical Pharisees, who care more for some theory about the case, or whether Christ's apostles may get some credit out of it, than for the distressed family. The nine apostles that did not go to the holy mount with Christ are there, perplexed and powerless; and there are the crowd moved by varying emotions of curiosity, sympathy, unbelief and anger. But Andrew is pointing up, for he has caught a ray of light from the transfigured Christ, as he comes back from his coronation to make the saving of boys his first royal act, as if to say in an age when less attention was

—MR. CONANT, secretary of the Massachusetts Sunday School Association, handed to the editor of the Round Table a leaflet containing the following questions:

STANDARD FOR A BANNER SCHOOL.

1. Has your Sunday school "A Cradle Roll"?
2. Has your Sunday school a Home Department?
3. Has your Sunday School an organized Adult Bible Class?
4. Has your Sunday school a Teachers' Training Class?
5. Has your Sunday school Graded Instruction?*
6. Has your Sunday school Missionary Instruction and made a Missionary Offering?
7. Does your Sunday school urge a definite decision for Christ?
8. Has your Sunday school made an offering for Denominational Sunday School Work?
9. Has your Sunday school made an offering for Interdenominational Sunday School Work?
10. Has your Sunday school made a report to the State Sunday School Association through the district, and did it have a representative at the last Annual District and State Convention?

* "Graded Instruction" does not necessarily mean graded lessons, for the uniform lessons are also graded. The grading, by years, that Mr. Conant suggests in another place is as follows: "Beginners, under 6; Primary, 6-8; Junior, 9-12; Intermediate, 13-16; Senior, 17-20; Adults, over 20, by a class or department.

Although the Massachusetts Sunday School Association is one of the best State associations, we believe that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class can improve it, and so we submit, with a request for the best thoughts of all readers, that the "Standard for a Banner Sunday School" should include the following points. (Let our readers name others or improve these):

1. The "Banner" or "Front Line" Sunday school should on its rolls have more than half as many boys and men as girls and women. More than one-third of its teachers should be men, some of them young men in their late teens faithfully and sympathetically teaching boys in their early teens. And there should be a strong men's class between the boys' department and the door.

2. More than half the children and youths from eight to sixteen should be regular attendants at morning church and at a midweek children's training class for church membership; and the obligation of the Sunday school to promote such attendance should be recognized by having those who do attend rise to be counted in the opening exercises of the school.

3. Those who have Bibles of their own and bring them for use in Sunday school should also hold them up each Sunday to encourage others to do likewise.

4. The Quarterly Temperance Lesson should be taught impressively in all grades, the teachers being called in council weeks in advance by pastor or superintendent to get suggestions and special helps to make the lesson a real power in individual lives and in the nation.

5. There should be allotted times when foreign, home and city missions should receive specific attention. The lessons of a year are sure to afford suitable occasions, and preparation for these great days should be made far in advance. Since the International Sunday School Association has appointed a "Commission on Adolescence," there should be supplemental lessons on the work it has taken up for different grades—to be taught preferably on a week day, at the home of the teacher or by parents in their own homes.

6. There should be systematic and proportionate giving in a way that will educate children for all forms of benevolence in which they should engage in mature life; including at least one offering for the support of the school, though the main reliance should be the regular church funds; including also some contribution to every denominational board, and a share something to local charity and to union work for State and nation and the world. The term "penny collection" should be tabooed, as belittling a great duty and cultivating meanness, and the word "offering" should connect it with the great teachings of the Bible about "sacrifices" to and for God.

Add to these Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 10 in Mr. Conant's list, and it will make up a standard well worthy of consideration and close thought for its improvement.

While this schedule is offered for careful study, there is danger of too much machinery and especially of too much dependence on machinery. The most important thing is spirit-filled, lesson-filled teachers, bent upon bringing their pupils to Christ and building them up into strong and useful manhood and womanhood.

THE CONQUEST OF THE KITCHEN

Domestic Science

THE domestic service problem is on a sure way to solution, however disheartening the outlook may be from some points of view. We can safely predict that the next generation will have it well in hand. In working it out, electricity, improved hydraulics, cooking and heating arrangements, easier distribution of food products (as by the United States Parcels Post), and similar measures of progress will play large part. Science, hitherto too much confined to business buildings and other fields considered of more importance than the home, is being brought into requisition to elevate housework from drudgery to a fine and agreeable art. Commanding all agencies to these tasks is the woman's school and college and the woman's club movement, which begin to feel their potentiality for converting each great city into a municipal home, and each little home therein into a fitting part. As indicator, we may take a glance (not mentioning half we see) at activities in Atlanta, which, in many respects, may be taken as a typical American city, neither too large nor too small, too Northern, Southern, or Western, for our purpose.

In fashionable Washington Seminary "society buds" gather with regularity about stoves and cabinets of cooking utensils in their popular Department of Household Chemistry and Domestic Science. They may also be found, under conduct of their teachers, studying the markets and the "high cost of living." In a big hardware store on Whitehall Street the writer asked a lovely "bud," one of an excited class observing demonstrations on a fireless cooker: "What school?" "Agnes Scott College." "You are interested in Home Economics?" "We are crazy about it! You ought to see our laboratory!" Laboratory! So that's what they call the kitchen!

The fall and winter program of the Wesley Bible Class of the First Methodist Church embraces study of Social Economics, some subdivisions being "The Vagrant," "Temperance," "Work and Play," "Environment," all bearing upon the great problem of "municipal housekeeping," as the women's clubs are teaching us to call city government.

At the convention in October of the State Federation of Women's Clubs, a large and effective share of attention was given to Social and Household Economics, not even the visit of one of the world's greatest peace pleaders, Baroness von Suttner, overshadowing it—rather, this might be said to accentuate interest in it, for the peace of the home is for the peace of the world; discomforts and discords in the home do not make for the larger peace. Mrs. Pennybacker, president of the National Federation, gave the home problem the most prominent place in her address.

The report prepared by Mrs. John K. Ottley, president of the Georgia division of the Welfare-Workers, for Mrs. John Hays Hammond, president of the national committees, records a significant incident in the act of Mrs. Charles A. Wood, of Atlanta and New York, who induced her husband to start the welfare work in his Southern hotels, beginning with the Georgia Terrace in Atlanta, where a model home for employees includes sleeping rooms, bathrooms, reading, rest, entertainment and hospital rooms. This is in line with what big department stores and manufacturing plants are doing everywhere in devoting attention to the improvement of the home lives of their operatives. While these measures are all directed to the right end, they yet fall far short in what should be the most important aim: Providing help for the wife and mother of the middle classes, the woman whose husband, however worthy and industrious, can make but a small salary; she must do housework, bear children and care for them. How can she pay trained, expensive help even to lend an occasional hand? The service of the college graduate of domestic science is not at the command of the purse of the mother of the people. It is the mother of the people who most needs it.

Greatness in Little Things

WOMEN have reason to be proud of the sons they bear. In the great matters of life men have proved that. In tremendous crises they rise to the issue. We can trust them. The loss of the Titanic proved that, oh, so pitifully! The wreck of the Springfield express October 3 proved it anew, when men unhurt, and men shaken, wounded, and burned, without regard to their own injury and peril rushed to the rescue and relief of others. Millionaires, lawyers, authors, poets, publishers, merchants—ay, and gamblers—worked side by side with the train-crew fighting flames and extricating passengers from wreckage.

In the little matters of life, how is it? Can women be as proud of the sons they bear, the sons they raise? How is it in life's little courtesies, life's little kindnesses to the home-folks? How about bearing in patience with the tired wife and worn-out mother as she seeks, her slender strength drawn upon at all points, to care for the sick baby in her arms, the older children clinging to her skirts, the hungry, weary husband home from work? Does he rise to the issue? Does he forget his own hurts and give aid to her? Does he speak crossly? Does he good-humoredly rush out to his club and leave the matter to settle itself? In daily trades, in ordinary business life, does he rise to the issue? If he does not, fathers and mothers, you can teach him to. It is in him. The Titanic and the Springfield express proved that. But wrecks, thank God, are few and far between, and daily life is all the time. Our nearest and dearest, close at hand; the friend, acquaintance, stranger, we pass on the street; those with whom we work, those under us in our work; those above us—each and all—may be struggling with an accumulation of mean little tasks and trials as well as with grave responsibilities pressing upon them, forcing them down and under as truly as would the wrecking of a train or the sinking of a ship on which they might be traveling. Let us raise our children to be great in all the little things of life. That is the one safe rule.

THE FIRST SEWING LESSON

"What Shall She Do?"

THE young girl's question as to whether she should marry an old man, whom she does not love and who does not love her but wants a housekeeper, "just for a home" for herself and father continues to interest our readers. In almost every letter on the subject the answer is, She should not; marriage without love is a crime. In the mass of letters before us, two ideas of the situation additional to those given may be presented; and then we think we shall "rest the case," as the lawyers say, with the young girl. If "in the multitude of counsel there is wisdom," she has certainly been well advised. A. B., South Dakota, says: "Try some other way than marrying for a home for your father, for that is what such marriage would be. It is just possible that dear father might not be wholly welcome in your husband's home after a while, and then what would you do? Your vows in marriage are for life." E. F., Washington, says: "The girl who marries simply for a home may find to her misery that she has only a house to live in. It takes love to make a home. My very soul revolts at such a marriage! She and her father had better go to the county farm. (That is pretty strong, but I would rather my daughter do that than marry without love.) She and her father would there have each other to care for without a third person to consider." A. F. K., Dorchester, Mass., writes: "The young man and woman begin life together with many a thing in common—the pleasures of life untasted. They grow old together. With the man years older, habits formed for life, ready to settle down; the wife young, eager to see, know, enjoy the things for which youth craves, the situation does not tend to make the machinery of the home run smoothly. My dear girl, it would not be 'home'; it would be bondage!"

A Young Man's Dilemma

IN a recent issue a young man asked our Family Circle to help him answer this question about his course to his sweetheart: "She teaches, and makes almost as much as I do. She does not yet know what she is to me. Is it fair to ask her to give up everything and help make a home on little more than half of what we both have now? and if she would do it, would she be sorry some time when she had to skimp? Would life lose its sweetness in the hard pull we might have?" "A Wife" answers: "Find out whether she loves you or not. That settled, it would be better to wait a year or two for marriage. During this time, each could be accumulating something for the home start. If she really loves her husband and he loves her, the skimping will not hurt. I know from experience. It would be pleasant for them while waiting to accumulate furnishings for the home, a little at a time. A girl should bring her husband as much help in the way of finances as possible." "Woman" writes: "It would be no more than fair to tell her of his love, and let her help decide. Teaching is a strenuous business. Most women long for a home of their own and one man's love. Life is not all to-day; time passes, women grow old, and nothing lives on like true love." "A Man" replies: "There is but one answer. It is absurd for him to ask her to live on half of what she now makes—that is what his proposal would amount to. Let him hustle and double what he makes. Then ask her." "Lover" writes: "He ought to tell her. If she loves him, it will inspire him to work harder and to lay up if she will wait a while for him."

Buttons for Souvenirs

BEFORE the late gathering of our warships in the harbor at New York, women were solemnly warned, or meekly implored, by the press not to debutton the United States Navy. Feminine visitors have a well-known fancy for buttons as souvenirs. The best way to secure the coveted prize is, of course, to get your officer friend to cut a button off his uniform with his sword for you. But this might not be handy—and to have an officer friend wearing a sword and willing to cut a button off for you is the fortune of few. So, it is said, women have a trick of slipping out a pair of scissors and snipping off a button from any officer or marine who will submit. It was a matter of comment that the Duke of Abruzzi was literally stripped of his buttons on the occasion of the visit of the Italian fleet to the Jamestown Exposition. The Italians were astounded and did not know what to make of it. The reason at the bottom of this "habit" lies not alone in the passion of the curio-hunter or in feminine desire for a military hatpin or brooch. It lies in woman's admiration for heroism; and she connects heroism with the military and naval uniforms. Let her keep the sentiment and leave the button!

You see, Mr. Flagg, the eighth day will fall a week next Saturday, and the fair opens the followin' Monday, and you mustn't forget that 'tis on Monday that the winnin' yearlin' is picked out by the judges."

"I'll not forget," I promised.

"Of course, not a word to Polydore—or anybody," she warned.

"Not a word," I agreed.

Well, no sooner had the lass rode off on her black mare, when in came young Polydore Krag himself. Mighty worried he looked, too, scowlin' black to see.

"Somethin's got to be done, and done quick, Timothy Flagg,", he opened up. "My yearlin' simply mustn't go before the judges a week next Monday. Lucy's father'll be that wild and ragin' at my gettin' the blue ribbon, he'll never consent to her marryin' me this side of doomsday—he's that stubborn."

"You've come to the right shop," I tells him, grinnin'.

"What d'you mean?" he demanded, lookin' plumb mystified.

"Let me lend you some money," I says.

"Money!" almost shouted the lad, eyein' me like he thought I'd gone crazy. "What do I want with your money?"

"You can give me your note of hand," I went on. "And if you don't pay me back a week next Saturday, I'll have the law on you. I'm a merciless, cold-blooded Shylock, if that was the fellow's right name," says I, "and if you don't pay me the hundred dollars I'm lendin' you the day that same is due, I'll attach yer prize-winnin' yearlin'. When it comes to business," I chuckled, "there's no mercy in old Timothy Flagg."

"Attach my yearlin'?" repeated the lad, lookin' plumb foozled.

"That's what I said," I laughs. "You'll have no chance for the blue ribbon then, I cal'late, Polydore, my boy, with the critter in the constable's charge."

The lad's face all lighted up. "Timothy Flagg, you're an old villain," he cried uproarious. "'Tis no blacksmith you be at all—but a lawyer—that might be earnin' thousands a year from some stealin' corporation that could use your fox's brain."

"That's neither here nor there," says I, not carin' for praise that wasn't rightfully due me, but not darin' to tell him the truth. "The question on the table," says I, as solemn as a lodge meetin', "is, will you do it?"

"Do it!" he cried. "You've saved my life, Flagg! 'Course I'll do it! Bring out your old note and let me put my monaker to it double quick short order." And he did, too.

"Mind you," says the lad, after we'd fixed the thing up, "not a word to Lucy 'bout this business 'tween me and you."

"Not a word," I promised, grinnin'. And after he'd gone, I took out my old pocketbook and laid his note 'longside the one Lucy Landers had give me.

'Tweren't a business that I exactly liked a bit, but there was no backin' out now, and when openin' Monday of Fair Week hove 'long, I closed up shop and went down to the store to see Ben Granger. Ben was constable, as well as storekeeper and postmaster.

"Ben," says I, "I've got a little job for you. There's parties here owin' me money and refusin' to pay the same. I want the law on 'em," says I.

"That so?" said Ben, lookin' kind of surprised. "Who be they?"

"Young Polydore Krag's one of 'em," I tells him, "and the other's Lucy Landers."

Ben's jaw dropped. "Lucy and Polydore owin' you money?" he squeaked.

"That's what I said," I went on. "And I cal'late the only way for me to get what's due me is for you to go over to the fair grounds and attach them yearlin's of theirs."

"I won't do no such thing!" he snapped, gettin' red in the face.

"Yes you will too!" I shouted. I hauled out the notes and legal papers that I'd had Lawyer Lane make out for me and slapped 'em down before his eyes. "There!" I says. "You serve the proper papers, and do it right off, or I 'low there'll be trouble."

"Well, seein' I was in earnest, and there bein' no way of his gettin' out o' the job, Ben started off.

"Be you comin' with me?" he asked sort of sour.

"No," says I. "I'm goin back to the shop to wait for developments."

Well, I cal'late stock in my reputation took a slump that day for certain. I knew there'd be hard words comin' to me, and right soon too. I weren't mistook either, for in 'bout an hour or so, 'long came old Krag and Landers, the pair of 'em, and fightin' mad they looked to be.

"Mornin'," I says, pretendin' not to notice the anger of 'em.

"See here, Timothy Flagg," shouted old Krag. "What's this mean—'bout Polydore owin' you a hundred dollars—and you attachin' his yearlin'?"

"And the same with Lucy?" put in Sim Landers, eyein' me fierce.

"Do they deny owin' me money?" I asks, feelin' plumb tickled, and not knowin' what else to say.

The two old fellers looked at each other sort of foolish.

"They don't," admitted Sim, swallowin' hard.

"They're of age," I went on, "and I 'low they've a right to borrow money if they've a mind to. What's more," I says loud and hostile, "they've got to take the consequences of not payin' debts when due. I'm actin' within my rights," says I.

Sim Landers reached inside his coat pocket and hauled out a check book, and Krag did the same.

"No, you don't," I says firm. "Those young folks has got to come forward and pay their own debts. I don't aim to encourage such doin's as their borrowin' good money and then have 'em expectin' other folks to come 'long and pay their debts for 'em."

"Look here, you old skinflint," hollered Krag, the face of him purple with rage, "you've gone and attached their yearlin's, and if you don't release 'em this very minute they'll be barred from the show."

"Can't help that," I tells him. "The minute Polydore and Lucy come 'long and settle, I'll release the attachment. Till they do," I says, "the attachment stands."

"But the young fools has gone off and hid themselves for shame," Sim told me. "When Ben up and served them pesky papers on 'em, they hiked out, and land knows where they be. Can't find 'em no place," he grumbled.

"'Tain't like you, Timothy," pleaded Krag, almost tearful. "My boy's yearlin' has got to win the blue ribbon, and would, too, if you'll only let up and act sensible."

"If Lucy and Polydore wanted to show the yearlin's, I cal'late they'd not run off and hide," says I, grinnin'. "You can bet they'd be seein' 'bout that attachment mighty quick."

"What you mean?" grunted Sim, suspicious.

The two old fellers stared at me hard.

"You've brought it all 'bout yourselves," I went on. "Tryin' to set one 'gainst the other."

Sim looked at Krag and Krag looked at Sim, and I could see that each of 'em was doin' some pow'ful tall thinkin'.

"Do you mean," said Sim again, "that 'tis a put-up job 'tween the two of 'em?"

given to boys, that nothing could be more important than to rescue a boy from evil influences and give him a new start for a useful and happy life.

"Teacher, I brought unto thee my son, who hath a dumb spirit." Let us not waste time debating whether epileptics and lunatics were or are "possessed by the devil." Science is telling us, at any rate, that there are more of both among the children of bad parents than of good ones. And whether that boy was possessed of the devil or not, many boys right about us surely are. In most cases the devil possesses them not by any secret league, but because they have given themselves openly into his power to do what will injure body, mind and soul. Sometimes parents are partly to blame, and sometimes the citizens also, for allowing evil things on every side that have made it too hard to do right and too easy to do wrong.

"Bring him unto me." Nothing we can do in the way of instruction, nothing we can do to make the streets safer; nothing we can do to make a better environment, though we should do all that, can take the place of conversion and character on the inside. A boy needs not only direction but disposition; not only a plainly directing guidepost, but especially strength and disposition to go on the road. A boy must be transfigured so that he will love the right and hate the wrong. He is not really converted until he is "a good hater" of evil as well as a lover of good. Hear Jesus saying even of the little ones of five and six, "Bring him to me." When a child is daily loving, trusting, and obeying earthly parents, it is very easy for him to learn to love, trust and obey the heavenly Father; and that is the essence of being a Christian.

Professor Henry Drummond, author of Natural Law in the Spiritual World, was converted at nine years of age in a children's meeting conducted by Mr. E. P. Hammond at Sterling, Scotland.

Dr. Joseph Parker writes of his childhood: "I cannot remember the time when I did not in some degree know the love of God's only Son. From a child I knew the holy Scripture, for it was the book most read in our house; from a child, also, though sinning oft and sinning deeply, I have known somewhat of tender spiritual experience, from my earliest recollections I have found supreme delight in prayer—prayer in that large sense which implies intimate and continuous communion with God. From the beginning until now my highest joy has been in solitary companionship with the eternal Spirit, my heart going after him with ardent and tender desire."

"If thou canst do anything." We often hear that we must have "great faith" to get anything of God, but the Gospel story abounds in cases like this where "little faith" was heeded; where a lamp that only smoked was not put out, and a bruised reed was not broken. When Peter sank as he tried to walk on the water, Jesus said, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" And Jesus reached out his hand to save even the man of little faith. In the storm-tossed boat, Jesus said to his apostles, "How is it that ye have no faith?" Their faith was too small to count, and yet Jesus answered. So in this case Jesus saved the boy in response to a father's prayer, who could only say, "Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief." However little our faith, let us use it to save ourselves and others. In the light of the whole story, this means we should first go to the holy mount with Jesus, and then come back empowered spiritually for doing good. Our orbit should be, "From prayer to work, and from work to prayer."

There can be no doubt that our modern religion is too much where Peter wanted to keep the transfiguration power—in "tabernacles." Many persons devote the time they have for religion almost entirely to meetings. They go and go again to the holy mount to "get a blessing," but they do not go to the rescue of devil-possessed boys. Many pious people do not even teach a Sunday school class. We need ever the warning of Longfellow's story of the monk who beheld Christ in a vision in his monastery, and just then the bell struck the hour when it was his duty to give bread to beggars at the gate. He hesitated whether he should leave the great vision for so prosy a task; but he went. Returning with anxiety lest the vision should meantime have vanished, the Christ said: "If you had stayed, I must have fled."

Another poem by some author unknown to the writer presents the same call from devotion to duty:

Hark, hark! a voice amid the quiet intense!
It is thy duty waiting thee without:
Open thy door straightway and get thee hence;
Go forth into the tumult and the shout;
Work, love, with workers, lovers, all about.
Then, weary, go thou back with failing breath,
And in thy chamber make thy prayer and moan.

"Lucy ain't hankerin' after that blue ribbon particular, under the circumstances," I says. "And I cal'late Polydore feels 'bout the same as she does. Sure 'tis natural they'd think the way they do 'bout the whole affair, lovin' each other as they do, and I don't blame 'em a mite."

The two of 'em stared at me sort of dazed. I could hardly keep from laughin' to see 'em, they looked that sheepish.

After a bit, Sim spoke up. "Anton Krag," he stammered, "I've been actin' mean as a yeller dog. I cal'late if folks hadn't wanted you for sheriff 'gainst me, they wouldn't have nominated you. Shake," he chuckled, stickin' out his hand. "The joke's on us, and I 'low the right thing for us to do is to be friends again, and give them young folks our blessin'."

"I be switched if you ain't right, Sim," answered Krag, his voice kind of husky. "You're right," says he, "and what's more, there ain't a girl livin' that I'd rather see wife to my Polydore than your Lucy."

Well, it did my heart good to hear 'em talk so sensible, and when Polydore and Lucy came snoopin' over to the shop 'long towards dusk that same evenin', the lass all radiant to see, and the boy lookin' like he'd got the world tucked inside of his vest pocket, I was the happiest blacksmith that ever fitted a horseshoe to a wall-eyed broncho.

"Mr. Flagg," said Lucy, smilin' and blushin', "thanks to you, neither of us won the blue ribbon for the best yearlin'."

"I'm a hard graspin' man,' says I, "and not till I see a little gold ring on the third finger of your left hand do the two of you get your notes back. There's no mercy in me," I chuckled.

The girl laughed. 'Twas the low, contented laugh of a happy woman. "Then we'll take those notes right now, I guess," says she, stickin' out her little hand.

"What?" I hollered, starin' at the gold ring that was on her finger.

"We thought we might as well get married to-day," she says softly.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

I AM eighty years old. I want to tell you how the Lord has answered my prayers from childhood. I have had lots of trouble and always took it to the Lord in prayer, and he has brought me safely through." So writes Mrs. E. S., of New Brunswick, N. J. "My son was very sick and I prayed to the Lord to restore him to health, which he has done." This is the testimony of C. S., of Waldwick, N. J.

"I want to tell in your Answered Prayer column how good Jesus has been to me. After praying for one of my heart's desires for almost seven years, he has answered. How sweet it is to know that he cares!" There are in this letter from "A Christian," of Bell Buckle, Tenn., suggestions of humility, patience, insistence, and affectionate gratitude, good characteristics for people who want to obtain results in prayer.

"I know that God hears and answers prayer. I always take my troubles to him, and he has never failed me. Only recently I had a very earnest prayer answered in a wonderful way. Thank God for his goodness to all his children." This bright and definite witness to the kindness of our Lord is Mrs. H. L. G., who lives at Meeker, Colo. "I was very sick," writes A. G., of Robertson, Pa., and wish to acknowledge God's great goodness and mercy to me in answering my prayer." L. M. H., of Huntington, W. Va., writes: "I wish to acknowledge through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that God has answered my prayers in restoring me to health."

"I wish to thank God for answering my prayer and restoring the life of a dear sister," writes L. E. N., of Erin, N. Y. Mrs. T. B., of Dwight, Ill., writes: "I wish to add my testimony to God's goodness in answer to prayer in finding a lost relative."

The first letter quoted in this list was from an aged saint; the last will be from another. J. J. E., of Bellingham, Wash., writes:

"I have been a constant reader and subscriber of the HERALD for many years, and it is a great support and comfort to me in my old age, and I want to add my testimony to the efficacy of prayer. I know that our heavenly Father does answer prayer. He has answered my prayers many, many times. Recently I was in trouble. I earnestly prayed God to give me strength and to guide me and help me to solve it, and I am happy to say that my prayer has been answered. How I wish everybody would go to God in prayer and ask his guidance in all things. He has promised to answer our prayers and he will do it."

Acknowledgements of answered prayer have also been received from:

$1,009.31 R. A. Richardson of Haverhill, Mass., a shoe cutter, made his hens pay him $1,009.31 in 1910, and kept working at the bench at the same time. How he did it is told in "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping."

Mr. F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., in the past twenty-five years has cleared $13,400.31 from hens. This is a remarkable record when it is known that Mr. Dunlap is employed ten hours a day in store and all the time he has to put in with his hens is what he can get morning, noon and night. This $13,400.31 was all made on the side. Once Mr. Dunlap get fancy prices for what he has to sell. He ships to Boston, and takes current quotations from the commission men there. Mr. Dunlap began in 1887 with twenty hens. In 1910 his poultry profits figured out $1188.05—and this is all on the side. Mr. Dunlap's hens have bought him a beautiful home, purchased horse and carriage, sent three boys to school and college, besides saving something for a rainy day. Can others do equally well?" Sure thing," says Mr. Dunlap, "if they will wear out the soles of their shoes faster than they do the seat of their chair." The story of Mr. Dunlap's success and his methods is told in the book, "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping," and it is only one out of a score of things to be the blood tingling and make one resolve to get next to the $600,000,000 spent in the United States each year for poultry and eggs.

"SIDE-LINE POULTRY-KEEPING"

is the name of a new book by the author of "200 Eggs a Year Per Hen," the most popular poultry book ever printed. "Side-Line Poultry-Keeping" deals with the business side of poultry keeping as the other dealt with egg production. It tells how to make poultry keeping pay. It describes the methods by which F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., makes over $1000 a year from eggs, devoting not over two hours a day to his hens. Not a detail left out. The book tells how to make a start, what breeds pay, how, when and where to buy a farm, how to make a living from the first, describes the most successful bookkeeping system in the world, tells how to build the most economical poultry houses and trap nests, how to feed for best results, describes a feed that can be made for 15 cents a bushel and is without a peer for producing eggs, how to make money with pigeons, ducks and market gardening, how to buy and sell to advantage, how to pick out the laying hens, how to put down eggs so that they will keep a year, etc.

Invaluable to every man who wishes to make money on the side, and indispensable to the man who is looking forward to the free, independent, healthful life of the poultry farm. Ninety-six pages; illustrated. Price 50 Cents, or with the American Poultry Advocate one year 75 cents, two years subscription and book for $1. When given as a premium for two yearly subscriptions at 50 cents each. ELIEF PLANS FOR BALKANS

Pastor Furnajieff of Sofia, chair-n of the Relief Committee, writes to E CHRISTIAN HERALD under date of tober 23:

We will have in connection with Committee as representatives a ek, a Servian, a Turk, a Jew, two erican missionaries and four or prominent Bulgarian ladies and tlemen. Our committee will divide contributions sent by your gen-us readers, partly for hospital k through the Red Cross, among poor wounded fellows in the hos-ls, and partly in helping the lows and orphans of the war. Our d of operations will include Bul-ia, Servia and Greece. We purpose ting an audience from the Queen of lgaria, and asking her to be hon-ry president of the Relief Commit-

Your generous-hearted CHRIS-N HERALD readers are always ready, er the example of our blessed Mas-, to 'go to all in need.'

The situation here is the most seri-in modern history. The promises rkey has repeatedly made to the wers to introduce reforms in her ropean provinces have always led in failure. Only last summer ssacres took place, the victims be-innocent Christians. Turkey made excuses for these crimes, nor can make any. This hopeless situation brought about the present war. It a war for humanity and Christian-and for simple human justice. ile war is always an evil, it seems be the only plan that will give the per solution of the Balkan problem. Now the war is being waged all ng the line. The sentiment in Bul-ia is not for the war, as war; but Macedonia cannot be freed without oodshed, then Bulgaria accepts war the only alternative. Prayers have n offered to God for peace, or rather the peaceful settlement of the question; but the Turk 'cannot reform.' In my church we have had special services for prayer for three weeks, and the church is as full weekdays as on Sunday mornings. We have called upon God to free the enslaved without the terrors of war, but now we call upon him to make the war brief, and to accomplish the end without much sacrifice of life.

"With the opening of the war, the usual, or, rather, the unusual sufferings began. The Red Cross Society has organized all over the country. The women are working away daily. Everybody is doing his best helping. The people have a mind and heart to work. Of course, the Red Cross has the wounded as its particular care. But what about the families left absolutely penniless when the husband or brother, who supports little brothers and sisters, went to war? And what about the thousands of orphans that the war creates? Thanks to God for the generosity of his people. He is the God and Father of the orphan and widow. The help that may come to us through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be distributed according to the needs: Turks, Armenians, Greeks, Servians, Bulgarians, or any other person in need will be considered. I understand the broad, cosmopolitan sympathies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and am ready to assure you that its help will be distributed according to its creed.

"One word to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Pray and help us, dear friends. The case is exactly like that one: 'Come over into Macedonia and help us.' Already the fanatical rage of the Turks has made multitudes of children orphans, whose parents have been massacred. Put yourselves in our place; realize the situation if you can, and then act upon the golden rule of our blessed Master."

HOW TO READ THE BIBLE

"I WOULD greatly help us," writes Professor David Smith in the British Weekly, "if, apart from details of erpretation, we had a broad concep-n of the Bible's nature and purpose. is not a promiscuous repository of fication. It is the record of God's f-manifestation in the history of ael—a revelation which dawned ly, and broadened from age to age til it reached the noontide of the spel. The recognition of this sim-fact is illuminating. It defines perspective of the Bible. Recog-e that the Bible is the record of a toric and progressive revelation, d all confusion will fall into order. sense of the perspective of revela-n helps us to find our way about in Bible, to understand what its mes-es meant when they were first de-ered, and to apply them to ourselves. is the office of a Christian teacher explain all this. A true ministry is ucative, and it seems to me that a nister is false to his trust unless he be continually enlarging his people's conceptions of the grandeur of the revelation which is enshrined in the imperishable record of Holy Scripture, and helping them to appropriate ever more and more of its hid treasure. As for difficulty about spending time in prayer, I am not sure that it is the time we spend that matters. You remember the prayer with which the saintly Bengel was accustomed to close each day: 'Lord Jesus, it is just the same as ever between thee and me.' That was all, and it was abundantly sufficient.

"It is a true paradox that we pray most when we pray least. For the exercise of prayer is so often a returning to God, and that would be unnecessary if we continued in his fellowship. The secret of prayer is loving Jesus; and if only we know him, we must needs love him, and our every thought of him will be a prayer, an outgoing of our hearts in faith and desire."

THE assurance that there is real help for tired, exhausted nerves has come as a veritable boon to thousands of men and women—in a crisis when their nerves have broken under the taxation of strenuous effort, debilitating illness or weakening worry.

There is no condition where a lack of physical or mental vigor more quickly affects efficiency than a lowering of nervous vitality.

The universal indorsement of Sanatogen by over 16,000 physicians gives scientific authority to the enthusiastic praise it has received from multitudes of grateful men and women who date their return to nerve-health from its use.

If you find yourself with shattered, weakened nerves—at a stage where work is driving effort—where you lack interest in things in which you formerly took pleasure—where digestion is impaired—where sleepless nights are the rule—where you are irritable—you will do well to give heed to what these physicians have said about Sanatogen.

Sanatogen is a nerve food—scientifically combining the elements necessary to feed the nerves. It is a compound of purest protein and organic phosphorus in a form that readily and easily digests—imposing no burden upon the most delicate stomach—and not causing harmful temporary stimulation. Sanatogen is just cell and nerve food—pure, real, ideal.

You may find Sanatogen is what your nerves need.

ANCIENT THANKSGIVINGS AND OTHER ITEMS

IN ANCIENT history days the feast of Thanksgiving lasted during one phase of the moon and was a sort of "harvest home" festival which was called the Feast of Tabernacles. The offerings which the ancient Hebrews made to God on this occasion were gold, silver and precious stuffs, besides laborers to work upon the rebuilding of the House of God. Read the first chapter of Ezra and you will find that this is so. The Thanksgiving was an occasion of great pomp and ceremony. Workers in the church of God from the head dignitary to the least among them were clothed in purple and fine linen and wore golden bands upon their turbans bearing the inscription, "Holiness to the Lord." They blew great trumpets as a signal, and all the people gathered together in the open places of the cities singing and praising God and giving thanks. Moreover, the building received the name of the builder. The Temple of Zerubbabel, for example, was built by Zerubbabel under King Cyrus. So the feast of Thanksgiving which we observe so joyously to-day in our homes and churches and in memory of "good times," generous harvests, general welfare in the days of our Puritan fathers, has been a church festival for many centuries.

Eight Charming Pictures

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wants to send you a group of eight beautiful pictures in color as a Thanksgiving gift. The pictures are 15x12 inches in size, and include glued stripping with which to passepartout them. Owing to the limitations of space, we ask our girls who are interested to write to the Aunt in the Cozy Corner enclosing a stamped and addressed envelope for reply.

LITTLE PEOPLE'S CORNER

ON RAINY days, when I was a little girl, we screened off a corner of the nursery with a taut sheet, making the space on one side very dark and the other bright with the light of a lamp that had a reflector, and then we played at Shadow Pictures to our hearts' content. Our principal properties, as I remember them, were an old bonnet and a cardboard beak for Mother Goose. A tin horn and a woolly lamb on a tiny platform, for Boy Blue, a basket of flowers and a rake, a fishing line and a pail, a cardboard crown and a bowl for Mistress Mary, Simple Simon and Old King Cole. At every performance we added new properties and new pictures to our rainy day pantomimes, and among the many good times that we had together in the old nursery at home, somehow the rainy days shine out the brightest and best.

Can't Tell Where to Find Them

I remember the evenings too; mother usually came to tell us a story around the big open nursery fire, and after our little folk supper of bread and milk and cooked fruit, we often spent the hour before bedtime making up the verses which invariably we recited before each shadow picture, and to this day I recall those verses as clearly as the Mother Goose rhymes themselves. Can you guess this one?

My first is as easy as easy can be;
My second a long drawn sigh must be;
My third is a man spelled with an O:
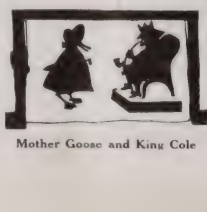
My WHOLE is a boy too stupid to know.

Our Good-Night Verse this week is:

I will sing unto the Lord, because he hath dealt bountifully with me. From the Psalms.

Lovingly and faithfully,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner



Mother Goose and King Cole

Miss Cocroft has prepared the instruction for this course. Those who know her—national—yes international—reputation as a restorer of health and youth, will be pleased to hear of this new feature in her work as they will be certain that it will produce precisely the results she claims for it:

Wrinkles Sagging Facial Muscles
Double Chins Flabby and Thin Neck
Tired Eyes Crows Feet
Pimples Pouches beneath the Eyes
Sunken Cheeks Thin or Oily Hair
Tender Inflamed Feet Sallow
Discolored or Freckled Skins and many other blemishes are relieved by invigorating the muscles and bringing more nourishing blood to the parts affected.

The expression is invigorated, the skin becomes firm, smooth and clear, the hair glossy and abundant, and our pupils look ten years younger.

40,000 people buy this car and reduce the cost for each other

WERE only one automobile made by a factory it would come sky high to the lone purchaser. It would it thousands and thousands of dollars.

But when 40,000 people insist that their be built in one factory—each car comes he rock bottom price—less than one thousand lars apiece.

This accounts for the exceptional value verland buyers secure. Combined buying wer—the 20th century economy factor—is key. This is the reason folks talk "Over-d" this fall, from Seattle to Savannah d Portland to Pasadena. Never before s there been such a car at such a price. astonished the civilized world.

The Overland 69T is the direct result of olution. A limited output of good cars s the acorn from which the oak grew. e better Overlands became known—the re folks wanted them. The more Over-ds made—the less each cost. Because more raw material bought—the less the it expense. Thus, every year, Overland ices have been reduced.

Realize the tremendousness of this Over-d production; try to visualize a pro-ssion of 40,000 Overlands. This is not estimated output. Dealers contracted for ,000 cars before a public announcement as ever made. Our output is 150 cars a y—nearly 1000 a week. Right now we are er 3000 cars behind our immediate ship-ping orders and have been for ninety days. How else—were it not for this wonder-ful production efficiency—could $985 buy the highest priced features in motor car con-struction? Set the big quality features down on paper; balance them up in other cars; compare them; study them; you cannot match them for less than $1200 in any other factory in America. Size, strength, seating capacity, wheel base, chassis construction, comfort, beauty and finish—this model matches any $1200 car manufactured.

Where in a car at less than $1200 can you secure a thirty horsepower motor—a wheel base of 110 inches—center control, three-quarter floating rear axle and drop-forged I beam front axle, fitted with expensive Timken and Hyatt bearings? The double set of drum type, internal expanding and external contracting brakes—13 inches by 2¾ inches—are not surpassed on $1500 cars.

Consider the economy in buying equip-ment for 40,000 cars. Here on this $985 car you get the very finest accessories manufactured—those placed on $5000 cars. It has a Warner speedometer—the best made; it has a fine mohair top and boot; it has a clear vision wind shield; it has a self-starter and Prestolite tank. And all for the one price; there are no "extras."

Our greatest problem is in supplying the demand. The entire 1913 Overland output is contracted for. If you want an Overland we advise quick action.

See the Overland dealer in your vicinity. He is at your service. His name and ad-dress supplied by us if you wish.

Something new in a motor car book

It's FREE

FRESH from the presses after months' preparation, we have just received a consignment of our big, interesting 1913 book. Every one should have a copy. It is the most educational piece of motor car literature published. Nothing more complete can be secured.

This book discusses motor car construc-tion in general. Filled with vital infor-mation, written in good, understandable style, it will be read with interest.

The preparation and distribution of this book de luxe cost us thousands of dollars.

This was absolutely necessary as our silent salesman. Our 2,000 agencies, as-sociated salesmen, district managers and factory representatives have never yet been able to call on all inquiries for Overland information. So this book was prepared as an aid to them. We got it out in proper fashion—the way we always do things.

This fine work is yours, free. Just drop us a postal and you'll get it by return mail.

THE PEOPLE'S VOICE ON ROME

VARIOUS VIEWS FROM CORRESPONDENTS ON THE PLAN TO "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC"

The Hierarchy's Pretensions

THE Roman Catholic hierarchy claims as an inherent right of the Pope the so-called two swords, the sword of the church and the sword of the state; that is, it claims not only the right to govern the people spiritually but also civilly or politcally. According to Roman Catholic public teaching since the time of Innocent III, the Pope is the vicegerent directly under God, having supreme power over church and over state in the whole world, the "supreme potestas spiritualis and temporalis," which latter power the Pope conveys to kings and emperors, to be exercised, however, only subject to his, the Pope's, control. This is fundamental papal law, and holds not merely in Italy (where the Pope poses as a voluntary prisoner because the temporal power has been taken from him), but in every other country of the world, and therefore, also, in these United States. Rome bows only to necessity; it does not change. Its claims, being directed from Rome, are the same everywhere, the same here in our country as in Italy, or France, or Spain. The purposes and hopes which certain high dignitaries have lately expressed concerning our country are not new; they have only been left in abeyance because they were not seasonable. Rome watches her chance through the ages, and her religious features are only her sheep's clothing.

Expose these facts. Prove them from Rome's own mouthpieces. If you can make them clear to the people, then they will understand why foreign peoples now for centuries have had to fight Rome in the state and to throw off the temporal yoke. Then they will also understand the reason for the hitherto existing unwritten sentiment of our nation, to wit: No Roman Catholic in high political office. They will see that this sentiment is not one of religious bias, but one of elementary civil government.

Show the results of Roman Catholic dominance, viz.: 1. Interference from Rome in our government. 2. Interference of a power openly out of sympathy with our institutions and sentiments. 3. Opposition to religious liberty by a power claiming the title, "alone saving church," and declaring the mission to overcome and to crush all heresy even by the use of the civil sword, laying this duty on emperors and kings at the pain of papal displeasure and ban, and of the loss of their crowns. 4. License for the Roman Church, its dignitaries and every priestly servant to do as they will. Immunity from the courts of all of its servants, even in criminal matters, for Rome always judges, and is judged by no one. 5. Branding of diverging belief as heresy, wives as concubines, and our sons and daughters as illegitimate, etc., etc.

Permit me to assure you of my sympathy and sincere Christian charity for every Roman Catholic in so far as he is seeking his soul's salvation in his own way. Spiritual light cometh only from above, and every servant standeth and falleth to his own master; I would not judge him, but on the contrary accord him that same measure of religious freedom which I should desire for myself. But the Roman Church as an organization is more than a religious corporation; it claims power not only over its own members, but over me and all the people of the world. This I must resist, and this I believe every American citizen should resist. If they become familiar with the facts, I believe they will, and the advice of the great reformer, Dr. Martin Luther, will be understood and cherished: "Deus vos impleat odio papæ." (REV.) H. B. HEMMETER,
St. Louis, Mo. (Lutheran.)

A Campaign of Education Needed

FOR a number of years I have been deeply interested in watching the maneuvers of the Church of Rome, and have always felt that we were too lenient as a nation to have our best institution, viz., the public school system, so publicly abused. For a number of years I taught school in northwestern Ohio, my native State, and I had my eyes opened many times to the workings of this church. We should begin a campaign of education to wake the people up to the fact that we are at the present time allowing a foreign church to educate 1,500,000 children, who are openly taught to honor the Pope ahead of all other men.

I do not believe in religion mixing in politics, but I do believe in religious men getting in politics, and the women, too, for I am a believer in woman suffrage. Every nun or sister who teaches or nurses is a direct competitor of women who are making a living for themselves, and sometimes for others, and their money goes into the treasury of Rome. Protestantism has, during the past few years, been flirting with Romanism, and it does no good. Lincoln saw this, and Lafayette, our great French friend, also said that "if ever the liberties of the republic would be destroyed, it would be by Roman Catholic priests."

I am not pessimistic, but we cannot get away from the truth. I was in Canada during the last Federal election, and it was Romanism that defeated Laurier, not reciprocity or annexation. One day among thinking people soon brought this to light.

Mrs. C. E. V.
Britannia Beach, B. C.

How Rome Falsifies History

IN YOUR issue of June 21, I see you give the new Columbus monument an extensive notice. Now, with your stanch attitude on the Roman Catholic menace, it is perhaps just a little oversight to so recognize what is on the part of that church a deliberate attempt to turn the ideals of the people of this land from the Pilgrim Fathers to Columbus and Spain and the Catholic Church. We all know that the erection of this monument was brought about by the appropriation of $100,000 out of the public treasury, and instead of being a national event at the unveiling, it was strictly a Roman Catholic Church function. The rector of the Catholic University at Washington termed the dedication of this monument "the greatest public act of Catholic faith since the time of the plenary council of Baltimore."

I enclose a copy of part of a sermon by Bishop William S. Perry, in St. Paul's Church, at Baltimore, I think in the '90's. It is quite fitting to-day, and should be given the widest publicity, owing to this recent event and the brazen attempt to have October 12 made a national holiday for the benefit of the Roman Catholic Church.

Elgin, Ill. A. H. RITTENHOUSE.

The extract from Bishop Perry's sermon is given below:

"We, throughout American history, read of the struggle between the Latin nations and faith, and the English nation and religion, for the supremacy of the North American continent, including these United States. This contest began when Castile sent forth Columbus to discover the New World, and when the Roman Pontiff issued his bull recognizing the discovery of America as in the interest of Spain and of the Roman Catholic Church. It is clear that there was no intention to allow any other people or religion, except Spain and Rome, to share the benefits of the discovery of America. The bull of Pope Alexander VI (the Borgian) makes this plain. Francis I of France later emphasizes this, and then the struggle continues.

"England never recognized the alliance between Spain and the Roman Catholic Church, nor the claim to territory growing out of it. Little recked Rome that Sebastian Cabot would discover the best part of the Western World, carrying to it the liberty which England's Magna Charta secured. On June 24, 1497, Sebastian Cabot sighted the North American shores, off the coast of Labrador, and sailed south along the coast of Newfoundland and New England. It was Cabot who first found, in spite of the decree of the Roman Pontiff, the territory now held by the United States and Canada. This priority of the discovery of North America emphasized England's dislike for Spain and Spain's jealousy of England.

"Strange, indeed, would have been our religion, the features of our government and of our estate, if the standard of Spain had been raised on our shores. But God, in his providence, provided a different destiny when he designed that North America should be settled by the robust English and Scotch race; that ours should not be like the territory of Mexico and of the South American republics. Let us in our congratulations, public and private, heartily thank God that Columbus did not discover the territory of North America; and that we do not owe our freedom of religious faith, nor of speech, to Rome. The bull of Borgia was not allowed, by the reckless tracing of a line on a map, to dispose of the territory of the United States, for God's hand was there, ordaining that the (so-called) successors of Peter should not control the religion of that territory, or the destiny of North America.

"The discovery of Cabot was thirteen months before Columbus discovered the coast of North America. Cabot's eyes had first seen, and his feet had first trodden, the soil of America for England's queen and church. To him also belongs the credit of knowing what he had discovered—a new world—while Columbus still thought he had discovered the East Indies, or the fair land of Cathay.

"The struggle is not yet ended, for God intended it to go on between the two civilizations, the two religions, the two races, from the discovery of America to the present day. The old claims, the old assumptions, exist in Rome to-day. The Roman Catholic Church now seeks to control things, and at this time it is specially important that the principles which are now forming and the problems now threatening should be studied.

"We owe nothing to Columbus or to Spain. Our nationality, our liberty, our history, our literature, our culture, are due to the acknowledged power of the principles of the survival of the fittest, and to the settlement of North America by English soldiers, sailors and other colonists. The ruling ideas, the very turn of our thought, the manhood of our people, declare who was in the struggle for the continent."

The Double Menace to Our National Life

I want to tell you how much I enjoy your paper, and especially your fearless exposé of Catholicism and Mormonism, two evils that menace our national life. Your editorial commenting on the Democratic Convention at Baltimore, and your remarks on Mr. Bryan were read by many of us common people who have learned to love and trust the great Commoner. His only fault, if it be a fault, is that he is years ahead of his time, and head and shoulders above most others in courage and strength of purpose.

SCOFFERS

Often Make the Staunchest Converts.

The man who scoffs at an idea or doctrine which he does not fully understand has at least the courage to show where he stands.

The gospel of Health has many converts who formerly laughed at the idea that coffee and tea, for example, ever hurt anyone. Upon looking into the matter seriously, often at the suggestion of a friend, such persons have found that Postum and a friend's advice have been their salvation.

"My sister was employed in an eastern city were she had to do calculating," writes an Okla. girl. "She suffered with headache until she was almost unfitted for duty.

"Her landlady persuaded her to quit coffee and use Postum and in a few days she was entirely free from headache." (Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.) "She told her employer about it, and on trying it, he had the same experience.

"My father and I have both suffered much from nervous headache since I can remember, but we scoffed at the idea advanced by my sister, that coffee was the cause of our trouble.

"However, we finally quit coffee and began using Postum. Father has had but one headache now in four years, due to a severe cold, and I have lost my headaches and sour stomach which I am now convinced came from coffee.

"A cup of good, hot Postum is satisfying to me when I do not care to eat a meal. Circumstances caused me to locate in a new country and I feared I would not be able to get my favorite drink, Postum, but I was relieved to find that a full supply is kept here with a heavy demand for it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

dress or two that may diffuse a faint odor of benzine, and perhaps mittens or a muffler, flannel shirts, stockings or a little felt hat, pencils for school, hair-ribbons, or a brush and comb, or a new purse—and a twenty-five cent piece in the purse has never been known to go begging for an owner—boxes of sweet crackers, nuts, raisins—well, there! that one is filled to bursting, at least! And every separate thing is tied up in tissue paper, with red ribbons, and at the very toe there is a tiny "surprise," a puzzle that only cost ten cents, or a little Japanese doll, or a string of blue beads! Imagine all those things spread about in a shabby little kitchen, away across the city, on a fine Christmas morning, and imagine another stocking or two in the flat below, and a dozen more scattered down the block. It certainly seems to add, at a very small cost, an incalculable amount of cheer to one's own Christmas.

All through December pathetic little letters come in, begging for Red Stockings. One cannot read these penciled, hard-wrought little missives with dry eyes. A twelve-year-old begs for a stocking for "our children," the two younger sisters and the baby. "You would send it if you could see them," writes the loyal big sister. "It was all the children had"—"I had been dreading the day for them"—"It was the happiest Christmas of their lives"—the phrases occur over and over, when the letters of thanks begin to come in. "But how did they know about us, the names and ages and all?" the bewildered, happy mothers say.

Two small brothers sat "just touching" the wonderful stuffed Red Stockings, until a conscientious mother could go through the snow to the corner grocery to telephone and find out if the good thing could possibly have come to them. One small girl "prayed" for a doll's carriage, and, used by this time to Christmas miracles, the committee wasn't enormously surprised when that identical little girl's stocking was wheeled to her in the handsomest doll's carriage imaginable. The funny and pathetic and delightful episodes multiply hour after hour. One young mother, before the second Christmas, brought back to the committee the little caps and dresses, socks and wrappers, that her baby had been given a year before, all beautifully laundered and sweet, ready for some other mother's baby.

The second Christmas saw three thousand five hundred and thirty-five Red Stockings going their happy ways, and in 1910 there were nearly a thousand more. This Christmas will break all the other records—and even a pessimist might predict that every coming Christmas will see more and more and more Red Stockings. They are filling them in India, in Vienna, in California, and so far and wide is the enthusiasm spreading that one can't help feeling that this will some day be the recognized way of equalizing things on Christmas Day everywhere.

It is inexpensive, for the committee says that it can fill any stocking for a dollar and a half, with new things, and of course outgrown things cost much less. Any mother of two or three children could keep a bureau all the year round for things that would fit into Christmas stockings. In Brooklyn they are doing things on such a large scale now that they are glad to have the Edison Electric Company cut their stockings, and the staff of the Brooklyn Employment Bureau make them; but in a smaller city this work would not be so hard, and in a village a committee of a dozen women might well hope to put a Red Stocking into the hands of every needy child on Christmas Day without exception, and could give a personal touch to this stocking or that that might be appreciated by the grown-ups as well.

Think about it. Let the Red Stockings march into your town.

A New Angle On "EFFICIENCY"

Volumes have been written on this subject, of interest to every wide-awake American, man or woman—but it has, perhaps, remained for a Physician, who has made it his life study, to produce the most practical treatise on the subject.

He will be glad to send it without cost or obligation to anyone addressing CHAS. A. TYRRELL, M.D., Dept. 162L, 134 West 65th Street, New York, and it is safe to say that you will learn some new and surprising things about yourself by reading this little book.

A Train Load of Books

I started my mail order book business ten years ago, and during the last eight years I have sold more than a train load of books each year—more books than any other man in America. Why? Because I buy so I can sell cheaper than the others, and every book is shipped subject to return at my expense if not satisfactory.

Publishing books is a precarious business. Many publishers and booksellers fail. I make a specialty of buying bankrupt stocks of new books at my own price, and regular stock in quantities so I can retail at wholesale prices. I now have a big stock of over 6,000 different fine library sets of the works of standard authors and single volumes on every subject, which I offer to close out this season at 10c to 50c on the dollar.

Be fair to yourself, I can save you money. Drop me a postal card and get my prices before buying.

Ridpath's History of the World

Never Again Such a Book Bargain as This!

WE are closing out the last edition of Dr. Ridpath's History of the World at a great sacrifice in price. We are not at liberty to print this low price for the reason Dr. Ridpath's widow derives her income from the sale of this work, and to print the price broadcast would cause great injury to the sale of future editions. We will name our bargain price and our easy terms of payment only in direct letters to those sending us the coupon below. Tear off the Coupon, write name and address plainly and mail to us now before you forget it. The beautiful 46-page booklet of sample pages is free.

For the Father

HOW are you to judge of the great national questions that crowd upon us for decision except by some knowledge of the past? Our Tariff Policy, the Question of the Trusts, the respective rights of labor and capital, the conflict between Socialism on the one hand and organized business and industry on the other—these and hundreds of other important questions press upon us as a nation for intelligent discussion and decision.

Read the history of mighty Babylon, or of imperial Rome and familiarize yourself with her growth, development and decay. Read the history of the French Revolution, the establishment of the republic, out of which came the empire dominated by Napoleon. Then when you know history, when you know the cause of the rise and downfall of empires and nations, you will be able to intelligently discuss and decide the great questions that are pressing now everywhere for attention.

For the Mother

MOTHERS! Ridpath's History is the most splendid set of books you can place in your home. Without good books a home seems empty. It is a mere shell. The furnishings may be costly, the rooms comfortable, but without books a soul is lacking. Books tell us of character and taste more sincerely than anything else will, and are the best evidence in the home of culture and refinement. Place in your home good, interesting, truthful books for your children. In this day and age of fierce competition it is little short of a misfortune for any boy or girl to grow up without the equipment of a good education, and especially a knowledge of history. Send coupon to-day for free sample pages of the greatest history of the world ever written.

For the Young Men

ARE you engaged all day with your work? Are your hours long and is your work tedious? Do you sometimes look back on your boyish ambitions and feel that they are all dead? Have you to count the dollars carefully and hold tightly to the cents?

Don't stint yourself of mental food. But the money! Yes, I know. Mental food costs money, but you cannot be a MAN without it. If your room is furnished in a certain corner with Ridpath's History of the World you will be astonished to find that your expenses are growing less.

There are many things you might deprive yourself of with advantage, but you cannot afford to be without these books. They will enlarge your capacity. They will increase your usefulness and they will keep you young. As you read of how men lived and loved and fought and died from earliest days to within your own memory, you will become a bigger and greater man. If there is any good stuff in you it will come to the surface.

For the Young Women

ARE you a little above the average in your thoughts and tastes? Does your mind rise beyond hats and ribbons, frocks and feathers? Do you feel that life is a serious thing, not to be lightly laughed at and frittered away?

If so, get Ridpath's History and read of the women who thought as you think and acted as you would act if occasion arose.

Study the incidents that have made the world such as it is to-day. Then when you go among your friends to talk you will astonish them and yourself. For every event in daily life you will be able to suggest a parallel in history. You will be qualified to open and suggest topics. It will become known that your opinion is worth hearing, is reliable. You will be spoken of as that cultivated and brilliant conversationalist.

Don't hesitate. Your wish for further knowledge shows that you have exceptional capacities. If you do not encourage and cultivate them they will die out.

If you get the books; if you read them; if you are the woman I take you to be, in one month's time you will realize your increased value. In one year's time you will have made everyone who knows you realize it too.

For the School Children

YOUR boy or girl returns from school and wants to know something about the Missouri Compromise or Monroe Doctrine, about which there is an essay to write. You don't like to betray your ignorance; perhaps you don't like being bothered and would prefer to read the paper. If you would only put Ridpath in your library and refer your boy or girl to the index, you would not only give them the information which they seek, but might create in them a desire to know more; a desire for reading; for information, learning and knowledge, and "knowledge is power," not only in business but in society in general.

Run your finger down the index in Ridpath's History and you will find Leonidas, Galileo, Heroditus, Cervantes, Buddha, Cromwell, Bonaparte, Grant, Lee, Stonewall Jackson, Hampden, Mozart, Dewey, Schley, Farragut, Roosevelt, McKinley, Harrison, Taft, etc.

Do you mean to tell me that your boy and girl, with this wonderful index of Ridpath's History, would not be spending their time to better advantage—and perhaps bothering you with fewer questions? Perhaps they would be giving you information.

For Everybody

RIDPATH'S HISTORY is the story of the world from the very beginning down to the present year. It is made up of the different events of all the separate nations in the great whirlpool of world-growth. It is a series of historical narratives in which each nation, in turn, becomes the hero of its own story.

Ridpath's style is clear and simple, yet glows with the fervency of the orator. He puts life in the dry bones of the past. When he writes, the departed great are as real to you as your own neighbors. The great events of history pass before you in a series of living pictures. The great names of history—Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon, Bismarck, Washington—are names no longer; they are men, moving, breathing, pulsating with life and high purpose.

Ridpath's History is praised by all for its wealth of learning, for its brilliant style, for its fascination as a story, for its educative value to old and young. To read it is a liberal education. It is a library in itself which is already in nearly a quarter of a million American homes and should be in every home.

TURKEY SUES FOR PEACE

HOPES FOR PEACE BRIGHTEN IN THE NEAR EAST WHILE THE DISTRESS OF THE SUFFERING GROWS

THE end of the war in the Balkans is in sight. The Turkish Government, forced to a realization that the saving of even a last remnant of its European domain depended on own efforts, has now approached the Balkan es directly and sued for peace. This move was stponed until the Bulgarians had practically ed the last line of Turkey's defenses at atalja, and Constantinople, the capital city, lay their mercy. Then, too, the Sublime Porte found its appeals to the great Powers of Europe were le and that the termination of its losing fight nded entirely upon itself. As King Ferdinand definitely refused to consider an armistice with- assurance that it would lead to a conclusion of war the cessation of active tilities may well be taken as urance that he and his ad- ors are convinced that the rks contemplate no further istance.

The situation in Constanti- ple on November 12 was mmarized by the correspond- of the London Daily Tele- aph, who despatched the fol- ing uncensored report via reless from a steamer in the ck Sea:

eaten, demoralized, without hope reorganization in time to make an ective stand against the enemy, the ks have recognized the futility of her resistance. Nazim Pasha ha- rmed the Grand Vizier that the kish Army is both unable and un- ing to fight, and suggests that the course left is to make the best sible terms with the allies by direct otiations opened with the Bulga- n. Some Turkish advisers in the ital are anxious to continue the nse of Chatalja. That would cer- ly result in disaster. As a basis proposals for an armistice Turkey ready to abandon Chatalja, pro- d the Bulgarians undertake not to r the capital. The Porte is pre- ed to make heavy sacrifices to t this crowning humiliation, and King Ferdinand is not too exigent ce is in sight.

The situation in Constanti- ple itself continued to cause great deal of anxiety oughout Europe and Amer- ica all through the week. Foreign warships in the Bosporus lent some assurance of assistance should time of need arise, but the presence of thousands of starving and wounded though not disabled soldiers gave the entire Christian population of the city the feeling that it was resting on the top of a sleeping volcano, which might burst forth at any moment. Food in the city had soared to famine prices. The hospitals, barracks, clubs and every available warehouse were filled with wounded men. The streets were crowded with refugees who sought the city in fear of the advancing Bulgarians.

In the provinces where the armies of the Montenegrins and Servians have been at work success has attended their arms, and they are now in undisputed possession of the land. The operations throughout those sections have been forced to a standstill. Winter has settled over the country, and a blanket of snow two feet deep covers practically all of Albania and northern Macedonia.

The Greek forces from the south have advanced steadily to Salonica, and after a three days' battle taken possession of that city with all its defenses and all its garrison. The advance of the Greeks has presented one of the most remarkable spectacles in military history. As they captured town after town, they also took vast numbers of prisoners who laid down their arms. By the time they reached Salonica they were reported to have 65,000 Turkish soldiers under guard, and when the prize city of the Ægean Sea fell into their hands they took 27,000 more. A despatch describing the Greek capture of the city reads in part:

> Before they entered the town the elements of disorder broke loose and a terrible massacre of the non-Moslem population took place. Shooting and looting was general. When the Greeks took possession of the city, they imprisoned all the pashas, officials, and Turkish officers.

In the district about Adrianople the fighting has continued along lines very similar to those of the last week. The Bulgarians have captured two more of the important outer forts of the city, and with the aid of the Servians who have joined them, poured a continuous artillery fire upon the crumbling defenses. The Turks are reported to have made several desperate sorties, but were repulsed in every instance.

The success of the Balkan allies led to a diplomatic tension, which for several days caused many of the most conservative newspapers of the world to state that the peace of Europe hung by a very slender thread. Servia has made it plain that she will make this opportunity serve to end her days of "suffocation."

She has always been surrounded by the territory of other nations and has been at their mercy in the matter of the shipment of her produce. She demands a seaport on the Adriatic. To this demand Austria emphatically said "No," and for several days it seemed as if she were willing to enforce her decision even at the cost of war. Italy was known to stand with her as an ally, and though Germany's sympathies were at first unknown, she is the third member of what is called the Triple Alliance. England, France and Russia, the Triple Entente, stood together, and it was rumored that Russia was willing to fight for Servia. All the chanceleries of Europe buzzed with activity. Then Kaiser Wilhelm made plain his attitude. He told of his ambition to go down in the annals of history as "William the Peace-keeper," and, though discreetly silent himself, allowed some of his officers to make the statement that Germany was going to see that the peace was kept. Premier Asquith of Great Britain also outlined this as the attitude of King George's government, and the danger of a general conflict seems averted.

According to the cable despatches, the last battles of the war have produced suffering such as has not been paralleled in Europe in half a century. United States Ambassador Rockhill is quoted as estimating that about 75,000 sick and wounded soldiers of every nationality need care. In the hospitals of Constantinople alone there are 14,000 sick and wounded, and there is much suffering through hunger and exposure among the 18,000 refugees. Constantinople has a million population. Cholera, bubonic plague and typhoid are reported to have broken out and have already begun to claim many victims.

In the Balkan camps, too, there has been very great suffering, and the hospitals of Sofia and other cities are unable to accommodate the victims. The Relief Committee in Sofia, which is in communication with THE CHRISTIAN HER has cabled an urgent appeal for funds to be used in plying food for the thousands of destitute widows orphans, as well as in assisting the wounded who medicines and bandages. Pastor Furnajieff, chairma the committee, assures us that every gift will be of greatest value at the present time, both in saving life and relieving hun Food of every kind is scarce and at almost famine prices. The villages ar Adrianople and on the Turkish line of retreat in Mac nia have been pillaged and the populace is in g distress. Some of the Turkish prisoners in the hands of Bulgarians say that the garrison and population of Adr ople are literally starving.

SUFFRAGISTS ON THE MARCH

WOMEN have marched in varying numbers and for varying causes during the centuries, but for upwards of fifteen thousand women to get together and march down one of the chief thoroughfares of the New World's biggest city, with torches, trumpets, choruses, bands, horses, chariots, and floods of fire, with five thousand men marching proudly in the rear of the procession to demonstrate their belief in "the cause," with Fifth Avenue lined with thousands of spectators who cheered and applauded—this was a spectacle and an occurrence quite without precedent. The suffragists had a parade last May, but the attitude of the populace on that occasion was not entirely respectful and commendatory. On the night of November 9, however, whether because of the beauty and magnificence of the spectacle, or out of respect to the recent actual victories won by the cause in four States at the November elections, or because of a real change of conviction on the suffrage question, New York stood approvingly in enthusiastic and dignified delight, as the phalanxes of the determined hosts of daughters, wives, mothers and grandmothers strode down the avenue declaring to the world that they were going to vote.

There were a few anxious moments before the parade began when a cold rain set in fitfully and dismally from the north. It subsided, however, before the hour set for the march arrived, and though the sharp wind continued to blow coldly and the asphalt was soiled and slippery from the rain, the white-shod, white-skirted, white-coated, white-helmeted ranks moved forward undismayed. Incredible as it may sound, the parade, despite the preceding rain, started two minutes ahead of time.

The route was from Fifty-eighth Street, down Fifth Avenue to Union Square, where arrangements had been made for a number of open-air addresses. Mrs. Beatrice Forbes Robertson Hale was grand marshal of the procession. She was preceded by a platoon of mounted police and a line of young women trumpeters clad in white gowns, typifying "heralds of victory." A company of horsewomen followed Mrs. Hale, and behind them the leaders of the National American Woman Suffrage Association marched on foot, among them Rev. Anna Shaw in academic cap and gown; Miss Carr Riley and Miss May Ware Dennett. Next the floats representing the four States, Michi Kansas, Arizona and Oregon, which adopted principle of woman suffrage at the recent elec

A company of songsters followed, made u young women in black skirts with white surpl with a quota of men to carry tenor and bass. A other marchers, the charioteers appeared, Inez Mulholland, representing Wyoming, the State to adopt suffrage; Miss Florence M. Co driving the Colorado car; Miss Nina Wilcox Put the Utah chariot; Mrs. James Duane Livings the Washington; Miss Gwenc Brooks the Idaho, and Mary Au the California cars. Miss Isabel mounted, made a charming and pressive Joan of Arc. Norway, den, Denmark, Finland, Iceland, tralia and New Zealand were represented, as well as many St cities and organizations. Prohibi ists, Socialists and Progress marched, representing in chrono cal order the political parties w have stood for equal welfare. Y suffrage sashes, colored fires se along the line of march, flaming terns carried by the marchers enormous yellow flag stretching curb to curb and borne by t girls, were among the brilliant tures of the spectacular pageant.

A LARGE majority of the recent gubernatorial contests resulted in Democratic victory. New York, the Empire State, has elected Congressman William Sulzer, who has emphatically been a man of the people from the beginning of his public career. Mr. Sulzer has an international reputation. His father was a German, a Heidelberg student, and joined the revolution of 1848. He was imprisoned, fled to Switzerland, and came to New York in 1851. His son William was born at Elizabeth, N. J., on March 18, 1868. The governor-elect likes to say that his father was a German, his mother an Irish woman, and he himself an intense American. He was graduated from Columbia Law School, elected to the New York Assembly in 1889, and re-elected every year till 1894, when he was sent to Congress, of which he has been ever since a member.

Illinois has returned Edward Fitzsimmons Dunne, who was mayor of Chicago from 1905 to 1907. Mr. Dunne has been well known both as lawyer and judge in the State over which he has been called to rule. He was born at Waterville, Conn., in 1853, educated at Trinity College and called to the bar in 1877.

Another well-known Democrat, James M. Cox, has been victorious in Ohio. He was born in that State in 1870, and is the son of a farmer. He became successively farmer, printer, school teacher, and newspaper man. He has been a member of Congress since 1909.

S. M. Ralston, the new Democratic governor of Indiana, is a self-made man in the best acceptation of the word. He was born on a farm in Ohio, December 1, 1857; in his early life he had to work hard, but persevered at his books and was graduated from Central Normal College, Danville, Ind., 1884. He was admitted to the bar in 1886. He is a man of splendid physique and is a distinguished orator.

The new Democratic governor of Missouri, Elliot W. Major, is a native of Bowling Green. He became senator and afterwards attorney general for Missouri, in which capacity he was active in atacking the methods of the packing industry.

The Honorable Locke Craig of Asheville will rule North Carolina. He is a lawyer, and has been twice a member of the State House of Representatives. Mr. Craig was born in 1860, was graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1880, and admitted to the bar in 1883.

County Judge John C. Karel, who was successful in Wisconsin, is a lawyer of high ability and has been a Democrat all his life.

Besides the Democrats mentioned above, the following were elected: S. E. Baldwin, Connecticut; P. Trammell, Florida; E. G. Dunn, Iowa; E. N. Foss, Massachusetts; W. N. Ferris, Michigan; S. V. Stewart, Montana; J. H. Morehead, Nebraska; C. L. Blease, South Carolina; E. S. Johnson, South Dakota; O. B. Colquitt, Texas; and E. Lister, Washington.

It is remarkable that a large number of newspaper men were elected to various offices in the recent contests. Of the new governors, the successful Republican candidate in Kansas is Arthur Capper, publisher of the Topeka Capital, and, in addition, the Capper farm publications, extensively circulated in the West.

The man who has been selected to rule the largest State in the Union, Texas, for a second term is Oscar B. Colquitt, who has been a prominent newspaper man for many years.

Despite the great Democratic landslide, Republican candidates captured office in several States.

Charles Russel Miller, the new Republican governor of Delaware, hails from Wilmington, and has been a State senator. He is still a young man.

Louis Benjamin Hanna, Republican governor-elect of North Dakota, is an Eastern boy who, born at New Brighton, Pa., in 1861, went to North Dakota at the age of twenty. He was a member of the State House of Representatives from 1895 to 1897, a State senator from 1897 to 1901, and again from 1905 to 1909. He has been a member of Congress since 1909.

Other Republicans elected are: J. M. Haines, Idaho; A. Capper, Kansas; A. O. Eberhart, Minnesota; F. Worcester, New Hampshire; A. J. Pothier, Rhode Island; W. Spry, Utah. H. D. Hatfield of West Virginia was elected on the Progressive ticket, and B. W. Hooper, Tennessee, was returned as a Fusionist.

SPAIN'S PREMIER ASSASSINATED

MADRID, the capital of Spain, was thrown into a fever of excitement on November 12 by the assassination of Señor José Canalejas y Mendez, the President of the al Council of Ministers. It was Premier Caejas's custom to walk each day at about noon to Ministry of the Interior. On this walk he was ally guarded by two private detectives, whom he ays compelled to follow him at a distance of ut twenty paces. On November 12 the premier stopped near the San Martin library, which very close to the ministry, and was looking he books displayed in a shop window. While was thus occupied a man approached him and d three or four shots directly at his head. One he bullets entered his skull just back of the ear, the premier immediately fell to the ground. two detectives rushed up and captured the asin. He fired at one of them but without doing harm, then seeing the hopelessness of resistce, put the last bullet that the revolver contained his own head.

he premier was carried by two reporters into lobby of the Ministry of the Interior. The atest excitement was aroused here, as no news he assassination had preceded the premier's ar-l. As he was being taken up the steps, a police ector exclaimed, "What is this, Señor Canalejas?" prime minister answered, "This wretch has ed me," and expired a few moments later in the ector's arms. King Alfonso, who was immedi-y advised of the tragedy, arrived within a few utes and received the story of the event n two of the other ministers of his cabinet. sincere affection which he entertained for his cabinet minister was attested by the tears filled his eyes as he paid his tribute to the deed premier. Before the king left the ministry, a great throng had gathered in the Puerta del Sol, and as he made his way through, there rose from all sides cries of "Long live the brave king!"—the same shout which the Madrid populace raised in 1906 when the king and his bride were the objects of an attack by a would-be assassin.

The perpetrator of this crime was conveyed immediately after his arrest to the nearest first-aid depot. Here it was found that the bullet which he had fired at himself was lodged in his right temple. He was identified as Manuel Pardinas, aged thirty-two, of the town of El Grado in the province of Huesca. No important papers or evidence of any kind was found upon his person, though it is believed that he was a member of an anarchistic band and that his attempt was inspired by the now famous Ferrer execution.

The Late Jose Canalejas y Mendez

When Don Juan Riano y Gayangos, Spanish minister to the United States, learned of the assassination of Premier Canalejas, he said: "Spain has lost the strongest man in the country. He was a man of high ideals and one of the most capable in Spain. I do not know of any man who can fill his place. He was democratic in all his actions."

Señor Canalejas, though identified for years with the most liberal party in Spanish politics, was a close personal friend of the king. He belonged to a wealthy and cultured family, but was himself a man of very simple habits and recreations. He had been in political life for forty years, having filled various ministerial posts in the cabinets of other premiers. He had been one of Spain's most enlightened and progressive public men. It has been under his leadership and influence that King Alfonso has taken the initial steps toward freeing his country from the overruling influence of the Vatican. Under Señor Canalejas's able leadership non-Roman Catholic bodies have received the right to proclaim their places of worship as such, and the number of Roman Catholic religious orders, each of which was free from taxation, has been greatly reduced. He was directly responsible for the bill which was known as the padlock bill, which passed the Spanish Cortes on December 23, 1910, and which was the first step toward the separation of church and state in Spain.

THE THANKFUL HEART

A THANKSGIVING SERMON

BY REV. FREDERICK F. SHANNON*

TEXT: "For all things are for your sakes, that the grace, being multiplied through the many, may cause the thanksgiving to abound unto the glory of God." II. Cor. 4: 15, R. V.

THE Bible is like a melodious steeple set with thanksgiving chimes. The variations of the tune are many, the spirit, the tune itself, is one. Hearken to the music of these Scriptural bells! They ring out gloriously, and they ring out unceasingly as well. To whom shall our thanksgiving be offered? Unto God, our Heavenly Father. Through whom shall it be made? Why, through our Lord Jesus Christ. What are the reasons for thanksgiving? Well, all our gifts are from God—our temporal benefits, our daily providences, our unfailing guidance, our immortal hopes. What are some of the forms of expressing gratitude to the Giver of every good and perfect gift? Worship, prayer, offerings, and praises. These are just a few of the thanksgiving chimes that ring in the Bible tower.

Now, the player of the chimes in our text needs no introduction. He is well known in heaven and on earth. This old master of spiritual symphonies is never better than in his rendering of thanksgiving music. For Paul was a great thanks-giver because he was a great thanks-liver. It is this, I am sure, that gave him such a vast conception of the grace of gratitude. "For all things are for your sakes!"—think of the immensity of Christian privilege in the words!—"that the grace, being multiplied through the many, may cause the thanksgiving to abound unto the glory of God"—think of the solemn responsibility of so using all things that our thanksgiving may glorify God! Surely the genius of the thankful heart is the highest quality of genius—life expressing itself in the very noblest terms.

"For all things are for your sakes!" Without attempting to compass the inclusiveness of this thanksgiving pæan, let us consider a few things which will stir the thankful heart.

This American country of ours should make every heart throb with gratitude to Almighty God. Think of its natural resources! Think of its boundless plains! Think of its fertile valleys! Think of its hills, mountains, streams, rivers, lakes, and oceans! Indeed, the crop report for 1912 furnishes a very tangible, if quite immeasurable, illustration of the fertility of our country. A few Sunday mornings ago I walked across the Queensborough Bridge. Always interesting, this walk is never more satisfactory than in the sweet dawn of God's own holy day. The spell of October was over all—the rich-tinted leaves; the shocks of corn, those golden tabernacles of the autumntide; the robins, whose faded, tattered breasts told of their approaching flight southward to exchange their old garments for bright, fresh new ones; the melancholy expression brooding upon human faces—everywhere the October magician had left his mystic touch.

Well, I thought that dense forest of skyscrapers never looked more splendid than on that Sabbath morning from the high arched bridge. They looked massive and high enough, too. But after seeing that picture in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 6, showing what would happen to those skyscrapers if our mammoth grain crop for 1912 should be dumped in and on and up and around them, I admire the vast buildings not less, but the marvelous productiveness of our farms more. Three billion bushels of corn! What cribs can hold that? Seven hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat! What granaries can contain them? One billion four hundred million bushels of oats! What bins large enough for them? Two hundred and forty million bushels of barley, rye, and buckwheat! What is material to make pancakes for the universe! In round numbers, the plow, the harrow, the hoe, the threshing machine have coaxed five billion five hundred million bushels of grain from American soil in a single year. It is stupendous, amazing, incalculable! Why, if the American farmer should empty his sacks upon Park Row, Broadway, and Wall Street, immediate suffocation would set in. For he would literally engulf beneath his mass of grain the Stock Exchange, the thirty-story Bankers' Trust Building, the forty-one-story Singer Building, Wall Street with all its buildings, lower Broadway with all its buildings, Bowling Green, the Custom House, the Battery, the North River piers, and the docks of South Street; every single one would be actually buried from sight if the American farmer should spill his 1912 golden treasure over this particular area of real estate!

The fact is, the output is so immense as to surpass the powers of imagination. But we ought certainly to include the fecundity of our soil among the "all things" that "are for your sakes." Moreover, we ought to acknowledge our debt of gratitude to the American farmer. The whole world is his debtor. He is greater than any ruler, or potentate, or emperor, or king, or president, or general that ever lived. The farmer gives us our wardrobe. Ours is the sheep on a thousand hills! The farmer fills our meat chest. With the lowing herds on our like plains! The farmer alone makes it possible for the great business of national housekeeping to go on. Let the farmer die and crêpe as black as midnight would hang on America's front door. Some men may die and not be greatly missed; but let the American farmer die, and there will be a nation-wide funeral. But he is not going to die. He is going to do something far harder and grander and nobler. He is going to live, and out of his industry and toil and sacrifice this nation will receive a new birth of integrity and simplicity and devotion to the causes that make for national righteousness. All honor to this horny-handed, wind-tanned, sun-burned hero! We thank him for the soil he vexes, for the crops he raises, for the virtues that thrive in the garden of his heart, for the sons and daughter he rears, for the God he worships!

A second thing for which right-thinking people are thankful is the church of the living God, which an apostle describes as the pillar and ground of

THANKSGIVING DAY

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

WHEN the pilgrims had their harvest,
And garnered the yellow grain;
When the fruits were piled under cover
From the autumn's blinding rain;
When the graves were wreathed with flowers,
And the game was laid away;
Then they praised the Lord, who had blessed their hoard;
And they made Thanksgiving Day.

They stood their guns behind the door,
And they laid their knives in a heap;
And they went unarmed through the close-cropped fields,
Which their children had helped them reap.
And they met the scowling tribesmen,
In warpaint and feathers gay;
And their war they ceased, while they made a feast,
On the first Thanksgiving Day

The pies were baked in the ovens
By the housewives young and old;
And the meats were browned and roasted
Away from the frosty cold.
And the copper savage mingled
With the pilgrim old and gray;
And they blessed the Lord by that humble board;
Ah! It was Thanksgiving Day!

Yes, we keep the day in a fashion;
We eat our turkey and pie;
But do we think of our brothers,
That starve in the cold—and die?
Do we praise the Lord from our inmost hearts?
Or do we only play
At the love they taught, and the good they wrought,

THE RING OF TWO WHITE PEARLS

YOU have a perfect right to make yourselves beautiful. It is your privilege, unchallengeable, to put on the most effective adornments. Take, therefore, a kindly word of suggestion and with it a word of caution to the end that your beautifying may be successful and without a flaw.

Advice, instruction and command have been more than ever insistent of late. If you try to follow them all, trouble without measure will be your portion. Your safety lies in your own good taste and the promptings of a pure heart. Heed them, and heed what I shall now say no farther than it helps you to hear the true voice within you.

School teachers, business employers, pastors, and arbiters of style have contended with you. They have criticized and sometimes forbidden certain kinds of apparel. They have denounced the putting on or the taking off of various articles or portions of dress. They have urged the evil and the ugliness of painted faces and fraudulent coiffures. You know that in the main they are right, though sometimes, perhaps, a gentler tact would win readier acceptance of their decrees. But they do not recognize, or at least they do not acknowledge frankly the right and the need of adornment.

JUST the other day I read in the newspapers that fur coats costing as high as $100,000 will be worn by women during the coming winter. Others will be wearing pearl and diamond necklaces costing as much and more. Here is personal adornment regardless of cost. But only the very rich can so indulge themselves. Perhaps you may have to forego the pleasure of any fur coat, and it may be that your jewels will have to be of quite another order. I should like to give you, though, and every girl, a ring with two white pearls. I'll tell you why in a moment.

In Philadelphia a few days ago a professor of a great university delivered an address in which he urged young women to spend all their earnings on dress and finery, and if they wanted more, to borrow money for their own adorning, but by no means to save for the future or to contribute from their earnings to help make life easier for aged or infirm parents or younger brothers and sisters. It was so difficult to believe that any man of respectable standing in the community could devote himself to giving instruction in profligacy and to setting up a guidepost to ruin that I took unusual pains to verify the first report. There seems to be no doubt that such advice was publicly given. I am glad it met with prompt rebuke as public as the offense.

Am I contradicting my own statements? Have I not been urging you to the most liberal and effective self-adornment regardless of cost? And now some one stands up publicly and proclaims the unstinted indulgence in dress and finery, is he to be rebuked? Let us turn for a moment to a better authority on beauty and adornment than Professor Patten of the University of Pennsylvania. There was a greater authority—indeed, it was the very Creator of Beauty, who loves beauty so intensely that he has lavished it upon the whole earth, even in places where none but he can see it. One day, thinking of the superlative loveliness of some of his most modest creations, he asked in mild protest, "And why take ye thought for raiment?" There might be some reason if you were like the person in the old drama, "Honest Man's Fortune," who was told "Thy clothes are all the soul thou hast." But that isn't true of you, nor of any girl under the blue sky.

IN THAT wonderful story, Quo Vadis, the author describes a beautiful Christian maid, loved by a Roman: "Vinicius looked at her profile, at her drooping lashes, at her hands lying on her knees; and in his pagan head the idea began to hatch with difficulty, that besides physical beauty, confident and proud of Greek and Roman symmetry, there is another beauty in the world, new, immensely pure, in which a soul resides."

Nothing in all the catalogue of finery—nothing anywhere within the reach of womanhood, can be found for the adorning of physical beauty so effective and so enduring as the radiance of a noble soul which is wholly independent of fashion or fortune.

You have not thought of the apostle Paul as a beauty expert, have you, yet no one has surpassed him in that respect. He gave very definite consideration to feminine adornment when he said, "Let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even in the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." Again he urged "that women adorn themselves in modest apparel; . . . not . . . costly array; but with good works."

An ordinary artist tries to gain admiration for his picture by painting some splendid thing—a golden harvest, a bird of brilliant plumage, a tree in blossom, or a rainbow. But some of the world's greatest painters have never touched any of these things. One paints a railway cutting, another a plowed field. There is no bright object to attract the eye, but the black earth, the brown earth, the red earth were touched with the supreme touch, and you seemed to see the blossom in the dust, and the rainbow shone out of a cloud, and the picture without a brilliant thing in it was altogether bathed in imagination, poetry and beauty.

Adorn yourselves with that superlative and irresistible beauty of the soul which is the pearl of great price. I wish I could give you a ring with two white pearls, one to symbolize purity of body and the other to represent purity of soul. With these two unmarred your loveliness is assured. Do not think to gain such adornment at trifling cost. You must pay for it in patience, and effort, and self-sacrifice. But it is worth the utmost cost.

Beautiful faces are those that wear
Whole-souled honesty printed there.

Beautiful hands are those that do
Work that is earnest, brave and true.

Beautiful eyes are those that show
Beautiful thoughts that burn below.

Beautiful shoulders are those that bear
Burdens with patient grace and prayer.

Beautiful lips are those whose words
Leap from the heart like songs of birds.

Beautiful lives are those that bless—
Flowing rivers of helpfulness.

AT THE CROSS-ROADS

AN OLD man sat at the cross-road
On a stone by the village street.
He was weary and worn and travel-stained
And faint from the dust and heat,
And his gray head drooped as he sat there
With hunger and travel spent,
While the noon-day throng went hurrying by
On their homeward journey bent.
And I passed by with the others
In that heedless current caught
That recks nor cares for the stranger poor,
Nor the homeless wanderer's lot.

But the picture left its image:
I could not drive it away,
And I thought of One who would surely have paused
Had he been in the crowd that day.
How his eye sought out the outcast,
Who was barred from his fellow's door,
How he gave his hand to the woman shamed,
And bade her sin no more.
I saw Him kneel by the leper,
As he shuddered and cried, "Unclean!"
And health and joy and manhood came
At the touch of the Nazarene.

They are sitting there at the cross-roads,
Weary and faint—alone,
There are many bowed with a sinner's shame
Or a shame that is not their own.
It may be a friendless orphan,
Or a slave in the thrall of drink—
Your path may lead to a happy home,
And his to the river's brink.
The wretched, the weak, the burdened,
The pilgrim with way-worn feet—
They are sitting there as the old man sat
At the place where the cross-roads meet.

Oh, linger a bit at the wayside,
And let your heart be heard,
As it bids you pause by your brother-man
And give him a cheering word.
For the life that loves is lovely
And the soul that gives expands,
And the heart that warms to a brother's need
Is like to the Son of Man's.
And the meed will be right royal,
When he says to you and me,
"Inasmuch as ye did for the least of these Ye have done it unto me."

SUCCESSFUL PASTORS RELATE EXPERIENCES WHICH PROVE THE MAGNETIC POWER OF THE OLD GOSPEL

THE problem of getting people to church is one of the very gravest of present times. Many a minister and evangelist has been grieved to learn, perhaps at the close of an earnest appeal, that he has not had a single unconverted person in his audience. Of course it is delightful to contemplate that an entire audience is religious; but it is fearful to contemplate that the people who need salvation will not come to hear about it. It is not for lack of room. The seats are there; the welcome is there; the message is there. But they will not come.

To some churches they do come. Why? THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has asked a number of successful clergymen to give briefly the results of their own experiences. What do they do or say that makes people flock to hear them? It has been refreshing and delightful to note how largely the answer is that it is the old-fashioned Gospel that draws best, when it is given a chance.

What Has Succeeded In Seattle

Our first letter is from the pastor of the largest Presbyterian Church in the world. Dr. M. A. Matthews, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Seattle, Wash., and Moderator of the General Assembly, writes in answer to the question: "How I Filled my Church":

It is not a pleasure for me to talk about myself and therefore I must decline; but if you will let me answer your questions with no reference to myself I shall do so.

First—This church has been filled for nearly eleven years. Most of the time it is crowded, and scores and hundreds have been turned away. The evening audiences number anywhere from 2,500 to 3,500. We can only seat about 3,000. The rest have to stand or be crowded out. The audience has in it from 55 to 70 per cent. of men. The church is doing an immense amount of work. Frequently there are from six to eight services running at the same hour in the different rooms of the church. You may ask how it is done.

Second—The results accomplished are entirely due to the operations of the Holy Spirit. We pray much, expect much and get much.

Third—The pure, simple Gospel is preached. Sinai and Calvary are held up to the people. The vicarious atonement is emphasized; the sacrifice of Christ is presented daily; his deity and his mediatorial work are kept before the people. The whole Gospel, and nothing but the Gospel, is preached.

Fourth—We make the Gospel apply to every condition, circumstance and point of a man's life. We deal with his social, domestic, commercial, political, civic life, with the Gospel and only the Gospel.

Fifth—Every service is an evangelistic service. We never preach the Gospel or finish a sermon without making an appeal for immediate decisions and confessions of Christ. At every service we urge men to accept Christ and join the church. In other words, we try to demonstrate a passion for souls with profound love for God, implicit confidence, faith and trust in Christ and in the leadership of the Holy Spirit.

Sixth—We do not have a sermonette after a long musical program of questionable ecclesiastical music. Every member of the choir must be a Christian and spiritual music must be used, but that program is kept in its minor place. The sermons are not dictated by the clock, nor are they closed at the suggestion of some man who would like to hurry through the service. Time enough is taken to present the case of sin, produce conviction in the hearer's mind and ask for the work of the Holy Spirit to produce conversions. In other words, we all work, and we all work at the business of saving souls, preaching the Gospel, and believing absolutely the promises of Jesus Christ.

Seventh—Every man, woman and child in this church is supposed to have something to do and is required to do the thing assigned. Personal work and personal evangelism are keynotes. If the churches of the country could be lifted from their blight of materialism and could get from under the control of godless trustees, indifferent and lukewarm church officers, and could be made to understand that it is their business as individual Christians to evangelize the world, the pews would be full and the pulpits would be on fire with the love of God and an undying passion for souls.

Two Views From New York

Dr. David James Burrell, beloved pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church, New York, and one of the regular preachers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD congregation, writes:

I believe that the deepest longing of the average man is to know the way of salvation. In my preaching I have tried to make that clear; and I am gratefully happy to say that I have never had to beg for a hearing.

"The old-time religion is good enough for me."

The hurdy-gurdy and the stereopticon may have their uses; but a minister who is constrained by the love of Christ and sensible of his calling as a fisher of men will be slow to resort to adventitious attractions. Mr. Moody once said to me, "We have the best thing in the world; if only we had the consecrated power to make the people see it!"

The longer I live the more profoundly I am convinced that nothing "draws" like the great Magnet; as the Master said, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

The following letter is from another good friend of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers:

I do not know that I can answer the question as to how I have filled my church, except by saying that I have always striven to do two things: First, to obtain as wide a personal, and, if possible, intimate acquaintance with as many of my people as constant intercourse would secure. To this end I have visited them continually and still pay, on an average, about thirty pastoral calls a week. Second, by presenting in the pulpit a consideration of those greater and vital truths which directly affect a man's spiritual well-being. In addition to these two main methods, I have found that a faithful observance of the smallest details is the best preparation for discharging the chief duties and obligations of a minister's calling.

I wish I could say more, but there is little left except that in both Manhattan and Brooklyn I have been assisted by a devoted and self-sacrificing staff of workers, without whom I could not have accomplished any results. S. PARKES CADMAN,
Pastor Central Congregational Church,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

A Word From a Pastor-Author

1. I have had but one preaching service, at eleven o'clock, and have tried to emphasize its importance because it was the only one of the week.

2. The preaching, at least of late years, has been expository, with no attempt at learned or doctrinal sermons. The thought of the pulpit has been to teach.

3. The element of worship has been emphasized. The congregation has been given a large part in the service.

4. The Gospel as taught has been applied to men's everyday needs.

5. All the service has had an optimistic tone. The atmosphere of hope and good cheer has been prevalent.

THE REFORMATION FESTIVAL

BY REV. W. F. SCHOENFELD

WHAT the Fourth of July is to American patriots October 31 should be to all Protestant Christendom. October 31 of the year 1517 may rightly be called the hday of the Reformation. On that day Luther, Augustinian monk, priest and professor at the versity of Wittenberg, nailed his world-famous ety-five Theses against the Papal Indulgences he chapel door at Wittenberg, and thereby made first onslaught on the citadel of papal error, in ch, for almost one thousand years, the Chris-lom, particularly of Western Europe, had been captive. Little did Luther dream of the tre-dous upheaval that was to be caused by this act is. In fact, he expected to receive the Holy her's commendation, and was more than sur-ed when, instead, Pope Leo X condemned his es and commanded him to recant what in them ad pronounced the truth of God rary to Rome's teaching and tice. But the truths Luther had laimed in his theses were not e problematical theorems nor e scientific conclusions or intel-al convictions; they were truths h had become to him divine life power, and which, after passing ugh a fierce soul-struggle, had d him out of despondency and air into the very realms of heav-peace and bliss. Of these truths ad become convinced as being unquestionable and indestructi-Word of God. Hence it was that er, grieved and shocked though as, could not do otherwise than lessly and heroically uphold and nd what he knew to be the divine soul-saving truth. And so it e about that what Leo had at declared a mere straw-fire, sure ie out in a short time, developed a huge conflagration, truly set-the whole world afire. Thus it came about that the Pope, seeing even his bull of excommunica-hurled against Luther in 1520 er threw terror into the heart of monk of Wittenberg nor proved tual in stopping the spread of the r heresy," prevailed upon Em-r Charles V to have Luther before Diet of Worms, where Luther, on the 17th day of il, 1521, in defense of the truth of God and of istian faith and liberty, bid defiance to all the ers of the earth and declared that he did not ve the Pope and church councils alone, since it manifest and well known that they had oft-s erred and contradicted themselves; that it not safe nor advisable for any one to do aught nst his conscience; and that, his conscience be-caught in the Word of God, he could not and ld not recant, unless convinced by clear pas-s of Holy Writ that he had taught aught to lict therewith. It is of that day and declara-Carlyle has said: "The Diet of Worms, Lu-'s appearance on the 17th day of April, 1521, be considered as the greatest scene of modern opean history; the point, indeed, from which whole subsequent history of civilization takes ise. The world's pomp and power sits there on hand, on the other stands up for truth one , the poor miner Hans Luther's son. Our peti-—the petition of the world—to him was: 'Free it rests with thee—desert us not.' Luther did lesert us."

uther's day at Worms must indeed be desig-d the crisis of the Reformation, but the nailing ie Ninety-five Theses against Papal Indulgences was its birth. And the 31st of October is the day that Lutherans all over the world and all over our own country commemorated by special services in their churches to remind themselves of the mighty blessings, spiritual and temporal, which God has vouchsafed the church of Christ and civil government through the Reformation, and his chosen instrument for that gracious work, Dr. Martin Luther. Of late years it has become a custom that, in addition to the Reformation services in the individual churches, joint services are held in large halls, in which many congregations unite to ponder the blessings of the Reformation and to strengthen the loyalty and gratitude of these children of the Reformation.

Martin Luther Before Charles V at the Diet of Worms

Such services have been held this year, on either the last Sunday in October, or the first Sunday in November, in many of our largest cities—Boston, New York, Baltimore, Pittsburg, Milwaukee, St. Louis and others. In some localities Lutheran congregations of a number of towns have combined and arranged for a joint celebration in the most central town. Such a celebration was held in Hartford, Conn. In New York City the celebration was held in Carnegie Hall. Pastor W. C. Kohn of Chicago, the president of the Illinois District of the Missouri Synod, delivered an oration in German on the theme: "What Are the Blessings We and Our Country Owe to the Reformation?" Pastor D. H. Steffens of Baltimore (Martini Church) followed with an address in English: "What Is the Debt We, as the Children of the Reformation, Owe Our Country?" The services were embellished by a rendition of appropriate anthems by the Students' Choir of the Lutheran Collegiate Institute at Bronxville. Perhaps the most inspiring feature of these services is the singing of the Lutheran Chorals by the entire assemblage. Luther's battle hymn, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" (A mighty fortress is our God) is never omitted and is usually sung standing. At Baltimore this year the preachers were the Rev. A. Pfotenhauer, the president of the largest Lutheran Synod in this country, and the Rev. A. Dobbyn, formerly a Roman Catholic priest. At Boston, the services held in Tremont Temple were entirely in English, the preacher being the Rev. H. P. Eckhardt of Pittsburg, formerly president of the English Synod of Missouri. In St. Louis, Dr. F. Pieper, the President of Concordia Seminary, the largest Lutheran theological school in this country, having an enrolment of over three hundred students, was the chief speaker. In some cities like Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Louis, the largest of halls have proven too small to hold the mighty host eager to hear and zealous to praise.

The subjects of the sermons or addresses at these celebrations are varied, indeed, yet in substance they deal with the contrast between Christendom in church and state and family before and after the Reformation. At the individual church services the main emphasis is usually placed on the religious reform brought about through Luther's own enlightenment by the Gospel of Christ and his fearless, untiring and energetic preaching and teaching of the pure Gospel. At the joint celebrations the educational, social, economic and political reforms, effected pre-eminently by Luther and his preaching of the Word of God, receive equal consideration with purely religious and spiritual matters.

At many of these services, the results of the Reformation were set forth clearly and eloquently. Luther was presented as the father of our modern popular education. Since everybody is to read the Bible himself and by his own study of the Bible convince himself as to what it really teaches, everybody must also receive an education enabling him to do this. Luther re-established, furthermore, a right view, the Christian view of life, and above all else vindicated the sanctity of matrimony and of the family. Maintaining as fundamental truths of the Gospel of Christ that free and full salvation, and all the treasures of Christ become, by faith, the property of every Christian, he, of course, banished every thought of merit on the part of man in his justification before God, and also of every special order of men or priests in the church of God. Salvation is by the unmerited grace of God, wholly and alone, and the impartation of God's grace depends solely upon the means of grace, instituted by God, being administered pure and undefiled. The efficacy of those means of grace depends upon no man, no divine orders or ordination. There are no special orders in the New Testament, only an office, the office of the ministry. The Power of the Keys is the common possession of all Christians. All man-made doctrine, superstition and tyranny are done away with, and full and real liberty under God secured to all Christians and the entire church.

American Protestants who study thoroughly the mighty changes wrought by Luther through the teaching of God's pure Word and the blessings they in consequence of his labors enjoy both in church and state, must surely agree that true gratitude should induce them to celebrate annually the Festival of the Reformation, and the whole Protestant world should without delay begin to prepare for an appropriate religious and civic celebration of the four hundredth anniversay of the Reformation on the 31st day of October of the year 1917.

These rooms d seat 1,100 people. On many occasions we the audience room packed upstairs, and the is packed downstairs, and a second overflow ing in the lecture room of the Bible Institute. standing people up and seating them on the s, we were able to pack 2,700 people into the ling by actual count, until the fire authorities ade our doing this.

At the close of the service, the church at once became a beehive of Christian activity. The organist was not permitted to play the organ and thus distract the attention of the people.

The best of it was that we not only filled our church, but there were many conversions. The eight years that I continued there actively pastor, there was never a single Lord's Day without conversions—I doubt if there was any day in the week without conversions, for we had over fifty meetings a week of one kind and another, and many were dealt with and won to Christ where there were no meetings. Of course, the great majority of those that were converted did not unite with our church, as they were transients passing through the city, or they were people brought from other churches to be converted, then were taken back to their own churches and united there. Nevertheless, the smallest number that I received into active membership in the church in any year that I was pastor was 250, and I had the joy in those eight years of service of receiving over 2,000 into the membership of the church. I remained four years nominaly pastor while I was going around the world in evangelistic work, but was at the church only a month in the whole time. Still the work went on just the same, and went on under Dr. Dixon, my successor, and is going on still, though there has been no pastor for over a year.

The secret of it all lay in three things: First, Utter dependence upon God, manifesting itself in constant, persistent, believing prayer. Second, Giving the people what this old world needs most of all, the Gospel pure and simple, unadulterated and full. Third, Soul-winning activity on the part of the membership of the church as well as on the part of the preacher.

Sincerely yours,

R. A. TORREY.

THANKSGIVING?

NATIONS at war, thousands in pain and want, cities abroad smitten by the plague and the sword, cities at home tangled up with cruel crimes, violence and death abounding, sons and daughters lost—shall we celebrate Thanksgiving Day? If the world of health and sickness, of wealth and poverty, of metal and vegetation, of flesh and blood were the only world, we might question the call to Thanksgiving. But we may be thankful, first of all, that that world is not all. We must be thankful that out from a world of war and crime we can look up through the blue skies past the diamond stars and see the face of God. We do not need to live in this world of wrong; "our citizenship is in heaven." We know that to match and infinitely outweigh this little world of strife and pain there is another world, a spirit world, a world of tranquillity, of eternity. We are glad we have heard of it and are moving toward it.

But God is not only there in that quiet and orderly world; he is also here, here in this world of tumult and sin. Right here on our bloodstained battlefields and our sin-stained streets the two worlds exist side by side. In the body of his Son and in the flames of his Spirit God is here. And advancing steadily against the forces of sin are the armies of the faithful, of men and women of faith, men and women who are holding God's power in their hearts and whose hands he is moving to deeds of love and peace. Two things more to be thankful for—that God is at work in the world and that he lets us help him.

NOW, as we come to our own corner of the world, how much, how incalculably much, we have to be thankful for! Here the triumphs of right and justice over wrong are evident and manifold. It is a happy coincidence that the nation-wide celebration of "Home Mission Week" is taking place just before Thanksgiving. We take account of the triumphs the church is making and plan for its future victories. And because the church is victorious our hearts are glad on Thanksgiving Day.

As for material things in America, this year of all others should be a year of heartiest Thanksgiving. Nature, under the smile of God, has been bountiful almost beyond any previous record. Three billion bushels of corn, one billion five hundred million bushels of oats, seven hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat! THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stated a few weeks ago "As to the wheat crop alone, it would make a river of grain 100 to 125 feet wide, four feet deep, and reaching from New York to Chicago." Shall the stream of our wheat be fuller and longer than the river of our praise?

FOR love of home, for cherished friends, for strength to work and for work to do, for bountiful fields and busy factories, for heavily-laden tables about which grandsires and grandmothers, mothers and fathers, husbands, wives, young men, maidens and children gather with laughter and song, for bright churches whose bells call the nation to praise, for peace and plenty, for the gifts of grace and the hope of heaven, our souls are flooded with gratitude. "Thou hast put gladness in my heart," sang the Psalmist, "more than the time that their corn and their wine increased."

This gladness grows fuller and richer and deeper as we pass it on. Every home, every heart, may fit into the bright plan of spreading joy, just as America has been called to the vast task of spreading peace and welfare over the world. Thanksgiving is ceasing to be a selfish festival. We share our bounty with the poor on that day; so must the American nation and the American church share its bounty with the world. Ring, bells! Laugh, little children! Smile, grandsires! Sing, young people! "God's in his heaven," his glory is in our hearts and in our homes and upon our land. Soon it shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

Share Your Blessings

PAUL in Troas heard the cry from far-off Macedonia and responded gladly by taking the Gospel to that country. We in America heard the cry from the same land, now filled with the victims of a terrible war. It comes to us from desolated homes, from widowed mothers and little children. We cannot turn a deaf ear to such a call. What the generous-hearted CHRISTIAN HERALD Family did in Armenia, India, China, Finland, Russia and other lands in times of great distress, it can do in Macedonia. Under our banner of Christian love we can carry to these unfortunate ones a Gospel of bread and helpfulness that will prove our loyalty to Him who said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me." While you are counting your blessings at this Thanksgiving time, give a thought to the innocent victims of the war. By sending a gift to the Balkan Relief Fund, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, you will be adopting the most practical way of sharing your blessings. It is within the power of every reader to brighten up one poor, saddened Balkan home. Do it by sending in your contribution to-day.

Back to the Fold

MANY a stormy life that has wandered far from God, and seemingly forgotten the religion taught at a mother's knee, has come back in its closing hours to its first love, to find it the only refuge. It is told of August Strindberg, the famous Swedish poet and dramatist who died a few months ago in Stockholm, that he passed through such an experience. From a quiet childhood in a Christian home, he went out into the world and became a rebel against God and religion. His literary productions have been characterized as "volcanic, rebellious, unbelieving and revolutionary." There came a time when he felt that he was done with the world, and his heart yearned for something more satisfying than irreligion had afforded. He had not touched a Bible in many years; but now it became his constant companion and his solace. "This alone is right," he said, pointing to the sacred Book, where it lay on the table in his sick-room. He returned to the belief of his youth and a great light broke in on the darkness of his ebbing life. One of his last messages was to his old teacher—a brief message, only the refrain of a hymn he used to sing in school long years before. "Only one can save us, Jesus, our Lord." In those last hours the world, with its distractions, its wild theories and its spiritual rebellions, mattered now but little. The wanderer had come back.

The Dead Spanish Premier

IN THE assassination of Premier José Canalejas y Mendez, whom his country regarded as one of the greatest statesmen Spain has produced in many years, we see another evidence of the hidden perils that surround men who are foremost in the public eye, and against which it seems impossible to furnish adequate protection. Premier Canalejas's murderer is a young anarchist, a disciple of the self of Francisco Ferrer, who was executed at Montju in 1909, and the assassin is said to have admit the fact that his act was one of premeditated venge for Ferrer's death. Canalejas, although premier when Ferrer's trial and conviction t place, was bitterly regarded by the radicals for defense of the government, when in the Cortes upheld its conviction of Ferrer as in accorda with military law, although he was silent as to execution itself.

As premier, Canalejas showed remarkable ministrative capacity. King Alfonso himself ch the rising statesman, notwithstanding his kn radicalism, and brought him to the front. soon became the central figure in the anti-cl cal movement. With royal approval, his admi tration gave increased privileges to non-Cathol Then came the long and arduous struggle to red the number and influence of the Romanist religi orders and to regulate the convents, which swar in Spain and were exempt from taxation. Vatican, by every means at its command, oppo the project. There were disturbances, but Alfo trusted the situation in the hands of his prem who put down disorder by strong measures, stored tranquillity, and continued his program the internal development of the country, the se ration of church and state, the taxing of chu property, and the placing of the religious orc under government control. Spain at present has minister accredited to the Vatican.

Canalejas was a radical, but of a salutary t Strong, courageous, conscientious, progressive, proved the backbone of a weak throne. In the sense a friend of the people, he strove to lift t out of their condition of ignorance, superstition moral degradation. His penetrating mind saw t as long as his country was in bondage to Ro and while the Vatican had a controlling voice in councils, it would remain illiterate and unenlig ened. His vision showed him the light of civil erty, of religious freedom, of national progr shining across the hills and valleys of Spain. planned for freedom of conscience, for the unloos of the priestly grasp on the nation's throat, popular education and better government. Ca lejas's dream will yet be realized; the vision not die with him. The new life he helped to ki in the hearts of the people will yet be the mean Spain's redemption.

The Man Who Will Be Blessed

BLESSED is the man that walketh not in counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornf writes the Psalmist. "But his delight is the of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate and night. And he shall be like a tree plante the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his frui his season; his leaf also shall not wither; whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." It is a g thing to be considered blessed by men; still gre to have the Lord call us blessed. Men are o mistaken in their views of what is a blessing misfortune. Our own heart is apt to long for w is poison, and to loathe what is manna to our God regards that man as blessed who knows w where, and how to separate. The people who wicked at heart and show it by their designs— people who practice sinning in their daily actio the people who scorn religion and organize for purpose, are not fit company for the child of He is blessed if he stays away from them. says so, and God knows. The child of God kn when, where, and how to unite: he holds com nion with God. What God has said is food thought to him during the busy day, and eng his reflection in sleepless nights; yea, fills dreams. He is blessed again in these meditati God says so, and God knows. The result is the blessed man becomes a blessing: as a tre full foliage and laden with fruit is hailed by weary and famished wanderer in arid wastes, child of God offers the shade of his counsel comfort and the active help and support of kindly actions to his needy fellow men.

O God, my Father, bless thy child with wis to see and with a desire to practice what wouldst have me think, and say, and do, thro out this day and this entire year. Keep me fr becoming a curse, and make me to be a blessin this world. To this end cause thy Word to b all-absorbing interest to me, for Christ my viour's sake. Amen.

Bryce Resigns Ambassadorship

THE RIGHT HON. JAMES BRYCE, the British ambassador, has notified President Taft that he has tendered his resignation to his government, and will return to England. friends of Mr. Bryce gave two reasons for his on. One was that, being seventy-four years old, desired to take himself out of the whirl and tion of political life, and the second one was his re to finish a monumental work on world-wide ocracy and a historical work on the Emperor tinian. James Bryce, lawyer, author, diplomat, born in Belfast, Ireland, on May 10, 1838, and educated at the University of Glasgow and nity College, Oxford, which conferred on him degree of Doctor of Laws in 1870. He was itted to the bar of Lincoln's Inn in 1862, and cticed law until 1882. He was appointed ius Professor of Civil Law in Oxford in 1870. 880 he entered Parliament as the Liberal mem- from the Tower Hamlets, London, and ame under secretary of state for for- affairs in 1886. He was chief secre- y of Ireland from 1905 to 1907, when was appointed ambassador to the ted States. It was said at the time of appointment that his selection was nded as a compliment to the United tes, in whose government and people Bryce had shown such a deep inter- and that his government took especial le in sending to our government so an author, so wise a statesman, and good a man as Mr. Bryce. He has n exceedingly popular here. He has n in great demand as a lecturer and tor since coming to this country, and egarded as one of the happiest after- ner speakers heard in any city of the d. A year ago Mr. Bryce indicated to Majesty's government a desire to re from his post at Washington, as by t time the question which he came m Europe to settle (including those ting to the North American fisheries, boundary waters between the United tes and Canada, fur sealing in the ring Sea, and pecuniary claims out- nding between Britain and the United tes) had all been disposed of. At the uest of the British Government, how- r, he remained in Washington till v. It is understood that Mr. Bryce will asked to stay a few months more at post to assist in the settlement of the pute over the tolls of the Panama nal and perhaps other questions. The ndon Times, in speaking of the retire- nt of Ambassador Bryce, after a few rds of criticism, has this to say: "They of little enough account in compari- with the general influence for good ich Mr. Bryce's reputation and per- ality have exerted on Anglo-Ameri- affairs. He went to Washington h a reputation so high as to be diffi- t to maintain. He has not decreased He has made it higher in both coun- es by the work he has done. He has en a dignified and capable ambassador, distinguished public figure, and, in vate life, a man of many friends."

Tablet to "Titanic" Bandsmen

UT from the screams and tumult of the Titanic as she sank in the icy waters of the Atlantic re came the sweet strains of music by the ship's chestra, who remained like heroes and played to lm the passengers. And it is reported that as e vessel was settling to its watery grave, divine reams of melody were sounded by the members of e orchestra, and that the last song breathed be- re there was the silence of death was "Nearer, God, to Thee." A bronze tablet in memory of e seven musicians who went down as heroes on e Titanic was unveiled the other day by the Mu- al Protective Union in their clubhouse at 214 st Sixth Street, New York City. The tab- has a feminine figure, symbolical of Music, plac- g a wreath of oak leaves on an expanse of open water broken by an iceberg. Beneath is the inscription, "A tribute to the bandsmen of the Titanic. When the order was, 'Each man for himself,' these heroes remained on board and played unto the last." Then follow the first two bars of music of "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and the names of Wallace Hartley, bandmaster; George Krins, Roger Bricoux, W. T. Brailey, J. Wesley Woodward, P. C. Taylor, J. F. P. Clarke, John L. Hume. The exercises were simple. American and English flags were draped about the tablet; an orchestra played "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and W. J. Kerngood, president of the union, made a short address, after which the "taps" were sounded. Music has not only a refreshing but a refining, influence upon the soul. It is the instrument of the communication of human and divine love. It has ever been used in the services of the Lord's house in bringing the human heart into fellowship of the heart of the Eternal. How sweet, and pathetic, and divine the ministry of music on the Titanic commemorated in the tablet! The pathos of the incident suggests these words:

My harp also is turned to mourning, and my organ into the voice of them that weep. (Job 30: 31.)

Oldest Newspaper Suppressed

THE president of the Chinese Republic, Yuan Shi Kai, recently suppressed the newspaper King Bao, which was undoubtedly the oldest paper in the world. For 1,500 years it has reported the more important news, not only of China, but also of foreign countries. The first edition was printed on ten sheets of yellow silk neatly tied together, and was sent to all the high officials of the Chinese Empire. Since 400 A.D. that paper has been issued regularly till it was suppressed by the government. Many think that printing was discovered in Europe in the fourteenth century, calling into use at first letters cut out of the bark of a tree, and taking impressions from them. As late as the second half of the fourteenth century every book in Europe used for school or church, every public document, every letter, was written out by hand, and the illustrations of the same were made by hand. Wood letters were used for printing in Europe on silk cloth and vellum nearly two hundred years before they were used for printing on paper. In the year 175 the text of the Chinese classics was cut upon tablets which were placarded outside the university, and impressions were taken from them. The newspaper King Bao, founded in the year 400 of the Christian era, is the natural product of the art of printing in that day. It is presumed that the president of the republic suppressed this paper because it was unfriendly to democracy, or to the present administration of the government. Mr. Arthur Brisbane, in an address before the Pulitzer School of Journalism at Columbia University recently, spoke of the untold power of the writer in the newspaper of to-day. The province of journalism is strongly suggested in the publishing of a king's decree in favor of the Jews:

The copy of the writing for a commandment to be given in every province was published unto all people, and that the Jews shall be ready against that day to avenge themselves on their enemies. (Esther 8:13.)

Dogs as Hotel Guests

THE papers report that a wealthy woman well known in the community went to one of the finest hotels in New York and engaged a suite of four rooms and three baths for the winter at $50 a day. There was a living-room, a bedroom and a bath for herself, a room and bath for the maids, and a bedroom and bath for her "babies," as she called her three dogs, two Japanese and one a Pekingese spaniel. Arising from their satin-lined baskets in the morning, the dogs are bathed with scented water in the big white tub. After that comes breakfast with milk and toast. At luncheon the "babies" are served with lamb chops and creamed potatoes. Dinner consists of a bit of chicken, mashed potatoes, and a dessert of ice cream or some creamy confection. The fare for the dogs is $10 a day, $3,650 a year. It could hardly be thought possible that there should be such a wicked waste of money and such a misdirection of affection as this story would indicate, when there are so many children dying for want of food, and whose hearts are crying for want of love. The sum of $3,600 might have been given to poor little real babies to save them and make them happy, and then the dogs could have lived luxuriously on the $50 left. So many waste their time, their money and their energy on the things that are little, insignificant and low, neglecting the things that are lofty and divine, making proper the inquiry:

Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not? (Isa. 55: 2.)

Mother Sells Her Blood

GOVERNOR WILSON of New Jersey the other day signed requisition papers for the return of Charles Leroy Brown, who had deserted his wife and children, to Baltimore. By the authority of these papers, Brown was taken from Vineland, N. J., to Baltimore to answer an indictment by the grand jury there for deserting his family. Brown left his family last March. Until three months ago the mother worked to provide for herself and children. Then she had to go to Johns Hopkins Hospital to become the mother of another babe. During her illness her savings had dwindled to a few pennies. It was then that she sold for $25 a quantity of her blood to the surgeons for transfusion to another woman. She stood the operation well, and her blood saved the life of the other patient. "I would sell more of my blood, and would even sacrifice my life if it would keep my children from suffering." A mother's love—who can measure it? Who can describe it? It is nearer the love of the Christ than anything this side of heaven. Amid the scenes of evil, the acts of frozen selfishness, the tragedies of crime, the beautiful act of this devoted mother in selling her life's blood to save her children from starving appears in striking contrast. The prophet uses the pathetic affection of a mother for her child as a type of God's love for his children.

As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you. (Isa. 66: 13.)

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY STOCKTON MULFORD

CHAPTER I

Miss Polly

MISS POLLY HARRINGTON entered her kitchen a little hurriedly this June morning. Miss Polly did not usually make hurried movements; she specially prided herself on her repose of manner. But to-day she was hurrying—actually hurrying.

Nancy, washing dishes at the sink, looked up in surprise. Nancy had been working in Miss Polly's kitchen only two months, but already she knew that her mistress did not usually hurry.

"Nancy!"

"Yes, ma'am." Nancy answered cheerfully, but she still continued wiping the pitcher in her hand.

"Nancy"—Miss Polly's voice was very stern now—"when I'm talking to you I wish you to stop your work and listen to what I have to say."

Nancy flushed miserably. She set the pitcher down at once, with the cloth still about it, thereby nearly tipping it over—which did not add to her composure.

"Yes, ma'am; I will, ma'am," she stammered, righting the pitcher, and turning hastily. "I was only keepin' on with my work 'cause you specially told me this mornin' ter hurry with my dishes, you know."

Her mistress frowned.

"That will do, Nancy. I did not ask for explanations. I asked for your attention."

"Yes, ma'am." Nancy stifled a sigh. She was wondering if ever in any way she could please this woman. Nancy had never "worked out" before; but a sick mother suddenly widowed and left with three younger children besides Nancy herself, had forced the girl into doing something toward their support, and she had been so pleased when she found a place in the kitchen of the great house on the hill—Nancy had come from "The Corners," six miles away, and she knew Miss Polly only as the mistress of the old Harrington homestead, and one of the wealthiest residents of the town. That was two months before. She knew Miss Polly now as a stern, severe-faced woman, who frowned if a knife clattered to the floor, or if a door banged—but who never thought to smile even when knives and doors were still.

"When you've finished your morning work, Nancy," Miss Polly was saying now, "you may clear the little room at the head of the stairs in the attic, and make up the cot bed. Sweep the room and clean it, of course, after you clear out the trunks and boxes."

"Yes, ma'am. And where shall I put the things, please, that I take out?"

"In the front attic." Miss Polly hesitated, then went on: "I suppose I may as well tell you now, Nancy. My niece, Miss Pollyanna Whittier, is coming to live with me. She is eleven years old, and will sleep in that room."

"A little girl—coming here, Miss Harrington? Oh, won't that be nice!" cried Nancy, thinking of the sunshine her own little sisters made in the home at "The Corners."

"Nice? Well, that isn't exactly the word I should use," rejoined Miss Polly, stiffly. "However, I intend to make the best of it, of course. I am a good woman, I hope; and I know my duty."

Nancy colored hotly.

"Of course, ma'am; it was only that I thought a little girl here might—might brighten things up—for you," she faltered.

"Thank you," rejoined the lady, dryly. "I can't say, however, that I see any immediate need for that."

"But of course you—you'd want her, your sister's child," ventured Nancy, vaguely feeling that somehow she must prepare a welcome for this lonely little stranger.

Miss Polly lifted her chin haughtily.

"Well, really, Nancy, just because I happened to have a sister who was silly enough to marry and bring unnecessary children into a world that was already quite full enough, I can't see how I should particularly want to have the care of them myself. However, as I said before, I hope I know my duty. See that you clean the corners, Nancy," she finished sharply, as she left the room.

"Yes, ma'am," sighed Nancy, picking up the half-dried pitcher—now so cold it must be rinsed again.

"Are you Miss—Pollyanna?" she faltered

In her own room, Miss Polly took out once more the letter which she had received two days before from the far-away Western town, and which had been so unpleasant a surprise to her. The letter was addressed to Miss Polly Harrington, Beldingsville, Vermont; and after the preliminaries of date, etc., at the top, it read:

"DEAR MADAM: I regret to inform you that the Rev. John Whittier died two weeks ago, leaving one child, a girl eleven years old. He left practically nothing else save a few books; for, as you doubtless know, he was the pastor of this small mission church, and had a very meager salary.

"I believe he was your deceased sister's husband, but he gave me to understand the families were not on the best of terms. He thought, however, that for your sister's sake you might wish to take the child and bring her up among her own people in the East. Hence I am writing to you.

"The little girl will be all ready to start by the time you get this letter, and if you can take her, we would appreciate it very much if you would write that she might come at once, as there are a man and his wife here who are going East very soon, and they would take her with them to Boston, and put her on the Beldingsville train. Of course you would be notified what day and train to expect Pollyanna on.

"Hoping to hear favorably from you soon, I remain,

"Respectfully yours,
"JEREMIAH O. WHITE."

With a frown Miss Polly folded the letter and tucked it into its envelope. She had answered it the day before, and she had said she would take the child, of course. She hoped she knew her duty well enough for that!—disagreeable as the task would be.

As she sat now, with the letter in her hands, her thoughts went back to her sister Jennie, who had been this child's mother, and to the time when she, as a girl of twenty, had insisted upon marrying the young minister, in spite of her family's remonstrances. There had been a man of wealth who had wanted her—and the family had much preferred him to the minister; but Jennie had not. The man of wealth had more years, as well as more money, to his credit, while the minister had only a young head full of youth's ideals and enthusiasm, and a heart full of love. Jennie had preferred these—quite naturally, perhaps; so she married the minister, and had gone South with him as a home missionary's wife.

The break had come then. Miss Polly remembered it well, though she had been but a girl of fifteen, the youngest, at the time. The family had had little more to do with the missionary's wife. To be sure, Jennie herself had written, for a time, and had named her last baby "Pollyanna" for her two sisters, Polly and Anna—the other babies had all died. This had been the last time that Jennie had written; and in a few years there had come the news of her death, told in a short but heartbroken little note from the minister himself, dated at a little town in the West.

Meanwhile, time had not stood still for the occupants of the great house on the hill. Miss Polly, looking out at the far-reaching val below, thought of the changes th twenty-five years had brought to her

She was forty now, and quite alo in the world. Father, mother, siste —all were dead. For years, now, s had been sole mistress of the house a of the thousands left her by her fath There were people who had openly p ied her lonely life and urged her have some friend or companion to l with her; but she had not welcom either their sympathy or their advi She was not lonely, she said. Miss Polly rose with frowning f and closely-shut lips. She was glad, course, that she was a good wom and that she not only knew her du but had sufficient strength of charac to perform it. But—Pollyanna—wh a ridiculous name!

CHAPTER II

Old Tom and Nancy

IN THE little attic room Nancy swe and scrubbed vigorously, paying p ticular attention to the corners. There were tim indeed, when the vigor she put into her work w more of a relief to her feelings than it was an arc to efface dirt—Nancy, in spite of her frighter submission to her mistress, was no saint.

"I—just—wish—I could—dig out—the corners of—her—soul!" she muttered jerkily, punctuati her words with murderous jabs of her point cleaning-stick. "There's plenty of 'em nee cleanin', all right, all right! The idea of stick that blessed child 'way off up here in this hot lit room—with no fire in the winter, too; and all th big house ter pick and choose from! Unnecessa children, indeed! Humph," snapped Nancy, writ ing her rag so hard her fingers ached from t strain; "I guess it ain't children what is most n necessary just now, just now!"

For some time she worked in silence; then, h task finished, she looked about the bare little roo in plain disgust.

"Well, it's done—my part, anyhow," she sigh "There ain't no dirt here—and there's mighty lit else. Poor little soul!—a pretty place this is t put a homesick, lonesome child into!" she finish going out and closing the door with a bang. "Oh she ejaculated, biting her lip. Then, doggedl "Well, I don't care. I hope she did hear the ba —I do, I do!"

In the garden that afternoon, Nancy found a f minutes to interview Old Tom, who had pulled t weeds and shoveled the paths about the place f uncounted years.

"Mr. Tom," began Nancy, throwing a qui glance over her shoulder to make sure she was u observed, "did you know a little girl was com here ter live with Miss Polly?"

"A—what?" demanded the old man, straighte ing his bent back with difficulty.

"A little girl—to live with Miss Polly."

"Go on with yer jokin'," scoffed unbelieving To "Why don't ye tell me the sun is goin' ter set in t east ter-morrer?"

"But it's true. She told me herself," maintain Nancy. "It's her niece; and she's eleven yea old."

The man's jaw fell.

"Sho! I wonder, now," he muttered; then a te der light came into his faded eyes. "It ain't—b it must be—Miss Jennie's little gal! Glory be t praise! ter think of my old eyes a-seein' this!"

"Who's Miss Jennie?"

"She was an angel straight out of heaven breathed the old man, fervently; "but the old ma ter and missus knew her as their oldest daught She was twenty when she married and went aw from here long years ago. Her babies all died, heard, except the last one; and that must be the o what's a-comin'."

"She's eleven years old."

"Yes, she might be," nodded the old man.

"And she's goin' ter sleep in the attic—mo shame ter her!" scolded Nancy, with another glan over her shoulder toward the house behind her.

Old Tom frowned. The next moment a curio smile curved his lips.

"I'm a-wonderin' what Miss Polly will do with child in the house," he said.

"Humph! Well, I'm a-wonderin' what a child will with Miss Polly in the house!" snapped Nancy.
The old man laughed.
'I'm afraid you ain't fond of Miss Polly," he inned.
'As if ever anybody could be fond of her!" rned Nancy.
Old Tom smiled oddly. He stooped and began to rk again.
'I guess maybe you didn't know about Miss lly's love affair," he said slowly.
'Love affair—her! No!—and I guess nobody e didn't, neither."
"Oh, yes, they did," nodded the old man. "And feller's livin' ter-day—right in this town, too."
'Who is he?"
'I ain't a-tellin' that. It ain't fit that I should." e old man drew himself erect. In his dim blue es, as he faced the house, there was the look of the ral servant's honest pride in the mily he had served and loved for ng years.
"But it don't seem possible—her d a lover," still maintained ancy.
Old Tom shook his head.
"You didn't know Miss Polly as did," he suggested. "She used ter real handsome—an' she would now, if she'd let herself be."
"Handsome! Miss Polly!"
"Yes. If she'd just let that tight ir of her'n all out loose an' care- ss like, as it used ter be, and wear e sort of bunnits with posies in n, and the kind o' dresses all lace ' white things—you'd see she'd handsome! Miss Polly ain't d, Nancy."
"Ain't she, though? Well, then, e's got an awfully good imita- on of it—she has, she has," iffed Nancy.
"Yes, I know. It begun then— the time of the trouble with her au," nodded Old Tom; "and it ems as if she'd been feedin' on ormwood an' thistles ever since— e's that bitter an' prickly ter al with."
"I should say she was," declared ancy, indignantly. "There's no easin' her nohow, no matter how ou try! I wouldn't stay if 'twan't r the wages and the folks at me what's needin' 'em. But some ay I shall jest b'ile over; and hen I do, of course it'll be good- Nancy for me, it will, it will!"
Old Tom shook his head.
"I know. I've felt it. It's nart'ral but 'tain't best, child; 'tain't st. Take my word for it, 'tain't st." And again he bent his old ead to the work before him.
"Nancy!" called a sharp voice.
"Y-yes, ma'am," stammered ancy, and hurried toward the ouse.

CHAPTER III

The Coming of Pollyanna

N DUE time came the telegram announcing that Pollyanna would rrive in Beldingsville the next ay, the 25th of June, at four clock. Miss Polly read the tele- ram, frowned, then climbed the tairs to the attic room. She still rowned as she looked about her.
The room contained a small bed, eatly made, two straight-backed hairs, a washstand, a bureau— ithout any mirror—and a small able. There were no drapery urtains at the dormer windows, o pictures on the wall. All day the sun had been ouring down upon the roof, and the little room as like an oven for heat. As there were no creens, the windows had not been raised. A big y was buzzing angrily at one of them now, up and own, trying to get out.
Miss Polly killed the fly, swept it through the indow (raising the sash an inch for the purpose), traightened a chair, frowned again, and left the oom.
"Nancy," she said a few minutes later, at the itchen door, "I found a fly upstairs in Miss Polly- nna's room. The window must have been raised some time. I have ordered screens, but until ey come I shall expect you to see that the windows main closed. My niece will arrive to-morrow at ur o'clock. I desire you to meet her at the sta- on. Timothy will take the open buggy and drive u over. The telegram says, 'light hair, red- ecked gingham dress, and straw hat.' That is ll I know, but I think that is sufficient for your urpose."
"Yes, ma'am; but—you—"
Miss Polly evidently read the pause aright, for she frowned and said crisply:
"No, I shall not go. It is not necessary that I should, I think. That is all." And she turned away—Miss Polly's arrangements for the comfort of her niece Pollyanna were complete.
In the kitchen, Nancy sent her flatiron with a vicious dig across the dishtowel she was ironing.
"'Light hair, red-checked gingham dress, and straw hat'—all she knows, indeed! Well, I'd be ashamed ter own it up, that I would, I would—and her my onliest niece what was comin' from way across the continent!"
Promptly at twenty minutes to four the next afternoon, Timothy and Nancy drove off in the open buggy to meet the expected guest. Timothy was Old Tom's son. It was sometimes said in the town that if Old Tom was Miss Polly's right-hand man, Timothy was her left.
Timothy was a good-natured youth, and a good-looking one as well. Short as had been Nancy's stay at the house, the two were already good friends. To-day, however, Nancy was too full of her mission to be her usual talkative self; and almost in silence she took the drive to the station and alighted to wait for the train.
Over and over in her mind she was saying it—"light hair, red-checked gingham dress, straw hat." Over and over again she was wondering just what sort of child this Pollyanna was, anyway.
"I hope for her sake she's quiet and sensible, and don't drop knives nor bang doors," she sighed to Timothy, who had sauntered up to her.
"Well, if she ain't, nobody knows what'll become of the rest of us," grinned Timothy. "Imagine Miss Polly and a noisy kid! Listen! there goes the whistle now!"
"Oh, Timothy, I—I think it was mean ter send me," chattered the suddenly frightened Nancy, as she turned and hurried to a point where she could best watch the passengers alight at the little station.
It was not long before Nancy saw her—the slender little girl in the red-checked gingham with two fat braids of flaxen hair hanging down her back. Beneath the straw hat, an eager, freckled little face turned to the right and to the left, plainly searching for some one.
Nancy knew the child at once, but not for some time could she control her shaking knees sufficiently to go to her. The little girl was standing quite by herself when Nancy finally did approach her.
"Are you Miss—Pollyanna?" she faltered. The next moment she found herself half smothered in the clasp of two gingham-clad arms.
"Oh, I'm so glad, glad, GLAD to see you," cried an eager voice in her ear. "Of course I'm Pollyanna, and I'm so glad you came to meet me! I hoped you would."
"You—you did!" stammered Nancy, vaguely wondering how Pollyanna could possibly have known her—and wanted her. "You—you did?" she repeated, trying to straighten her hat.
"Oh, yes; and I've been wondering all the way here what you looked like!" cried the little girl, dancing on her toes, and sweeping the embarrassed Nancy from head to foot with her eyes. "And now I know; and I'm glad you look just like you do look."
Nancy was relieved just then to have Timothy come up. Pollyanna's words had been most confusing.
"This is Timothy. Maybe you have a trunk," she stammered.
"Yes, I have," nodded Pollyanna importantly; "I've got a brand new one. The Ladies' Aid bought it for me—and wasn't it lovely of them, when they wanted the carpet so? Of course I don't know how much red carpet a trunk would buy, but it ought to buy some, anyhow; much as half an aisle—don't you think? I've got a little thing here in my bag that Mr. Gray said was a check, and that I must give it to you before I could get my trunk. Mr. Gray is Mrs. Gray's husband. They're cousins of Deacon Carr's wife. I came East with them, and they're lovely! And—there, here 'tis," she finished, producing the check after much fumbling in the bag she carried.
Nancy drew a long breath. Instinctively she felt that some one had to draw one—after that speech. Then she stole a glance at Timothy. Timothy's eyes were studiously turned away.
The three were off at last, with Pollyanna's trunk in behind, and Pollyanna herself snugly ensconced between Nancy and Timothy. During the whole process of getting started, the little girl had kept up an uninterrupted stream of comments and questions, until the somewhat dazed Nancy found herself quite out of breath trying to keep up with her.
"There! Isn't this lovely? Is it far? I hope 'tis—I love to ride," sighed Pollyanna, as the wheels began to turn. "Of course, if 'tisn't far, I shan't mind, though, 'cause I'll be glad to get there all the sooner, you know. What a pretty street! I knew 'twas going to be pretty; father told me—"
She stopped with a little choking breath. Nancy, looking at her apprehensively, saw that her small eyes were full of tears. In a moment, however, she had hurried on, with a brave lifting of the head.
"Father told me all about it. He remembered. And—and I ought to have explained before—Mrs. Gray told me to, at once—about this red gingham dress, you know, and why I'm not in black. She said you'd think 'twas queer. But there weren't any black things in the last missionary barrel, only a lady's velvet basque which Deacon Carr's wife said wasn't suitable for me at all; besides, it had white spots—worn, you know—on both elbows, and some other places. Part of the Ladies' Aid wanted to buy me a black dress and hat, but the other part thought the money ought to go toward the red carpet they're trying to get—for the church, you know. Mrs. White said maybe it was just as well, anyhow, for she didn't like children in black—that is, I mean, she liked the children, of course, but not the black part."

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

THE MAN OF MACEDONIA AND WHITHER HE LED THE APOSTLE

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.
Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

SUCH an indefatigable traveler as Paul, with a mission to the whole world, a mission but yet fulfilled in a very small part, could not always remain in a back current of the world's civilization, though he tarried some time with the brethren of Syrian Antioch, and in the meantime attended a famous and important council at Jerusalem. A few months later found him on his travels once more. Going around the eastern end of the Mediterranean he came first to Adana and Tarsus, two important centers of modern missionary work, then through the famous "Cilician Gates" in the Taurus Mountains to the cities of Galatia, which he had before visited, he came at length to Troas on the Ægean Sea.

On this journey he was accompanied by Silas, his disagreement with Barnabas over John Mark having led them to take different routes, Barnabas going to the island of Cyprus and Paul to Asia Minor. At Lystra, where we remember he was first treated as a god, and then stoned as a disturber of the peace, he found his "beloved son" Timothy, who evidently was converted on the first journey, and in the meantime had had opportunities to test his faith, and was now ready to accompany Paul, and "suffer hardship with him as a good soldier of Christ Jesus." A good authority in calculating the time that Paul would take for this journey, tells us that if he walked it would take eight days from the Cilician Gates to Derbe, two more to Lystra, one to Iconium, four to Antioch, and seventeen to Troas, but of course he stopped on the way to encourage the disciples and confirm their faith, and he always rested on the Sabbath Day. Since Timothy was circumcised at Lystra his stay there must have been of some considerable length.

It is supposed that he left the Cilician Gates about the first of June, A.D. 51, and that he reached Troas some time in the following September. As we approach Troas we come near to the very center of classic lore. Though Troas is not on the site of ancient Troy, it is, however, near by. Of Troy Homer sang. In the Æneid Virgil relates the story of Troy, and how Italy was the inheritor of its glory. Horace told the Romans that if the walls of Troy were rebuilt the power of Rome would be forever lost. We are told that Julius Cæsar, when at the height of his power, intended to fix his capital at Troy, and from that point rule both East and West, embracing the whole world in his kingdom. It had not reached the height of its power, to be sure, in St. Paul's time, at least as a Roman city, but it was a great and growing metropolis, just such a city as Paul loved to use as a center for his Gospel propaganda.

Even to-day the traveler in Troas finds many signs of its former glory. It was evidently a granite city like modern Aberdeen. Many of the stones have been carried off both by Mohammedans and Christians for their building operations during the last fifteen hundred years.

Travelers in the early part of the last century saw far more of the ruins than are left for the modern traveler. One tells of "a stupendous column which was concealed among some trees in the neighborhood the like of which scarcely existed even in Egypt." Another early traveler speaks of hundreds of columns, and says that many are bristling among the waves to a considerable distance out at sea. We are even told that the granite columns of Troas were used for making cannon balls for the defense of the Dardanelles. But all these reminiscences of former glories do not interest the Christian so much as the fact that once, in the fall of the year of our Lord 51, a man, insignificant in personal appearance but mighty in spirit and in his influence over all time, came to Troas after a long and tedious journey over the mountains and across the plains of Asia Minor.

A Missionary Industrial School in Macedonia

Here he had a wonderful vision. A man of Macedonia appeared to him in a dream of the night, beseeching him and saying, "Come over into Macedonia and help us!" Paul had never been out of Asia. To him Europe must have been as strange a country as is China or Japan to the American who has never visited those shores. Ever since that day the man of Macedonia and his message have stood for the Christian for the call of opportunity, the message of Providence, often for the unconscious cry of the needy for help. "The man of Macedonia" and his message have passed into the literature of the world. It is not too much to say, perhaps, that this was the most important vision ever vouchsafed to mortal man.

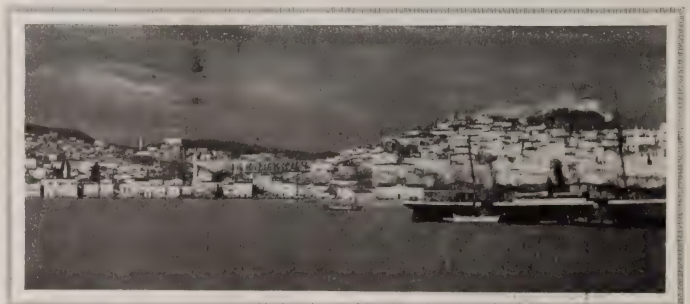
And Paul was "not disobedient to the heavenly vision." Attractive as Troas must have been to a man who was always seeking important centers of influence, especially centers in the Roman world, he did not linger in Troas. "Straightway we sought to go forth into Macedonia, concluding that God had called us to preach the Gospel unto them." Setting sail therefore from Troas the missionaries made straight course to Samothrace and the day following to Neapolis.

We must linger in Troas long enough to remind ourselves of a later visit that Paul made to this famous city, on his return from his third missionary journey. Here he spent a week, and a minute account is given of his last day. It was Saturday evening, the evening which succeeded the Jewish Sabbath. On the following Sunday morning the vessel was to sail which would take Paul away from his devoted Trojan disciples. With them he was celebrating the Lord's Supper.

Dean Howson's account of the Bible story of this evening is so graphic that I cannot forbear quoting it in part: "The night was dark; three weeks had not elapsed since the Passover and the moon only appeared as a faint crescent in the early part of the night. Many lamps were burning in the room where the congregation was assembled; the place was hot and crowded. St. Paul, with the feeling strongly impressed on his mind that the next day was the day of his departure, and that souls might be lost by delay, was continuing in earnest discourse and prolonging it even till midnight; when an occurrence suddenly took place which filled the assembly with alarm, though it was afterwards converted into an occasion of joy and thanksgiving. A young listener whose name was Eutychus was overcome by exhaustion, heat and weariness and sank into deep slumber. He was seated or leaning in the balcony; and falling down in his sleep was dashed upon the pavement below and was taken up dead. Confusion and terror followed with loud lamentation, but Paul was enabled to imitate the power that Master whose doctrine he was proclaiming. He went down and fell upon the body like Elisha of old, and embracing Eutychus said to the bystanders 'Do not lament, for his life is in him.' With mind solemnized and filled with thankfulness by this wonderful token of God's power and love they celebrated the eucharistic feast.

It has been a great comfort to many modern preachers to know that even in Paul's audience one at least was overcome by sleep. This incident connected with the city of Troas occurred some six years later than the journey we have been describing, but we have introduced it here, since in the articles we are not likely to return to this ancient and interesting city.

The voyage from Troas to Neapolis was a speedy and favorable one. On a later journey the same voyage occupied five days instead of the two. Over classic seas, coasting the classic islands, the apostle and his companions sailed until the famous island of Thasos loomed upon the horizon, and soon the beautiful harbor of Neapolis opened to the little ship.



Kavalla, the Ancient Neapolis, Where St. Paul Landed on European Soil

It was a memorable company indeed that this ship contained. Paul the greatest of apostles, Timothy and Silas, his most faithful disciples. The evangelist Luke was in that ship, for at Troas Paul had been joined by the beloved physician, the graphic and accurate historian, to whom we OME now, bo! Toot! toot! This ain't no hotel. Beat it."

Jack Sanders climbed slowly from the fifty-fathom depth of slumber to which he d sunk and blinked at the lights of Madison uare. There was nothing unkind in the voice or anner of the patrolman who was bringing back to m the agony of sleeplessness and the bitter con- ousness of "nowhere to go." He was simply do- his duty as laid down in the mystic and ultimate de. The municipal laws forbade long naps on e park benches. He had allowed Jack to sleep teen minutes. So it was with a feeling of real ighborliness that he had pped the young fellow's oulder with his night-stick d advised him to seek her quarters.

Jack staggered to his feet. e was absolutely sober. In ct, he could not have been herwise if he had had the ish, for forty-eight hours d passed since the last ckel left his pocket. But staggered nevertheless. o little food is as bad for e steadiness of one's limbs too much drink. But rse now than the distress hunger—in fact, that had own almost negligible—as the agony of needing eep. Weird fancies came ating back to his mind of ings he had heard about eping men or spirits from ep; how torturers prodded ir victims when they zed, and how lost souls re driven perpetually from e comforts of slumber. He membered stories his fa- er had told of sleeping on e march in the old days of e Civil War. In fact, Jack d fall asleep as he stag- red across Madison Square.

"Now, then, youngster, ep off me, will you?" owled the same good-na- red policeman who had used him a moment ago. e had lurched heavily against m. "Bad 'cess to you en- rely! I'll have to run yez in spite of myself. On ur way, now! I'll give yez an more chanst to git out here. An'—don't tell any in I told ye—but up at ryant Park they don't al- ays run them in when they rop asleep. I used to be there wanst, and I re- ember. Only I shouldn't ave told ye. Git on, now."

"Where's Bryant Park?" uttered Jack feebly.

"For the love of Mike, you re a rube, then. Well, ryant Park is bechune For- -first and Forty-second treets. And if ye don't know here Forty-first Street is, 's just above Fortieth. Now ill ye go, or shall I have to er-rest ye afther all? I couldn't advise ye to walk o Fift' Avenya with them gs and that swagger. The ghts is too dazzlin', and the dies mightn't like to look at sz. Just mosey up Madison nd sneak through some shady reet. The park'll be a block t' your left. And ind, don't say that I told ye."

At least a dozen times ack Sanders fell asleep aking his way from Madi- n Square to Bryant Park. e rolled in the entrance at ngth. Could he believe his yes? They were actually let- ng men sleep stretched out ull length on the ground ast behind the big library, the dancing arc-light shad- ows of the park shrubbery. He crumpled up and lay still, too tired to straighten himself out, drop- ping asleep even before he reached the ground. As he sank to the ground he smiled. Surely this must be heaven!

But heaven, apparently, is very cold. He woke, aching and stiff. His muscles were cramped, his feet aching with cold, his whole body shaking. Nature was as cruel as the police. When a man dropped asleep she stung him to wakefulness with frost. He looked along the row of homeless sleep- ers. They all had wrapped newspapers about their feet. Some of them were lying on newspapers; a few had newspapers spread over them. Jack thought of the old bed back in Sterling, of the thick soft mattress and the heavy quilts. He must move on again. At least he must go out and find some papers.

But his three hours of sound sleep had restored something of his strength and a good deal of his nerve. Also he began to feel hungry again. Sud- denly he remembered that back home they used to read, around the dining-room table on cold winter nights, about a certain mission on the Bowery for homeless men, and that his mother two or three times every year sent money and supplies for its support. His pride was just about gone. He would eat any- thing that any one might give him; would sleep where any one would let him lie down and give him a blanket.

The resolution once formed, he set off toward the Bowery. His feet were sore and his legs still unsteady, his stom- ach frightfully empty. But he had an idea, which is something. Also he had had some sleep, which is almost everything.

It is queer how trifling things come before the mind at times and assume an in- terest altogether out of pro- portion to their actual im- portance. Tramping down Third Avenue toward the Bowery, Jack fell to thinking about Two-toed Turk. He smiled as he walked along. Two-toed Turk was certainly a comical bird. He recalled vividly the grotesque hop with which he tried majesti- cally to combine something of his former dignity with his present misfortune. Dig- nified, certainly, was Two- toed Turk, but it was with a dignity impaired.

There, amid the clatter of trolley car and the roar of the elevated trains, the glare of light and the noise of many tongues and many feet, Jack Sanders lived again the hours of that fair June day when Two-toed Turk had re- ceived his name—and lost his dignity. Late blossoms were clinging to some of the or- chard trees. Most of them had fallen to the ground, but oc- casionally there came to one's nostrils a flood of that in- toxicating fragrance. When- ever the hum of the mowing machine ceased there was the lighter but quite similar hum of the lazy bees. Among the stubble a red, wild straw- berry gleamed occasionally. Blackberry vines stood bravely by the stone wall separating the meadow from the or- chard, whose grass would be later in ripening. Over the stones wild grapevines clam- bered. He and Jared Poole were loading the hay cut yes- terday. His father drove the mower through the sweet, thick grass still standing in the west half of the field.

Suddenly there was a jar in the quiet order of the meadow. His father's voice rose sharply over the whirr of the mower. Machine and voice ceased abruptly, and out over the sun-filled field and up through the splendors of the summer air toward the glor- ies of the summer sky swelled the frantic wailing of a tur- key gobbler in distress. Then they saw him speeding across the field toward the shelter of the barn, with his new and utterly indescribable gait.

THE PILGRIM'S THANKSGIVING

DEEP plodding through the virgin snow,
The pilgrim takes his way,
His thoughts intent on festive cheer
To grace Thanksgiving Day.

The blasts are whistling shrill and keen,
The woods are dark and cold—
How different from the Holland dikes,
And from Old England's wold! *

Here in this new and wondrous land
He'll spread a bounteous board,
And with a grateful, happy heart,
Give thanks unto the Lord

For dangers passed, for mercies shown,
For help in days of woe,
For all the blessings of the past,
For blessings yet to flow.

The God to whom his fathers prayed,
To whom they bent the knee,
Will be the same to him and his;
From ills will keep them free.

The Pilgrim's children's hope in God
Is just as strong to-day
As when the Mayflower, safe and sound,
Sailed into Plymouth Bay.

The lesson that the Fathers taught
Is still our guiding rod;
We have their love, we have their faith,
We have their trust in God.

So when the blessed day comes round,
We look to One above,
And ask his blessings for ourselves,
And for the land we love.

Questions and Answers

F. J. K., Logan, Mont. 1. How are the Germans and the Jews related? 2. Do they speak the same language?

1. The Germans and the Jews are not related at all, except that many Jews live in Germany. They belong to two distinct races, the Jews to the Semitic race, the Germans to the Teutonic branch of the Aryans. Since the Jews have had no national home they have been scattered among other countries. 2. The Jews who live in Germany speak the German language, using among themselves a peculiar dialect, called "Yiddish," that term being itself a corrupt form of the German word "Jüdisch" (Jewish). Russian Jews also use this language, while by a curious chain of historic events Turkish Jews speak Spanish. Printed Yiddish shows an interesting combination of languages, the words being essentially German, but printed in Hebrew characters. It must be remembered that the term "Jew" has both a racial and a religious interpretation; since the beginning of the race, persons from other races have frequently become proselytes, accepting the Jewish faith.

J. B., Decatur, Ia. What is the origin of the crescent, the Mohammedan standard and emblem?

It is of ancient origin, and appeared on the coins of the Byzantine rulers and was adopted immediately by the Turks after they conquered Constantinople. It was first used as a standard in B.C. 339 long before the dawn of Mohammedanism and immediately after the city's preservation from the attack of Philip of Macedonia. The attack was made on a moonless winter night; but the darkness was lit up momentarily by a meteor, which revealed the position of the attacking army. The grateful citizens, in commemoration of the event, struck coins bearing the crescent moon, the emblem of Hecate the Torch-Bearer, a pagan deity.

M. H., Clarksville, Pa. An "indulgence" is a spiritual bill of health or official act of pardon granted by the Church of Rome. There are indulgences to ease the way of souls out of purgatory, indulgences for the living, permitting them to eat meat on holy days; indulgences for the forgiveness of past sins, and, in Spain at least, and probably in other countries, indulgences for those who have committed crimes, by which they are relieved of the responsibility of their acts. Indulgences are usually purchased with a fee, although in some cases they are granted in consideration of undergoing some form of penance. A recent illustration is the distribution of indulgences during the Eucharistic Congress in Vienna, where they seem to have been granted free to many people as a reward for their loyalty and devotion to the Catholic Church on that occasion.

C. S., Soreley, Md. 1. What did Paul mean when he spoke of the thorn in the flesh? 2. What is meant by the first and second Adam?

1. It refers to some bodily affliction affecting him individually and physically and not his work as an apostle. In Gal. 4: 13, 14 he refers to it as an "infirmity of my flesh"—some form of bodily sickness which had detained him among the Galatians. It was probably something that caused him acute pain, and also some degree of shame, since it "buffeted" him (I. Pet. 2: 20). There have been many conjectures as to its real character. Some have imagined it to be blasphemous thoughts, and others, remorse for his former life; but the most probable view is that it was an affliction which caused him physical annoyance, possibly a disorder of the eyes, or some nervous ailment. At all events, we are assured that it was so persistent and recurrent that he speaks of it in terms of apology and mortification. 2. The life brought in by Christ is coextensive with the death brought in by Adam. Paul marks the contrast of the posterity of the first Adam, who in their natural state are "earthy" and mortal, and subject to death; while all who are reborn in Christ are "heavenly" and have eternal life. The natural state precedes the spiritual state.

J. H., Clark, N. C., and Mrs. J. C. N., Redlands, Calif. Why was not the washing of the disciples' feet kept up, as well as the Lord's Supper? Both seem to be required.

Foot-washing in the early centuries and in Oriental lands stood for kindly service and for hospitality. A guest would wash the dust from his visitor's feet, after removing his sandals, just as we take a friend's coat and hat and hang them up for him. Of course the specific acts change with changing customs, but the spirit is the same. We want to show our friends that we are willing to serve them. Christ emphasized this by his performing this service for the disciples though he was recognized as their Teacher, Master and Leader. It was a concrete sign of his whole message that his followers must be humble, and quick to serve others. He did not limit this spirit and motive to one act of life, but insisted that it become the principle of action for our whole lives. The courtesies and kindnesses that hosts show to guests Christians must show to one another at all times and in all ways, and to all whom they meet.

Mrs. R. B. J., Weeping Water, Neb. Please explain Matt. 5: 3. I recently heard the meaning given that the "poor in spirit" are those who are poor because they do not obey God. Is it true that Christians reach a state in which they cease to be "poor in spirit"?

The simple meaning of this passage is that it is the humble soul that gets blessed. And the higher a saint gets in the divine life the more humble he will be. Spiritual progress which is not accompanied by humility is progress in the wrong direction. This is one of the distinctive points of Christ's doctrine; at the very threshold of the Christian life the Christian gives up his self-confidence; he surrenders all hope of making himself righteous, and gives himself to Christ to be made righteous. And his highest attainment can be expressed in the words of Paul: "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me."

Interested Reader, L. I. 1. Matt. 12: 32, referring to what is known as the "unpardonable sin," is interpreted as meaning attributing the works of the Holy Ghost to Satanic agency. 2. There are many verses both in the Old Testament and the New Testament relative to Sabbath-keeping. See chapters 16, 20 and 35 of Exodus; Leviticus, chapters 16, 19, 23, 24, 25, 26, and many other passages in Numbers, Deuteronomy, Nehemiah, Psalms, Ezekiel, etc. In all the Gospels the references are also numerous to the rigid Jewish observance of the Sabbath.

J. M. C., Birmingham, Ala. What was the manna fed to the Israelites in the wilderness?

It is supposed that the manna of the Israelites was a saccharine exudation of a species of tamarisk, the sap of which was set flowing by an insect. Several trees yield manna, as the flowering ash of Sicily and the eucalyptus of Australia. In India a sweet exudation comes from the bamboo, and a similar substance is obtained from the sugar-pine and common reed of our own country.

Mrs. J. M. B., Richmond, Calif. 1. Where can I obtain a book telling about the ring that was formerly around the earth like the one now around Saturn? 2. Also tell what you think about this idea of all worlds being made alike. 3. Has Saturn's ring ever shown any signs of breaking up?

1. Any book on the science of the Solar System will be likely to give the information asked. What is known as the Nebular Hypothesis assumes that in the process of world-making a ring of nebulous matter was formed around the earth, much like the rings around the planet Saturn, and that in the process of condensation the ring was broken and the fragments coming together made our moon. The process of world-making has been substantially the same, at least throughout our solar system. 3. Some observers have detected a seeming oscillation in one of Saturn's rings. The period of astronomical observation, however, has been so brief that any considerable variation in the rings could not be expected.

Daytona, Fla. S. P. LELAND.

J. B., Milwaukee, Wis. Please explain Ps. 8: 1,

In the preceding verse, the Psalmist is contemplating God's work in the starry firmament and in that which follows he marvels at the divine condescension which moves the Creator of these worlds to regard frail man—mere speck on the earth's surface—with love and pity. The fifth and sixth verses show the Psalmist's belief that man is so regarded and that the divine goodness passes human understanding.

J. E., Washington, Pa. Can you explain to me how it is that whereas my Bible gives 4,004 B.C. as the date of the creation of Adam, the histories of a civilization dating as far back as 7000 or 8000 B.C.?

The chronological references found on the margin of many Bibles (though not in all) are believed to have been the work of Bishop Ussher, a prelate of the Irish Church who lived in the sixteenth century, and who was a famous authority on Bible history. Taking the year 1 A.D. as his point of departure, he reckoned backward in Bible history as far as his researches seemed to warrant, and his calculations were given, not as authoritative or as a part of the Bible in any sense, but as helps to Bible study. The Bible itself fixes no date for the creation, but simply says (in Gen. 1: 1), "In the beginning God created." Later revelations in the form of ancient monuments, inscriptions, etc., have shown the fallacy of Ussher's computations, and they are now generally discarded. Geology has proved that the antiquity of the world and of the human race extends countless ages back of Ussher's figures. There is here no conflict of science and the Bible, although many have so supposed.

Mrs. W. R. I., Beaver, Pa. 1. Lydia, who is mentioned in Acts 16: 15, was a resident of Thyatira, a city celebrated for its purple dyes. She seems to have been a business woman, engaged in the sale of dyed goods, and she evidently had an extensive establishment, as she was able to accommodate the missionary party. She was a proselyte to the Jewish faith, but became a believer under Paul's ministry. 2. All card-playing for prizes is a species of gambling and should not be countenanced by Christian people. We are told to "avoid even the appearance of evil," and, if for nothing more than to show a good example to others, we should leave gambling alone. There is no such thing as sanctified gambling. It is quite a different matter, however, where rewards are given for Christian work which are a legitimate stimulus to others to do likewise.

Miscellaneous

Constant Reader, Millerstown, Pa. One was a Unitarian and the other an Episcopalian.

G. B. G., Malinda, Neb. The Mary spoken of in the New Testament are Mary the mother of Christ, Mary Magdalene, Mary the sister of Lazarus, Mary the wife of Cleophas (John 19: 25) and Mary the mother of John (Acts 12: 12).

E. C. S., Wilmington, N. C. 1. Presbyterian, we believe. 2. "Attorney at law" is a standard phrase, meaning simply a practicing lawyer. It would be therefore incorrect to say, "attorney of law." 1. Pet. 3: 19, 20 is better understood by the more accurate translation of the original in which the word "preached" should read "made the announcement," or "published the announcement" of his finished work, thereby declaring the condemnation of their unbelief and the salvation of Noah and the believers of that time; this announcement being made to the spirits awaiting the judgment. This gives no limitation of a second day of grace, however.

T. J. B., South Dos Palos, Calif. There is nothing in Scripture to make one believe that the whole world will be converted before the Second Coming. On the contrary, we are told that up to and immediately preceding the event, there will be widespread apostasy and spiritual decline, with false Christs and many leaders of men. We should not overlook the fact, however, that the duty is imposed on all Christians to spread the Gospel throughout the world, and to do everything that lies in our power for the conversion of the nations, but the complete harvest can come only in God's own time.

A Personal Letter

Dear Friend:

We desire to call your attention to the Pillar of Service on the opposite page, which represents some of the things the Christian Herald Family have accomplished through the agency of their favorite paper during 1912. Surrounding that Pillar of Service is a partial list of remarkable features which will give you some idea of how splendidly inspirational The Christian Herald will be throughout 1913.

Year after year a new Pillar has been added to the structure which our readers have been rearing all these years "In His Name." Year by year The Christian Herald, encouraged by their cordial support, has improved in spiritual uplift, editorial efficiency, and mechanical make-up.

It has been possible to accomplish this only through the co-operation and loyalty of The Christian Herald Family. We feel sure we can count upon YOUR renewal as in former years. Not to renew would be to forget that which you, yourself, have lovingly helped to build up. But we WOULD ask that you pass this issue of The Christian Herald along to some friend who will be interested in the great work, or, better yet, send us that friend's name, accompanied by the subscription price, according to the attractive terms offered in the following pages, and selecting as your reward one of our splendid book premiums.

We will then forward The Christian Herald to your friend with a special gift card bearing your name, and not only will your friend be reminded of your kindness every week for the next year, but you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you have done your part in bringing at least one new member into The Christian Herald Family.

Cordially yours,

GHS/CD Geo. H. Sandison - Editor.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOR 1913

Many additional features are still in process of arrangement, and will be announced later with the assurance that 1913 will be the brightest, most interesting and inspirational year in the history of The Christian Herald.

He has prepared for The Christian Herald a es of "Daily Meditations" for every day in the year, which will published weekly in advance. They contain a leading thought each day, so clearly and helpfully set forth that they must prove itually elevating and strengthening to all. HERE is nothing in modern literature so completely fascinating as the "Short Story" well told. Some of the iters in this line will contribute to The Christian Herald t year, and we confidently expect to surpass even the high ıdard we have set during 1912, and men and women ous in this field are among our contributors.

ENS of thousands of our readers, who laughed over the adventures of Josiah and Samantha Allen at Coney nd last year, will be delighted to know that Miss lley will contribute a series of bright sketches to our mns during the coming year, in which there will be of her quaint fun and philosophy. A Visit to the Garden of Eden

THE site of Eden is a mystery which has allured and puzzled the wisest of men for ages. Prof. Frederick Simpich, the distinguished traveler and Orientalist, while in Arabia lately, visited the traditional site which, according to the Bible, was bounded by four rivers and lay somewhere along the Euphrates. He describes with keen interest what he saw there and tells of the traditions that have been preserved by the inhabitants of that secluded part of the world.

Church Union By Dr. H. K. CARROLL, D.D.

DR. H. K. CARROLL, the most eminent Church Statistician in America, who conducted the Religious Census for our Government, has prepared a remarkable and comprehensive article on Church Union. It is an accurate and authoritative presentation of the subject which is now engaging the attention of the Protestant churches throughout the country. Dr. Carroll writes without bias and gives the situation with the arguments on either side, for and against Union, setting forth clearly and logically its advantages and the difficulties in the way and showing how the latter may ultimately be overcome.

Enlarged S.S. Page By DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

OUR Sunday School Class is admittedly the biggest of any in this country in point of numbers. This department will be enlarged during 1913 and our "Superintendents' Round Table," which has already become a popular feature, will be a weekly interchange of helpful hints and personal experiences by men and women who are practically interested in the development of Sunday School work. It is a department that no one should miss who has at heart the Gospel training of the young.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THE gentle spirit of our beloved and lamented associate, Mrs. Sangster, who was called away this year, has descended upon her namesake and relative, Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., upon whose shoulders her literary mantle seems to have fallen. Miss Sangster is a young writer of rare promise and a remarkably sweet poet. A number of her poems and short stories will appear in this paper during the coming year.

A Short Story by Irving Bacheller

THERE is no more popular American writer than Irving Bacheller, the author of Eben Holden, Keeping Up With Lizzie, and other "best sellers." He writes from personal experience and observation and always has a helpful message, which is none the less agreeable because it is often expressed with a kindly, mirth-provoking humor. Every story from his pen is a masterpiece. The Christian Herald Family will give him a cordial welcome during 1913.

Pollyanna By ELEANOR H. PORTER

THE author of "Pollyanna," the publication of which has just begun in The Christian Herald, is a charming little woman whose other stories are already well known to our readers. Mrs. Porter in "Pollyanna" describes American home life and childhood in a way that is inimitable. Every one should read the adventures of this little sprite. It is a story for grown-ups as well as for the young folks, and will make a tremendous hit. If you have not got the first chapters, send us a postal and we will gladly forward them. You cannot afford to miss a line of the adventures of "Pollyanna."

Wonderful Art Covers

THE wonderful success of our Art Covers this year is evidenced by an avalanche of letters from our readers, who delight in really fine pictures. Lots of these cover pictures are now framed in home parlors and sitting-rooms, as they deserve to be. We have an artistic surprise in store for every week of 1913, and we will print such a line of beautiful and artistic covers as will delight everybody. They are reproductions of the best in modern art.

In addition to the calendar and special information concerning dates, holidays, and facts pertaining to the year 1913 itself, it is a liberal compendium of useful knowledge on all subjects, but particularly those which have an immediate interest for CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

Progress of Religion

For instance, there is an article entitled "The Progress of Religion," which is a preface to eighteen pages of statistics and information relating to the various religious bodies or denominations in the United States—what they are, what they do and what they number. These statistics have been prepared especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC by H. K. Carroll, LL.D., who was religious statistician of the United States Census.

Another section of the ALMANAC is devoted to the government of the United States. It contains many statistics concerning the government officials, the various bureaus at Washington, the public debt of the United States, Post Office regulations, the Census, Immigration, etc.

Following this is a section devoted to comparative statistics of all States, showing their area, largest cities, population, agriculture, minerals, wealth, schools and public charities.

Other Features

"The Market Garden" is treated very fully, and so is "The Great American Hen."

A page entitled "The Liquor Traffic" shows the progress of prohibition throughout the world.

"The Realm of Woman" is full of interest for the homemaker.

"While Waiting for the Doctor" tells you what to do in case of accident before the physician arrives.

Of course there are tables of weights and measures, interest laws of the States, "Things the Farmer Should Know," "Household Hints," "Hints for the Care of Children," and "Facts Worth Remembering," concerning mountains, islands, rivers, cities, railways, etc.

Finally there are fiction stories, great thoughts of great men, pages of humorous material and jokes—jokes which can be read with innocent enjoyment in any Christian household.

The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton

ONE OF THE MOST REMARKABLE BOOKS EVER WRITTEN

Being a Truthful Record of His Experiences and Escapes During His Life Among the Cannibals of the South Seas

ACTUAL SIZE

IN 1690, Daniel Defoe, who had never been out of England, sat him down, and from the depths of his imagination evolved Robinson Crusoe, a book that will probably remain forever enshrined in the hearts of adventure-loving mankind.

In 1912, Robert Quinton, who had traveled the world over, sat him down, and, without drawing on his imagination at all, wrote a history of his experience in Crusoeland that is entitled to be placed beside the more famous book.

Not Fiction, But the Truth

We believe The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton to be one of the most remarkable books of its kind yet published. More than all, it is true. It is not a mere figment of the imagination. The things described really happened. Yet Stanley, Livingstone, and Peary, all together, had not so many escapes from death as had this unassuming sailor-man, who tells the story of his life in such convincing language as to call forth the remark from one reader that "he doesn't write like a literary man, but more like a man who has really been there."

Every page is remarkable, whether it contains the author's conclusions that the inhabitants of the South Sea Islands were originally brought there in the ships of King Solomon, or his description of some surpassingly beautiful scene, or his narrative of some adventure, the very telling of which causes the pulse to quicken. No idle romance this, and yet filled from cover to cover with the spirit and actuality of romance. From the first page, where as a boy he ships to Australia, till the last, where as a captain he is walking his own quarterdeck, there is never a dull moment.

Every Page is Thrilling

Open the book at any place, and you will find him encountering one or more of innumerable perils—in the jaws of a tiger; escaping with his comrades from a shower of poisoned arrows; in the midst of a battle with cannibals; racing through the tropical night in a launch, pursued by crocodiles; watching the antics of native priests as they danced in the midst of a fiery furnace; imprisoned in the ship's cabin by a horde of monster devilfish; escaping from the jaws of a shark; watching feast dances of native tribes; visiting the ruins of ancient civilizations; spending the night in a tree with a leopard, etc., etc. Assuredly his truth is stranger than fiction possibly could be, and the soul of the South Seas is in it. On the other hand, it does not tell only of hairbreadth escapes, for there are descriptions of places in which the language is as beautiful as the places it describes.

It Is a Big Book

It is a big book, too, 496 pages and 185,000 words, enclosed in illustrated binding, and with a frontispiece portrait of the author, showing just what he looks like, this man whose life has hung in the balance so many times, and who yet has lived to tell the tale.

The Portrait Life of Lincoln

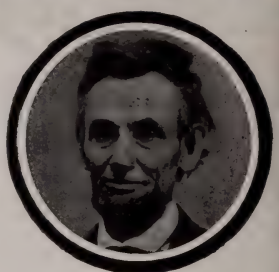
$150,000 Collection of Photographs

FIRST PORTRAIT OF LINCOLN

First portrait ever taken of Lincoln; daguerreotype when he was first entering politics at 37 years of age; the original could not be purchased for $25,000.

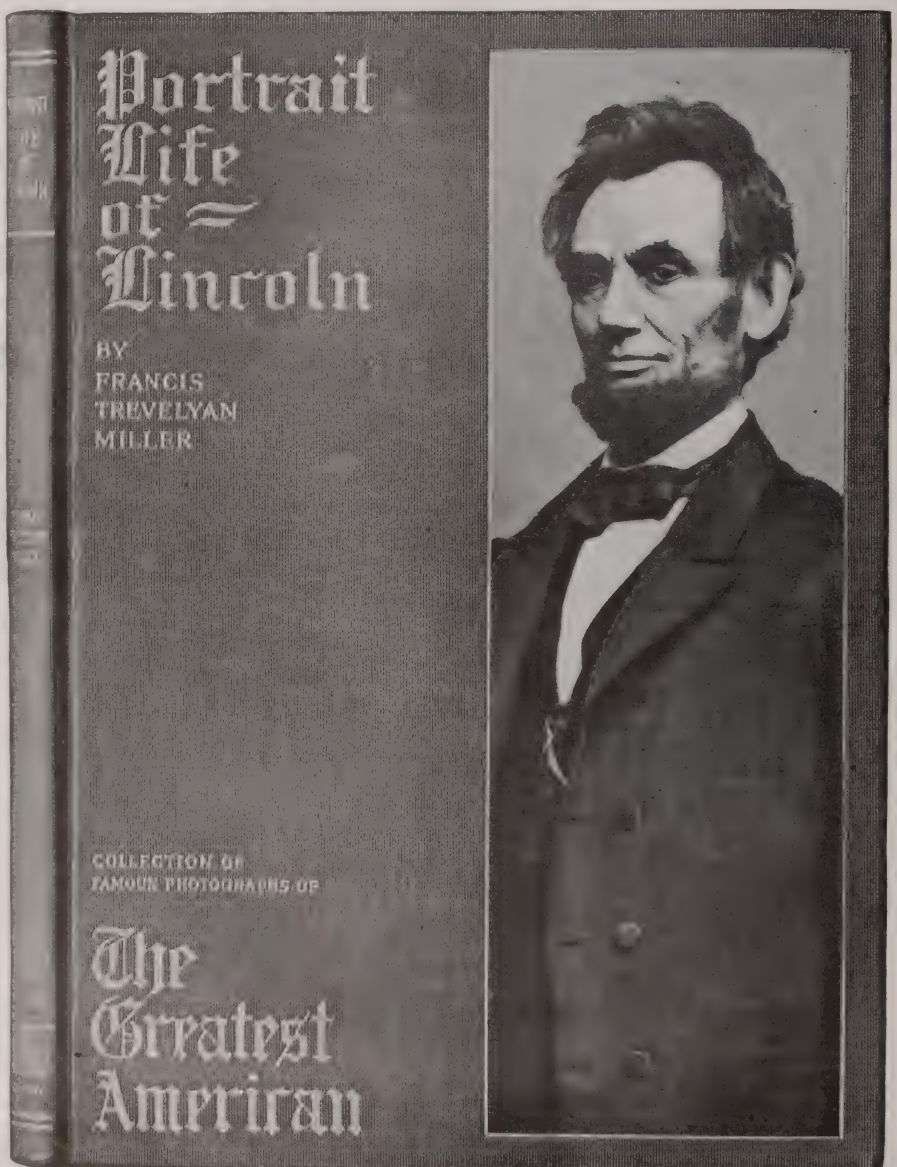
The Portrait Life of Lincoln is more than a book. It is a gallery containing every picture taken of Lincoln, the majority of which were part of the great collection of photographs made by Matthew B. Brady during the Civil War. These photographs are a revelation of historical truths. They are all of large size and many of them occupy full pages. The story of the greatest crisis in the history of the republic is told in these photographs. The originals of this collection are valued at more than $150,000.

Among the 110 treasures are the first portrait ever taken of Lincoln; photographs of Lincoln taken when his name first passed over the country during the Lincoln-Douglas debates; photographs taken while he was running for United States Senator; during the Missouri Compromise; on the battle ground of Antietam, the bloodiest day in the Civil War; last photograph of Lincoln ever taken; Secret Service photographs of the assassins of Lincoln taken on the gallows; photographs of the funeral bier and procession while Lincoln was being taken on his sixteen-hundred-mile journey to Springfield, when twenty-five million people were attending memorial services to the martyred President.



LAST PORTRAIT OF LINCOLN

Last photograph of Lincoln ever taken; a magnificent portrait of the great Lincoln standing with his arm behind him, his face sad and worn from the battles that had raged about his great heart.



Great Portrait Gallery—110 Priceless Photographs—Actual Size of Portrait Life of Lincoln

THE PORTRAIT LIFE OF LINCOLN, however, is not merely a collection of photographs. Accompanying them is a prose commentary by Dr. Francis Trevelyan Miller, which throws further light on the life of this great man. As near as possible Dr. Miller has told it in Lincoln's own words, that is, with copious quotations from his speeches and sayings, which show the foundation of Lincoln's character; the influence of love on his life; his political principles; the rugged honesty of his heart; the problems that tested his strength; the gathering of humanity under his leadership; his fortitude in the hour of trial; his faith in the common people; his humility in the hour of victory; his sympathy for the unfortunate; the veil of sorrow that spread over the nation when he was assassinated. The volume contains Lincoln's first public speech and many of those delivered throughout his life, particularly the address at Gettysburg, in magnanimity of spirit, simplicity, brevity and historical import the greatest speech in American annals. It is more than a book; it is Six Great Books in One.

FIRST—An epigrammatic philosophy on life and its opportunities, drawn from the experience and life of Lincoln.

SECOND—A new interpretation of Lincoln's example in character building.

THIRD—An appeal to the American heart and conscience to utilize the inspiration of Lincoln.

FOURTH—An entrancing narrative and complete hand-book of the main facts in Lincoln's life.

FIFTH—The greatest gallery of original photographs of Lincoln ever embraced between covers—from original collections valued at $150,000.

SIXTH—The strongest application of the principles of Lincolnism in everyday life that has ever appeared in print.

The Temptation; Jesus Rejected at Nazareth.

AND [a] Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost returned from Jordan, and [b] was led by the Spirit into the wilderness,
2 Being forty days [c] tempted of the devil. And [d] in those days he did eat nothing: and when they were ended, he afterward hungered.
3 And the devil said unto him, If thou be the Son of God, command this stone that it be made bread.
4 And Jesus answered him, saying, [e] It is written, That man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God.
5 And the devil, taking him up into a high mountain, shewed unto him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time.
6 And the devil said unto him, All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them: for [f] that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will I give it.
7 If thou therefore wilt [1] worship me, all shall be thine.
8 And Jesus answered and said unto him, Get thee behind me, Satan: [g] for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.
9 And [h] he brought him to Jerusalem, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, If thou be the Son of God, [i] cast thyself down from hence:
10 For [j] it is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee:
11 And in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.
12 And Jesus answering said unto him, [k] It is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.
13 And when the devil had ended all the temptation, he [l] departed from him [m] for a season.
14 ¶ And [n] Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into [o] Galilee: and there went out a fame of him through all the region round about.
15 And he taught in their synagogues, being [p] glorified of all.
16 ¶ And he came to [q] Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, [r] he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read.
17 And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written,
18 The [s] Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised,
19 To preach the [t] acceptable year of the Lord.
20 And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him.
21 And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears.
22 And all bare him witness, and [u] wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. And they said, [v] Is not this Joseph's son?
23 And he said unto them, Ye will surely say unto me this proverb, Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country.
24 And he said, Verily I say unto you, No prophet [w] is accepted in his own country.
25 But I tell you of a truth, many [x] widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land;
26 But unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow.
27 And [a] many lepers were

THE CHILD IN THE MIDST*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE topic assigned for our lesson, "The child in the midst," is a well-chosen point of view with which to begin our Christmas study, for when Christ came from heaven he brought Godlike childhood to the earth, and thus taught that it is possible for little children to become Godlike. Several times in his ministry upon earth he declared the nearness of the child to God: "Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven," he said (Matt. 18: 3), and emphasized his words by placing his hands on their heads, and by gathering them in his arms. We are also to learn of another time when Jesus exalted childhood. He overheard his apostles contending with each other who should be greatest in the kingdom, the kingdom of the Messiah Jesus. James and John once actually asked Jesus to give them the two greatest places in his kingdom—one on his right hand, and the other on his left (Mark 10: 35-38). One day Jesus rebuked their contentions by placing a little child in their midst, and saying: "Whosoever shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18: 4). How strange a thing that a little child should be made a pattern for strong men! He himself brought the pattern when he came on that first Christmas day and was wrapped in swaddling clothes and laid in a manger. And now "when Christmas comes the world suddenly grows better, sinless, lovely, and heaven nearer; and all because a little boy was born in Bethlehem."—Edwin Osgood Grover. But that glad day had not at all entered into the thoughts of the apostles—possibly they had little or no knowledge of the childhood of Jesus—so the child pattern was wholly a new thought to them that day when Jesus set the child in the midst. It is natural to believe that it was a very good child. Tradition says it was the child of the apostle Peter, because Jesus was at that time a guest in Peter's house in Capernaum, but the Bible does not tell us whose child it was.

That they should become as little children was strange doctrine to the apostles. They might have felt as Nicodemus did when Jesus told him that he must be born again. What did Jesus see in that little child for strong men to take as their pattern? It was the gentleness, the teachableness, the obedience, the loving confidence of the child. He wanted them to feel toward their heavenly Father just as the child felt toward its earthly father in all these ways. That was leaving out of sight all of the weaknesses of the child; its lack of understanding, its forgetfulness, its bodily weakness, etc. Jesus was teaching them that they should be childlike, not childish. "Childlikeness" includes the lovely, desirable qualities of the child, while "childishness" is the sum of the undesirable qualities.

We are not told what was the effect upon the apostles, but it was certainly not the last time that they sought preeminence one over the other (John 13: 12-16). How slow they were to learn, and so are we!

And Jesus called unto him a little child

The arms of love which Jesus placed about the little child in the midst of the apostles, and again when he blessed the little ones brought to him by their mothers, even now girdle the childhood of the world. When he said to the apostles, "Whoso shall cause one of these little ones to stumble (to their injury morally or physically) it is profitable for him that a great millstone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be sunk in the depth of the sea." Not that Jesus would have a corruptor and disturber of youth put to death, but the ignominy which would fall upon such evil persons would be a far worse punishment than death itself. And still closer Jesus drew all childhood into his embrace when he said: "See that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father who is in heaven." And so we must know that childhood is "holy ground" where unseen guardian angels minister, even the archangels of heaven, those who come so close to the throne of God that they behold his face! Who would dare wrong any child since all children are under this wonderful guardianship! We do not need to turn to the story of Old Fagin, who taught little boys to steal, for today many people are teachers in the school of evil, whose sessions are held in our streets, in our stores, in our factories, etc. A report is brought to heaven by the guardian angels concerning all of this dastardly undoing and the day of accounting will surely come. Glad are we that a department of the United States Government has recently been established called "The Children's Bureau," which stands for the righting of children's wrongs. Let the church look to it that nothing is done against a child either inside or out of it. Let the church remember that Jesus gave children a right to be members of the church when he said: "These little ones that believe on me" (Matt. 18: 6). All churches do not seem to have clear vision on this point, and while they do not put up the sign: "No children admitted," very few children, if any, are to be found in the pews, or at the altar, asking for membership. It has been said that less than sixty-five per cent. of Sunday school scholars become church members. That is appalling! They belong to the "lost sheep" tribe which Jesus spoke so tenderly about and described so sweetly the search of the Shepherd and his rejoicing when it was found. The churches would not have so many lost sheep, if they but watched over the lambs more closely, and guarded against a breach about that part of the fold that lies between the Sunday school and the church. An incident from the life of the Oriental shepherd will help us in this matter. He does not have a "wireless" to help him in his search, but he does have something that closely corresponds with it. He carries his club in his hand, and ever and anon he strikes the rocks in a way perfectly understood by the sheep. He strikes the rock and lays his ear against it, for the lost sheep will certainly bleat in reply if it has

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

Mr. R. M. Armstrong, of Brooklyn, makes the following good suggestion: "A no-Sunday school should be without a supply of means of closing the week. Parents: 'Teacher of Pass.' 2. Request the word 'Collect' to be erased and it to be memory. Make plain that the statement is the requirement of 'I pledge to the Christian Church,' pronounce it, that pledge should be known by means of a number of times and answers as to a question. 3. Explain that they are 'Preachers.' 4. Remember to every Sunday school the memory of Matthew 28: 19, 20. 5. Explain to them who wrote the Bible.

Mr. J. E. Rader, of Yuba City, tells how he can greatly increase the membership of his Sunday school at present writing: "I give every pupil who brings two visitors to school one new penny. Every visitor who brings two more gets a penny, and every pupil who brings a visitor gets a penny. I give a premium for good lessons, one penny per month for each pupil, and the visitors get pennies, too. I have a Primary Department, Intermediate, Senior, and Adult Bible Classes. Two must be here for penalties and $2.50 per quarter. All other Sunday School duties are left to me. I am the Superintendent, Secretary, Treasurer, Librarian, and Chorister. Come one, come all, and bring two more with you."

Mr. Rader writes us that he has been using the Round Table for two years, and that it has been a great help to him. He says: "I get more interest on the day that the new page appears than on any other day in the week. I do not require verses to be memorized, but I do require that the new page be studied three or more times before coming here. I keep an index card record of the new visitors. I also record each Sunday the new pupils on our side of the house and mark the number with the initials of the pupil's name, so as to know who to call back to the Home Department. I have used the method to secure pupils in my Sunday school and have increased the average of attendance to one and one-half times as much as it was before I used it. I use page 28 one week and the next page 29, page 30 one week and the next page 31, page 32 one week and the next page 33, page 34 one week and the next page 35. Then I have you begin again with Temperance and Bible Readings. I have found it most helpful."

A lady teacher in the same parish of which Mr. Rader is Superintendent writes us as follows: "I have been using the Round Table for two years, and find it very helpful. I give every pupil who brings a new visitor to the school a card on the day that the new page appears on the Round Table. Twenty-four speakers in automobiles. These are representatives of every state and used in lecturing for Baby Day by Mississippi Boulevard Presbyterian Church, Detroit. Hundreds of cards had been distributed among the people of the congregational state and "I am ready for Sunday school." That was only one of the Detroit churches that held their services on the lawns in the front yards, and wherever the pastor happened might have stopped to have the audience to Sunday school.

3 Things Make a Fountain Pen Leak

THEY are: 1st, a straight or blunt feed tube. 2nd, ink remaining in the feed tube after you stop writing. 3rd, heated air which expands and goes up.

The straight or blunt feed tube holds ink even when the pen is upright in your vest pocket.

The air in the pen gets warm from the heat of your body—98 degrees. The heat makes it expand. It expands up through the inky feed tube. It pushes ink up and out through the pen opening. It spatters and around the writing end of pen. And this spattered ink decorates your fingers when you remove the cap to write.

Just one thing keeps the Parker from leaking. It is the Lucky Curve feed tube. See X ray picture.

The curve of the Lucky Curve feed tube top has the barrel. This touch starts Capillary Attraction. The Capillary Attraction pulls the ink down out of the feed tube before the air heats and expands.

Do you see why there's never any ink smearing the writing end of a Parker Pen?

Capillary Attraction, by the way, is what makes a blotter suck ink.

Hegel I gave you a pen of hard rubber. Modern Parker Pens always write smooth. Parker "Spear Head" Ink Controller makes ink flow with ease, never blotting, never clogging.

Standard style Parker Lucky Curve Pens $2, $2.50, $3, $4, $5 and up, according to size and ornamentation.

THANKSGIVING IN THE COZY CORNER

AFTER THANKSGIVING DINNER

Table Tricks and Games

LAY a bit of mirror or ordinary glass upon the table, announcing that you can make a fresh laid egg balance on its point and stand erect upon the glass. Almost no one will believe you; but this can easily be done if beforehand, by way of preparation for the trick, you have shaken a fresh egg until the yolk is broken and mixed up with the white. The trick would be impossible if the egg were in its natural state.

Water Hanging in the Glass

ANNOUNCE that you can fill a goblet with water so that no one will be able to move it without spilling every drop of the water in it. Then fill a small glass of any kind with water; completely cover the surface and rim with a calling card or bit of glazed paper; place the palm of your hand on the paper and suddenly invert the glass on the smooth hard table. Draw out the paper, the water will forthwith remain suspended in the glass and no one can move it without spilling all the water.

A Foolish Funny Trick

TAKING a biscuit in either hand and stretching your hands far apart, announce at the same time that you can contrive to bring both biscuits into the same hand without bringing the hands near to each other. Everybody will be mystified and wonder—How? All you have to do is to lay one biscuit on the table, turn yourself around and pick it up in the other hand.

Magic Ten Cents

HAVE two dimes of your own, each waxed on one side with beeswax or paraffin. Then borrow a dime from a guest and exchange it unobserved for one of the waxed ones, laying your own waxed coin on the table with the wax side uppermost. Then in the left hand take two squares of ordinary cardboard, and while transferring them to the right hand, press the second waxed coin against the center of the undermost card, to which it will stick. Now lay the card on the table about twelve or fifteen inches from your own dime which is already there, and cover it with the second card. Lift both cards simultaneously to show that the coin is under card A, and that, apparently, nothing is under card B. You may now make the magic coin appear under whichever card you prefer. You have only to remember that if you wish the dime not to adhere to the cardboard, you have only to bend the card slightly upward as you lift it from the table. Otherwise you have only to lift it without bending the card.

THANK GOD

THANK God every morning when you get up that you have something to do that day which must be done, whether you like it or not.

Being forced to work, and forced to do your best, will breed in you temperance and self-control, diligence and strength of will, cheerfulness and content, and a hundred virtues which the idle will never know. CHARLES KINGSLEY.

Thanksgiving Candy

DISSOLVE one tablespoonful of granulated gelatine in four dessert spoonfuls of cold water. Into one heaping cupful of granulated sugar put about four dessert spoonfuls of water and heat until the sugar is dissolved. Add the gelatine, a grain of salt, and flavor to taste. When the mixture is cool enough, whip it up until it will slowly settle into a sheet. Pour into shallow buttered tins and dust thickly with confectionery sugar. Cut into squares and dust again and you will have about a pound box of delicious marshmallows.

Pollyanna

BE SURE to read the cheery, homey and altogether delightful story of Pollyanna. Every "growing-up" and grown-up girl as well, who knows Pollyanna, will want to be like her. And Pollyanna is pretty sure to be the "first love" of every boy who will spend the half hour before bed time listening to some one tell the story of one of the bravest, pluckiest, and most adorable girls that ever got into a story book.

CLEANLY CLARA

WHAT! not know our cleanly Clara?
Why, the hot folks in Sahara,
And the cold Eskimo,
Our clean Clara know!
Our cleanly Clara, the poet sings,
Cleaned a hundred thousand things!
In a single day.
She cleaned the keys of the harpsichord,
She cleaned the hilt of the family sword,
She cleaned the works of the eight-day clock,
She cleaned the spring of the secret lock.
She cleaned the Dutch tiles in the place,
She cleaned some very old-fashioned lace,
She cleaned the tent-stitch and the sampler;
She cleaned the tapestry, which was ampler,
She cleaned the drops of the chandeliers,
Until madam in mittens was moved to tears!
She cleaned the cage of the cockatoo,
The oldest bird that ever grew;
She cleaned the china, she cleaned the delf,
She cleaned the baby, she cleaned herself.
To-morrow morning she means to try,
To clean the cobwebs from the sky.
Some people say that she will rue it,
But my belief is she will do it.

A Chopper Made to Chop Meat

One difference between Choppers is just this:

The Enterprise Meat AND Food Chopper is made to chop meat AND anything else you want to chop.

The ordinary chopper is not made to cut meat, although the claim is made that "it also cuts meat."

Nine days out of ten when you use a chopper you want to chop meat, to use up scraps that could not otherwise be used for food. Therefore buy the Chopper designed to chop meat AND food—

Family Size $1.75

Large Size $2.50

The Enterprise Meat AND Food Chopper

It will take the toughest meat and by really chopping it, convert it into tender morsels, daintily to the taste and nutritious in quality. For using up left-overs and keeping down table expenses it is unequalled.

The Enterprise chops with a four-bladed steel knife. You cannot find the knife-blade principle on any other chopper. Thus we claim that it is the only chopper which actually gives a chopping cut to meat, fish, vegetables, fruit or whatever is put through the chopper.

If you want a still lower-priced machine, our standard pattern Enterprise Food Chopper will be found very satisfactory. It, too, is Enterprise quality.

TWO-TOED TURK

Jack stopped in the glare and glitter of Third Avenue and gave a pretty fair repetition of the laugh he had contributed to the occasion then. And he saw again that terror-stricken passage of their pet gobbler and heard once more his most unroyal screams as he fled from his encounter with the mowing machine under which he had left two toes of his right foot.

Henceforth he had a new gait, a new voice, and a new name. But Jack found that he couldn't indulge in too much reminiscent laughter, for it intensified the discomfort of his aching, empty stomach.

"This is a new sort of stomach-ache," he muttered with a grim smile. Many a time I've ached because I'd stowed away too much pie—and on Thanksgiving Day—!"

Then stopped short. To-morrow was Thanksgiving Day.

Out over the sidewalk stretched the transparency, "Bowery Mission." It was late and the men had filed away from the meeting. A few hung about in groups, and he heard various muttered lamentations that the Bread Line didn't start till one o'clock.

"Come now, come now, bums. Is your meeting out, or ain't it? If it is, beat it. You can't stand here."

So spoke municipal authority again, and the groups dispersed. But a brisk, somewhat tired, but extremely friendly-looking man came bustling out of the mission's side door and stood face to face with Jack before he had had time to get under motion at the policeman's orders.

"Well?" said the man.

"Well?" said Jack.

"Were you inside?" asked the man.

"No, I just got here."

The man half turned to go, but, after all, the look in Jack's face was altogether too plain to be misunderstood.

"You're hungry, youngster, ain't you?"

"I was yesterday," said Jack, with a grim attempt to smile. "To-night it ain't so bad."

"Well, take these. I've got to beat it home and get to bed. To-morrow is a busy day. Come back here in the morning early. I'll set you to work for one day at least. Good-night."

The man was gone, but in Jack's hand were two tickets, one calling for a meal at a restaurant a few numbers down the street, the other for a bed in a neighboring lodging-house. Twice more that night Jack was to have the feeling of having stepped into heaven.

Next morning found him in the mission kitchen helping the men get ready the big feast. He had never seen so much food at one time in his life. He was used to seeing wagon-loads of apples or potatoes or pumpkins, or even pigs. But this passed everything. Turkeys, potatoes, apples, celery, pyramids of bread, and chickens, and more chickens. They were piled everywhere. Some men were packing baskets to be sent out to needy families; others were preparing the great feast to be given the men of the Bowery at noon. Jack had been assigned the humble task of peeling potatoes. Already the hunger and sleeplessness of yesterday seemed like hideous dreams. Here was so much plenty, so much warmth, so much good cheer that it could not be possible that the horrors of the last days should ever return. Brain and muscles were deliciously rested; his stomach had ceased its strange protestings, had ceased from another cause now; for, what with last night's supper and the mission breakfast before work began, it was altogether satisfied. This would surely be the beginning of better things. They would keep him busy at the mission all day. Then he would doubtless get a job. Meanwhile the

A FRIEND'S ADVICE

Something Worth Listening To

A young Nebr. man was advised by a friend to eat Grape-Nuts because he was all run down from a spell of fever. He tells the story:

"Last spring I had an attack of fever that left me in a very weak condition. I had to quit work; had no appetite, was nervous and discouraged.

"A friend advised me to eat Grape-Nuts, but I paid no attention to him and kept getting worse as time went by.

"I took many kinds of medicine but none of them seemed to help me. My system was completely run down, my blood got out of order from want of proper food, and several very large boils broke out on my neck. I was so weak I could hardly walk.

"One day mother ordered some Grape-Nuts and induced me to eat some. I felt better and that night rested fine. As I continued to use the food every day, I grew stronger steadily and now have regained my former good health. I would not be without Grape-Nuts as I believe it is the most health-giving food in the world." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

TWO-TOED TURK

fifty-eight. He'll lend me enough to get a ticket."

"Here's your three cents. I'd give you the rest, too, but I'm just about busted. These fellows have me nearly cleaned out. However, if there's any uncertainty about your friend—"

"No, he'll be on."

The man held out his hand. "Here's a quarter. You're right. There's no place quite like the farm."

"No," said Jack, glancing at Two-toed Turk.

"And remember, too, youngster, what this place stands for. You ain't bad. But you haven't quite got on the right foundation yet. Promise me you'll go to church next Sunday, will you?"

"Yes," said Jack, taking the man's hand.

"And next time when your mother asks you to hook up and take her to prayer-meeting, you'll do it?"

"Yes," said Jack.

"One thing more before I let go your fist," said the man. "Show the stuff you're made of by not acting sheepish about this licking. Tell them you got licked. Say that the city is a tough proposition, particularly in November—"

Jack looked again at Two-toed Turk.

"Tell 'em you've come back to be a farmer not because you like it, but because the other jobs are hard to get. And by the way, when you come back to get your watch and vest, drop in to see me. I'd like to know how you're getting along."

Jack opened his mouth to speak, but his friend had gone. He was being called in many directions. The boy put up his hand and shook the maimed fingers of Two-toed Turk.

"Good-by, old sport. I'm sorry to leave you here. But you'll make some other folks happy yet to-day besides mother and dad and me."

"Marthy, can't I help ye?"

"No, Joel, everything's about ready. Still, if you don't mind, you can mash the potatoes. My back's tired from stooping down at this oven."

"Give 'em here, then. That's a job you can set down to. I'll take this apron to put over my knees. Now then!"

The potato-masher moved steadily a while. Then it stopped. Martha looked up from her place at the sink.

"This horse-radish is powerful strong, Joel," she said, laying down the grater.

"Well, I can't say that these potatoes is strong, Marthy, but I can't keep the tears out of my eyes nohow. I ain't got no appetite, Marthy. What on airth did you cook up such a big feast for? I know ye hain't got no heart to eat it, no more than I have."

"I thought 'twould be the best way, Joel, just to kind of go right on—and—and I wanted to keep you perked up, if I could—but—but—it's—it's—O Joel, I just can't stand it, I can't."

She came toward him with outstretched hands, tears raining down her cheeks. At that moment Jack opened the door.

"What in the world did you want to go and kill Two-toed Turk for, father?"

They both stood looking in open-mouthed amazement at him and at his words before they ran forward to smother him in embraces and kisses.

Joel spoke first. "What's this about Two-toed Turk? Who said I killed him?"

"I saw him all ready to be stuffed and cooked in New York this morning."

"No, you didn't. Turk must have had a double. Look at here."

His father opened the kitchen door. Leaving the commonplace habitués of the barnyard, Two-toed Turk was walking gravely, if not gracefully, toward them.

"I seen him through the winder over your shoulder just as he started," explained dad.

"Oh, we had mince pie and—and some other things," replied Willie when asked what he had for dinner. And that's about the only way you can describe a dinner that includes mince pie.

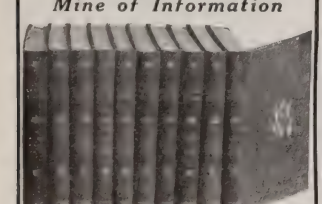
A Foundation for the Home Library and a Gold Mine of Information



You Pay Nothing Until January

The need of a standard history for the home has long existed—a history that would tell, with absorbing interest, the story of the discovery, marvelous growth and development of our country—one that would instruct the student in the underlying principles of our government—the reasons for our greatness—one that would inculcate the proper notions of patriotism and love in its younger readers, as well as hold the interest and meet the requirements of the scholar and man of business. And this need is met in

"The United States"

"A History wherein the Victories of Peace are glorified above the Victories of War."

Edited by Edgar Wiley, M.A., Ph.D., and Irene E. Rines, assisted by many well known American historians Bound in Ten Volumes One Additional Volume Without Extra Charge. Complete Cross-Reference Index with Every Set of Books Purchased.

Next to the narrative the most important part of an historical reference work is the index. The editorial arrangement of "The United States" renders it entirely an encyclopedia of information on United States history. Thus a real story of any phase of our history may be made with the positive assurance that every item in the book is under that particular heading. It is a history for the busy man who desires information on a given topic, necessary for the scholar who requires an exhaustive source of information, and for the young pupil whose needs are met with a good outline, giving all the facts in order and in language

Pollyanna paused for breath, and Nancy managed to stammer:

"Well, I'm sure it—it'll be all right."

"I'm glad you feel that way. I do, too," nodded Pollyanna, again with that choking little breath. "Of course, 'twould have been a good deal harder to be glad in black—"

"Glad!" gasped Nancy, surprised into an interruption.

"Yes—that he's gone to heaven to be with mother and the rest of us, you know. He said I must be glad. But it's been pretty hard to—to do it, even in red gingham, because I—I wanted him, so; and I couldn't help feeling I ought to have him, specially as mother and the rest have God and all the angels, while I didn't have anybody but the Ladies' Aid. But now I'm sure it'll be easier because I've got you, Aunt Polly. I'm glad I've got you!"

Nancy's aching sympathy for the poor little forlornness beside her turned suddenly into shocked terror.

"Oh, but—but you've made an awful mistake, d-dear," she faltered. "I'm only Nancy. I ain't your Aunt Polly, at all!"

"You—you aren't?" stammered the little girl, in plain dismay.

"No. I'm only Nancy. I never thought of your takin' me for her. We—we ain't a bit alike—we ain't, we ain't!"

Timothy chuckled softly; but Nancy was too disturbed to answer the merry flash from his eyes.

"But who are you?" questioned Pollyanna. "You don't look a bit like a Ladies' Aider!"

Timothy laughed outright this time.

"I'm Nancy, the hired girl. I do all the work except the washin' an' ironin'. Mis' Durgin does that."

"But there is an Aunt Polly?" demanded the child, anxiously.

"You bet your life there is," cut in Timothy.

Pollyanna relaxed visibly.

"Oh, that's all right, then." There was a moment's silence, then she went on brightly: "And do you know, I'm glad, after all, that she didn't come to meet me; because now I've got her still coming, and I've got you besides."

Nancy flushed. Timothy turned to her with a quizzical smile.

"I call that a pretty slick compliment," he said. "Why don't you thank the little lady?"

"I—I was thinking about—Miss Polly," faltered Nancy.

Pollyanna sighed contentedly.

"I was, too. I'm so interested in her. You know she's all the aunt I've got, and I didn't know I had her for ever so long. Then father told me. He said she lived in a lovely great big house 'way on top of a hill."

"She does. You can see it now," said Nancy. "It's that big white one with the green blinds, 'way ahead."

"Oh, how pretty!—and what a lot of trees and grass all around it! I never saw such a lot of green grass, seems so, all at once. Is my Aunt Polly rich, Nancy?"

"Yes, Miss."

"I'm so glad! It must be perfectly lovely to have lots of money. I never knew any one that did have, only the Whites—they're some rich. They have carpets in every room and ice cream Sundays. Does Aunt Polly have ice cream Sundays?"

Nancy shook her head. Her lips twitched. She threw a merry look into Timothy's eyes.

"No, Miss. Your aunt don't like ice cream, I guess, leastways I never saw it on her table."

Pollyanna's face fell.

"Oh, doesn't she? I'm so sorry! I don't see how she can help liking ice cream. But—anyhow, I can be kinder glad about that, 'cause the ice cream you don't eat can't make your stomach ache like Mrs. White's did—I ate hers, you know, lots of it. Maybe Aunt Polly has got the carpets, though."

"Yes, she's got the carpets."

"In every room?"

"Well, in almost every room," answered Nancy, frowning suddenly at the thought of that bare little attic room, where there was no carpet.

"Oh, I'm so glad," exulted Pollyanna. "I love carpets. We didn't have any, only two little rugs that came in a missionary barrel—and one of them had ink spots on it. Mrs. White had pictures, too, perfectly beautiful ones of roses and little girls kneeling and a kitty and some lambs and a lion—not together, you know, the lambs and the lion. Oh, of course the Bible says they will some time, but they haven't yet—that is, I mean Mrs. White's haven't. Don't you just love pictures?"

"I—I don't know," answered Nancy in a half-stifled voice.

"I do. We didn't have any pictures. They don't come in barrels, much, you know. There did two come once, though. But one was so good father sold it to get money to buy me some shoes with; and the other was so bad it fell to pieces just as soon as we hung it up. Glass—it broke, you know. And I cried. But I'm glad now we didn't have any of those nice things, 'cause I shall like Aunt Polly's all the better—not being used to 'em, you see. Just as it is when the pretty hair-ribbons come in in the barrels after a lot of faded-out brown ones. My! but isn't this a perfectly beautiful house?" she broke off fervently, as they turned into the wide driveway.

It was when Timothy was unloading the trunk that Nancy found an opportunity to mutter low in his ear:

"Don't you never say nothin' ter me again about leavin', Timothy Durgin. You couldn't hire me ter leave!"

"Leave! I should say not," grinned the youth. "You couldn't drag me away. It'll be more fun here now, with that kid here, than movin' picture shows every day!"

"Fun! fun!" repeated Nancy, indignantly. "I guess it'll be somethin' more than fun for that blessed child—when them two tries ter live tergether; and I guess she'll be a-needin' some rock ter fly to for refuge. Well, I'm a-goin' ter be that rock, Timothy; I am, I am!" she vowed, as she turned and led Pollyanna up the broad steps.

CHAPTER IV

The Little Attic Room

MISS POLLY RICHARDSON did not rise to meet her niece. She looked up from her book, it is true, as Nancy and the little girl appeared in the sitting-room doorway, and she held out a hand with "duty" written large on every coldly extended finger.

"How do you do, Pollyanna? I—" She had no chance to say more. Pollyanna had fairly flown across the room and flung herself into her aunt's scandalized, unyielding lap.

"Oh, Aunt Polly, Aunt Polly, I don't know how to be glad enough that you let me come to live with you," she was sobbing. "You don't know how perfectly lovely it is to have you and Nancy and all this after you've had just the Ladies' Aid!"

"Very likely—though I've not had the pleasure of the Ladies' Aid's acquaintance," rejoined Miss Polly, stiffly, trying to unclasp the small clinging fingers, and turning frowning eyes on Nancy in the doorway. "Nancy, that will do. You may go. Pollyanna, be good enough, please, to stand erect in a proper manner. I don't know yet what you look like."

Pollyanna drew back at once, laughing a little hysterically.

"No, I suppose you don't; but you see I'm not very much to look at, anyway, on account of the freckles. Oh, and I ought to explain about the red gingham and the black velvet basque with white spots on the elbows. I told Nancy how father said—"

"Yes; well, never mind now wha your father said," interrupted Mis Polly, crisply. "You had a trunk, presume?"

"Oh, yes, indeed, Aunt Polly. I'v got a beautiful trunk that the Ladie Aid gave me. I haven't got so ver much in it—of my own, I mean. Th barrels haven't had many clothes fo little girls in them lately; but ther were all father's books, and Mr White said she thought I ought to hav those. You see, father—"

"Pollyanna," interrupted her aun again, sharply, "there is one thin that might just as well be understoo right away at once; and that is, I d not care to have you keep talking c your father to me."

Pollyanna drew in her breath trem ulously.

"Why, Aunt Polly, you—yo mean—" She hesitated, and her aun filled the pause.

"We will go upstairs to your roon Your trunk is already there, I pre sume. I told Timothy to take it up—if you had one. You may follow me Pollyanna."

Without speaking, the little gi turned and followed her aunt from th room. Her eyes were brimming wit tears, but her chin was bravely high

"After all, I—I reckon I'm glad sh doesn't want me to talk about father Pollyanna was thinking. "It'll b easier, maybe—if I don't talk abou him. Probably, anyhow, that is wh she told me not to talk about him. And Pollyanna, convinced anew of he aunt's "kindness," blinked off the tear and looked eagerly about her.

She was on the stairway now. Jus ahead, her aunt's black silk skir rustled luxuriously. Behind her a open door allowed a glimpse of rose strewn rugs and satin-covered chair Beneath her feet a soft carpet was lik moss to the tread. On all sides the gi of picture frames and the glint of sun light through the filmy mesh of lac curtains flashed in her eyes.

"Oh, Aunt Polly, Aunt Polly, breathed the little girl, rapturously "what a perfectly lovely, lovely house How awfully glad you must be you'r so rich!"

"Pollyanna!" ejaculated her aun turning sharply about as she reache the head of the stairs. "I'm surprise at you—making a speech like that t me!"

"Why, Aunt Polly, aren't you? queried Pollyanna, in frank wonder.

"Certainly not, Pollyanna. I hope could not so far forget myself as to-b sinfully proud of any gift the Lord ha seen fit to bestow upon me," declare the lady, sternly: "certainly no riches!"

Miss Polly turned and walked dow the hall toward the attic stairwa door. She was glad, now, that she ha put the child in the attic room. He idea at first had been to get her nie as far as possible away from herself and at the same time place her wher her childish heedlessness would not de stroy valuable furnishings. Now with this evident strain of vanit showing thus early—it was all th more fortunate that the room planne for her was plain and sensible, though Miss Polly.

Eagerly Pollyanna's small feet pa tered behind her aunt. Still mor eagerly her big blue eyes tried to loo in all directions at once, that no thin of beauty or interest in this wonderfu house might be passed unseen. Mo eagerly of all her mind turned to th wondrously exciting problem about t be solved: behind which of all thes fascinating doors was waiting now he room—the dear, beautiful room, fu of curtains, rugs, and pictures, tha was to be her very own? Then abruptly, her aunt opened a door an ascended another stairway.

There was little to be seen here. bare wall rose on either side. At th top of the stairs, wide reaches of shadowy space led to far corners where were stacked innumerable trunks and boxes. It was hot and stifling, too. Unconsciously Pollyanna lifted her head higher—it seemed so hard to breathe. Then she saw that her aunt had thrown open a door at the right.

"There, Pollyanna, here is your room, and your trunk is here, I see. Have you your key?"

Pollyanna nodded dumbly. Her eyes were a little wide and frightened.

Her aunt frowned.

"When I ask a question, Pollyanna, I prefer that you should answer aloud—not merely with your head."

"Yes, Aunt Polly."

"Thank you; that is better. I believe you have everything that you need here," she added, glancing at the well-filled towel rack and water pitcher. "I will send Nancy up to help you unpack. Supper is at six o'clock," she finished as she left the room and swept down stairs.

For a moment after she had gone Pollyanna stood quite still, looking after her. Then she turned her wide eyes to the bare walls, the bare floor, the bare windows. She turned them last to the little trunk that had stood not so long before in her own little room in the far-away Western home. The next moment she stumbled blindly toward it and fell on her knees at its side, covering her face with her hands.

Nancy found her there when she came up a few minutes later.

"There, there, you poor lamb," she crooned, dropping to the floor and drawing the little girl into her arms, "I was jest a-fearin' this."

"But I'm bad and wicked, Nancy—awful wicked," she sobbed. "I just can't make myself understand that God and the angels needed my father more than I did."

"No more they did, neither," declared Nancy, stoutly.

"Oh-h!—Nancy!" The burning horror in Pollyanna's eyes dried the tears.

"There, there, child, I didn't mean it, of course," she cried briskly. "Come, let's have your key and we'll get inside this trunk and take out your dresses in no time, no time."

Somewhat tearfully Pollyanna produced the key.

"There aren't very many there, anyway," she faltered.

"Then they're all the sooner unpacked," declared Nancy.

Pollyanna gave a sudden radiant smile.

"That's so! I can be glad of that; can't I?" she cried.

Nancy stared.

"Why, of—course," she answered a little uncertainly.

Nancy's capable hands made short work of unpacking the books, the patched undergarments, and the few pitifully unattractive little dresses. Pollyanna, smiling bravely now, flew about, hanging the dresses in the closet, and putting away the undergarments in the bureau drawers.

"I'm sure it—it's going to be a very nice room; don't you think so?" she stammered, after a while.

There was no answer. Nancy was very busy, apparently, with her head in the trunk. Pollyanna, standing at the bureau, gazed a little wistfully at the bare wall above.

"And I can be glad there isn't any looking-glass here, too, 'cause where there isn't any glass I can't see my freckles."

Nancy made a sudden queer little sound with her mouth—but when Pollyanna turned, her head was in the trunk again. At one of the windows, a few minutes later, Pollyanna gave a glad cry and clapped her hands joyously.

"Oh, Nancy, Nancy, I hadn't seen this before," she breathed. "Look—'way off there, with those trees and the houses and that lovely church spire, and the river shining just like silver. Why, Nancy, there doesn't anybody need any pictures with that to look at. Oh, I'm so glad she let me have this room!"

To Pollyanna's surprise and dismay, Nancy burst into tears. Pollyanna hurriedly crossed to her side.

"Why, Nancy, Nancy—what is it?" she cried; then, fearfully: "This wasn't—your room, was it?"

"My room!" stormed Nancy hotly, choking back the tears. "If you ain't a little angel straight from heaven, and if some folks don't eat dirt before—oh, land! there's her bell!" After which amazing speech, Nancy sprang to her feet, dashed out of the room, and went clattering down the stairs.

Left alone, Pollyanna went back to her "picture," as she mentally designated the beautiful view from the window. After a time she touched the sash tentatively. It seemed as if no longer could she endure the stifling heat. To her joy the sash moved under her fingers. The next moment the window was wide open, and Pollyanna was leaning far out, drinking in the fresh, sweet air.

She ran then to the other window. That, too, flew open under her eager fingers. A big fly swept past her nose, and buzzed noisily about the room. Then another came, and another; but Pollyanna paid no heed. Pollyanna had made a wonderful discovery—against this window a huge tree flung great branches.

Suddenly she laughed aloud.

"I believe I can do it," she chuckled. The next moment she had climbed nimbly to the window ledge. From there it was an easy matter to step to the nearest tree-branch. Then, climbing like a monkey, she swung herself from limb to limb until the lowest branch was reached. The drop to the ground was—even for Pollyanna, who was used to climbing trees—a little fearsome. She took it, however, with bated breath, swinging from her strong little arms, and landing on all fours in the soft grass. Then she picked herself up and looked eagerly about her.

She was at the back of the house. Before her lay a garden in which a bent old man was working. Beyond the garden a little path through an open field led up a steep hill, at the top of which a lone pine tree stood on guard beside a huge rock. To Pollyanna, at the moment, there seemed to be just one place in the world worth being in—the top of that big rock.

With a run and a skilful turn, Pollyanna skipped by the bent old man, threaded her way between the orderly rows of green growing things, and—a little out of breath—reached the path that ran through the open field. Then, determinedly, she began to climb. Already, however, she was thinking what a long, long way off that rock must be—when back at the window it had looked so near!

Fifteen minutes later the great clock in the hallway of the Harrington homestead struck six. At precisely the last stroke Nancy sounded the bell for supper.

One, two, three minutes passed. Miss Polly frowned and tapped the floor with her slipper. A little jerkily she rose to her feet, went into the hall, and looked upstairs, plainly impatient. For a minute she listened intently; then she turned and swept into the dining-room.

"Nancy," she said with decision, as soon as the little serving maid appeared, "my niece is late. No, you need not call her," she added severely, as Nancy made a move toward the hall door. "I told her what time supper was, and now she will have to suffer the consequences. She may as well begin at once to learn to be punctual. When she comes down she may have bread and milk in the kitchen."

"Yes, ma'am." It was well, perhaps, that Miss Polly did not happen to look at Nancy's face just then.

Describes 200 Good Things to Eat at Close to One-Half Usual Prices

A million families will each now save $50 to $150 per year on what they eat. And they will live as well or better than before! All because of a wonderful book, now ready for mailing, which describes and in many cases pictures some 200 groceries of best quality at lower than wholesale prices, and over 500 other household supplies at actual factory prices.

Our groceries are sold to you at the prices your grocer pays his wholesaler. Many of them are sold to you for less—because we handle them in larger quantities than most wholesalers and consequently can buy closer and offer them at smaller margin of profit. Our other household supplies (there are fully 500 of them) are sold to you at the actual factory prices, which are just about half the usual store prices.

No wife or husband who cares to save will lose a moment in getting this Cut Price Book. It is not mailed broadcast, but it is free to the head of any family that asks for it.

Our Prices Do Their Own Talking

The prices quoted in this daring book speak for themselves. They reveal at a moment's glance a sheer fall of 15 to 50 per cent below usual prices.

To prove that there's no lessening of quality, we permit one-half of any package to be used as a test, wholly at our risk. If you think the goods are not All quality, return what's left and we will refund all your money, freight cost and everything.

We further guarantee prompt, safe delivery and a plan which makes freight charges amount to practically nothing, no matter where you live.

Remember, this guarantee is given by Larkin Co., manufacturers of established national reputation. In business 37 years. Over 2,000,000 customers.

Why Can We Cut Prices

Why can we? Because we sell direct to you, the consumer, and save you the retailers' profits and expenses. Because we, ourselves, manufacture most of the articles we offer, or handle them in such immense quantities that their cost is reduced to rock-bottom. Because we are dependent for our profit on the number of orders we receive, not on the size of each, and therefore are content with the smallest margin of profit possible on each individual order.

With our tremendous buying power—created by our two million and more customers—few if any can obtain such advantageous prices on raw materials as we. And you are the ones to profit—you are the ones who get the benefit of our unrivalled, low factory and near-factory prices.

POLLYANNA

At the earliest possible moment Nancy crept up the back stairs and thence to the attic room.

"Bread and milk, indeed—and when the poor lamb hain't only cried herself ter sleep," she was muttering fiercely, as she softly pushed open the door. The next moment she gave a frightened cry. "Where are you? Where've you gone? Where have you gone?" she panted, looking in the closet, under the bed, and even in the trunk and down the water pitcher. Then she flew downstairs and out to Old Tom in the garden.

"Mr. Tom, Mr. Tom, that blessed child's gone!" she wailed. "She's vanished right up into heaven where she came from, poor lamb—and me told ter give her bread an' milk in the kitchen—her what's eatin' angel food this minute, I'll warrant!"

The old man straightened up.

"Gone? Heaven?" he repeated stupidly, unconsciously sweeping the brilliant sunset sky with his gaze. He stopped, stared a moment intently, then turned with a slow grin. "Well, Nancy, it do look like as if she'd tried ter get as nigh heaven as she could, and that's a fact," he agreed, pointing with a crooked finger to where, sharply outlined against the reddening sky, a slender, wind-blown figure was poised on top of a huge rock.

"Well, she ain't goin' ter heaven that way ter-night; not if I have my say," declared Nancy, doggedly. "If the mistress asks, tell her I ain't furgettin' the dishes, but I gone on a stroll," she flung back over her shoulder, as she sped toward the path that led through the open field.

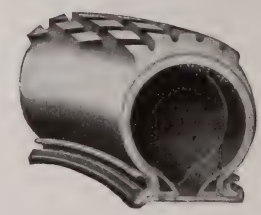
No-Rim-Cut Tires 10% Oversize



Note This Winter Tread

Perhaps you know, as we do, the usual shortcomings. Our experts spent three years in getting around them.

The usual projections are too short-lived. So we made a thick, extra tread of very tough rubber and vulcanized it onto the regular. That means a double-thick tread.

Thus the blocks are deep-cut and immensely enduring. They last for thousands of miles.

The usual non-skid will skid sometimes. Its grasp is inefficient.

We present to the road surface countless edges and angles. In every direction, under every condition, they hold with a bulldog grip.

The usual projections carry the strain to only a part of the tire surface. Thus the fabric is easily wrecked.

These blocks of ours widen out at the base. They distribute the strain exactly the same as with smooth-tread tires.

200,000 of these treads in use prove that nothing has ever solved the skidding problem like this Goodyear Non-Skid. You can see at a glance that we've done it.

230,000 Cars Last Year

Last year's output of Goodyear tires was enough to equip 230,000 cars.

The best other tire made has never approached this wondrous popularity.

Yet the demand is doubling over and over, faster than we can build factories

For we ended rim-cutting with our patent No-Rim-Cut tires and we added one-fourth to the average tire mileage by making them 10 per cent oversize.

Men are now coming to this type of tire in a way that is breaking all records of Tiredom. For your own sake, make a comparison.

THE PEOPLE'S VOICE ON ROME

FURTHER OPINIONS OF CORRESPONDENTS AND NEWSPAPERS ON THE PLAN TO "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC

THE Episcopalian Diocesan Convention, held at Mount St. Alban, near Washington, D. C., recently, took up the question of the political aggressions of the Roman Catholic Church, and a series of resolutions were presented by Rev. Dr. Randolph McKim, rector of the Church of the Epiphany. The resolutions set forth that a demand is now being made by the Roman Catholic Church to enforce in the United States the Ne Temere decree of the Pope, and in this connection it was declared:

"We enter our indignant protests against this attack of a foreign potentate upon the validity of the laws of the United States."

At the conclusion of the reading of the resolutions, Dr. McKim said:

"The Roman Church is endeavoring to work itself into the government of the United States, somehow. It is not proper that the head of the Catholic Church should attempt to override our civil laws with some canon laws of old Europe. The civil law is supreme. Church laws can in no consistent way interfere with their working. To allow it is one step backward."

Rear Admiral Selfridge declared that if he had been writing the resolutions, he would have suggested that in the future at all public occasions the Vice-President, judges of the Supreme Court and Senators should take precedence over a cardinal.

Spain and the Vatican

THE Spanish premier, Señor Canalejas (since assassinated), recently gave an interview to the representative of the Indépendance Belge, in which he touched upon the present relations of Spain with the Vatican. When asked whether he intended to resume diplomatic relations with the Curia by standing a minister to the Holy See, the premier replied: "The attitude of the Spanish bishops who sent me a letter of protest in regard to the projected law submitted by me for parliamentary approval gives me little encouragement in the matter you mention. The clergy, in fact, are maintaining an impossible claim. They take the position that before my proposed law was presented to the Cortes, I should have come to an understanding with the Vatican. According to their view, in order to secure the passage of a law in Spain, one must take four factors into account—the Pope, the House of Deputies, the Senate and the King; but the Constitution only mentions the three last. Therefore, without underestimating the great moral force which the church represents, a force which the statesman ought not to neglect to consider, I could not negotiate as a condition of such action with the Vatican. For the time being, therefore, a simple chargé d'affaires represents Spain at the Holy See. I am not anticipating any near change in the present situation."—From the Churchman, October 5, 1912.

Catholic Stage Censorship

IT IS announced in the daily press that the Pope has approved and Cardinal Farley has endorsed a plan to organize a National Catholic Theater movement in this country, its ostensible purpose being the eradication of the immoral drama from the American stage. Plays that are approved by a Board of Censors in New York will be repeated in other cities, and plays which the censors condemn will have trouble to find audiences elsewhere. A number of cardinals, archbishops and bishops have decided to support the project and a theater will be opened under Catholic supervision. There are immense possibilities for advancing the interests of the Catholic Church through the use of the stage and these, of course, will be attended to. With its new system of stage censorship and its far-reaching Publicity Bureau, the Roman Catholic Church is showing a lively and wide-awake appreciation of the advantages of printer's ink. Through the Publicity Bureau, which is now in full operation throughout the country, the American people are being gradually familiarized with the grandeur of the rites and ceremonials of the Roman Church and if it succeeds to any appreciable extent in controlling the stage, it will have another vehicle of immense value for the education of the people in Catholic forms and ideals. The latest scheme is worthy of the brain of an up-to-date press agent.

The Bible Protestantism's Best Weapon

I AM greatly interested in the discussion in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about the Roman Catholic Church. For ten years I collected money and distributed Scriptures for the American Bible Society, and during that time learned a great deal about the Catholics. I learned that the devout Catholic is, first of all, loyal to his church, or, as one expressed himself to me, "We must do what those fellows across the sea tell us" (meaning the authorities at Rome). I learned also that the old claim, "Once a Catholic, always a Catholic," is false. Through reading, personal observation and study of the situation, I became convinced that if we cannot chop off the head of this "Apocalyptic Beast," we can begin at the tail and chop off piece by piece until there will be no body left for the head to control.

Let me tell you what I mean. God's Word is now doing among the Roman Catholics of this country what no political party nor power can do. This fact is evidenced by the work which the American Bible Society has been doing among the immigrants and the foreign populations in our midst, which are largely Catholic. The past year the Bible Society's colporteur force in the United States attained the number of 376. Probably one-half of these were once Catholics, or freethinkers, and many of them priests. Their conversion usually was brought about by a Bible or Testament falling into their hands. The colporteur force includes representatives of nearly every nationality of Europe, and each one speaks from two to five languages. One, a converted Polish Catholic priest, speaks six languages. Through their efforts many Catholics are converted and even missions are started, so that today many of the Protestant churches are conducting missions among Italians, Poles, Bohemians, and other European nationalities which were started by the colporteurs of the American Bible Society.

There is power in the Word. Think of a man who belonged to the "Black Hand Society" being converted by reading an Italian Gospel of John left in his home by the colporteur! Think of four Bohemians who were freethinkers being converted by the Bibles placed in their hands by the colporteur! Think of a Catholic down along the Gulf Coast inviting a colporteur to hold a meeting in his house, so that he and his neighbors might hear the pure Gospel, and a number of conversions resulting. Eugene de Lucca, a converted Italian Catholic in the employ of the Bible Society, has started six or eight missions among his Italian countrymen, which are now being conducted by various denominations. So the work goes on.

Perhaps two-thirds of all the immigrants who land upon our shores come from Roman Catholic Europe. Rightfully, the Catholic Church in America counts on them to swell her numbers.

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT will mark the rounding out of his half-century as a minister by one of the most notable series of personal articles that he has written, under the title of

MY 50 YEARS AS A MINISTER to be published in successive issues of The Ladies' Home Journal, beginning with its next, the January number.

Doctor Abbott will, in these articles, endeavor to suggest answers to the five most vital and throbbing questions which confront the church and the minister today.

Beginning with his boyhood, when, as he says, going to church was to him, while not a hardship, "certainly not an enjoyment," he tells, in a delightfully intimate and personal way, the two ministers who most influenced him; what led him to turn from the law to the pulpit; his varied experience as a minister; the churches in which he has preached; the folks he has found in church.

Out of this wonderfully ripe experience he tells what his half-century in the pulpit has taught him about some problems of the church and the people; wherein the church fails to reach the people and wherein the people fail to understand the church; what a church has a right to expect of its minister; what makes a great minister; what is the place of the minister's wife and what he believes will be the church of the future.

In the first article Doctor Abbott answers, as it has never before been answered, the question, "Why Should I Go To Church?" This will begin the series

No wonder the hierarchy is dumbfounded at the revelation made by the census takers, when they reported being able to find but twelve millions who would confess to being Catholics. Remember, this includes infants as well as adults. Do not blame them for asking for a recount. But where are the missing ones? Let me call your attention to two facts. First, multitudes, glad to escape European priestly tyranny, vow eternal separation from the Roman Church as soon as they plant their feet upon free American soil. Second, multitudes more receive from the colporteur the first copy of the Scriptures they ever handled. The reading of the Bible in their native tongue brings to their hungry souls food that was never furnished by the mother church. The result is hundreds are converted. A converted Catholic once told me that he had been the means of the conversion of twenty-three of his Catholic relatives. I asked: "How do you do it?" He replied: "I first give them a New Testament." Is it any wonder that the Catholic priesthood is driving the Bible out of our public schools?

And so to me it is quite evident that the proud boast that "America will be Catholic" will end soon in a sad wail if united Protestantism will sow America with Bibles.

Mt. Morris, Ill. J. H. HANSTINE.

An Incendiary Who Needs a Straitjacket

THE increasing tide of distrust of the Church of Rome and its pretensions is entirely due to the rank things some of the people and leaders of that church are constantly saying. That church ought not to be surprised if Protestants take some of these things seriously. There is no reason why they should not. We do not rejoice in any hostility to this church, but it should see to it that some of its priests use more moderate speech. Here is Father Phelan, saying in the Western Watchman: "We would like to rack and quarter Protestantism, we would like to impale it and hang it up for crows to build nests of; we would like to tear it with pincers and pierce it with red-hot irons; we would like to fill it with molten lead and plunge it into hell fire a hundred fathoms deep." This priest is not only militant, he is ferocious. He should be curbed in, otherwise he might create a disturbance.—Lutheran Church Work.

G. H. BRINKLER, Food Expert

A thin man, after being out of work nearly a year through weakness, was restored in three weeks to hard work as a carpenter at full pay. In such cases the change from a clogging, death-producing diet to energizing foods caused a literal transformation.

Another patient, deaf in the right ear, owing to a discharge caused by an excess of mucus-making foods (cream, butter, cheese, etc.), was completely cured of deafness and catarrh by taking correct combinations of suitable foods.

A case of kidney and bladder trouble of ten years' standing was saved from a surgical operation, and the objectionable discharge cured within ten days, because the loss of control was due entirely to the constant irritation from certain irritating foods and drinks.

FREE: Four Booklets Which Have Taught Many People to Cure Themselves

One clever young university student writes from Lincoln, Nebr.:

"I have confidence in the system. It has relieved an unhealthy skin and mental inertia through the valuable suggestions and hints in your four booklets. There is a mine of practical knowledge in them, enough to convince a skeptic, were he to stick to the rules faithfully, and give it a trial.

"I have already gained more brain and nerve force—more efficiency without enforced exercise.

"Your little books eliminated chronic catarrh from my system in about three weeks. To put it weakly, I was astonished. I have note that butter, eggs and rich cream caused the trouble. I thank you for your knowledge, and hope to learn more of your system in the future."

Different Classes of Foods Cause Different Diseases

I have produced in myself at will from time to time such complaints as rheumatism, catarrh, fevers, kidney trouble, blackheads, sores, dandruff, etc., by eating different classes of foods to excess, proving that the waste from each class of foods produces an entirely different disease. For instance, eggs, cream, butter, cheese, milk and salt are mucus-making foods which produce catarrh. Starch and eggs (paste-making foods) in wrong combinations congest and produce headache, dullness, brain fag, etc., while lean meats, green vegetables and fresh, juicy fruits do not.

Correct Combinations of Foods Cure Diseases

I have always cured the above-named symptoms in a few days or weeks by returning to a correctly combined diet. The experiments have been fascinating, and the results underlie success in life.

Brainy Diet

A chronic sufferer, weighing 415 pounds, unable to exercise, took correct combinations of ordinary daily foods and reduced over 150 pounds (in public life, under many witnesses) gained strength with firmer flesh, and lost rheumatism.

People Write:

"My brain power and general efficiency have been about doubled this year by selecting brainy foods. I have made a fortune in real estate, and the credit is honestly yours."

"The government should investigate and teach the Brainy Diet System for the good of the nation."

"The hints in Booklet No. III. on foods for curing congested liver, nourishing the brain, etc., are worth untold dollars, although the books are free."

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

indebted for much of our knowledge concerning the apostle and his journeyings.

It was a momentous day for Christianity, too, when that ship entered the harbor of Neapolis, and for the first time Christian missionaries set feet upon European soil. To that ship that safely bore its precious freight from Asia to Europe we are all indebted, for the day that these pilgrims landed on European soil began the history of the Christianity that has spread from the Ægean to the Atlantic, and across to the shores of America, and then in reflex waves has gone back to the Asia from which Paul and his companions sailed.

A historian, writing less than fifty years ago, speaks of Kavalla, the Naples or Neapolis of Macedonia, as "a small Turkish village." When I visited it in the early days of 1912 I found it a thriving city, the second seaport in Macedonia, beautifully situated around the little bay that forms its harbor, while on one side is a great citadel crowned with a Turkish fortress.

The narrow streets are cleaner than most Turkish cities can boast, and there are some really fine and imposing buildings. These are mostly tobacco warehouses, or belong to tobacco magnates, for this noxious weed must at least be given the credit for the present prosperity of this rising town, which is the great tobacco port and manufacturing center of Macedonia.

The chief ruins, which date back to Paul's time, are the remains of a huge Roman aqueduct, whose magnificent arches until within two years before my visit had brought water to the modern city.

A present center of interest is the house where Mohammed Ali was born, the great conqueror of Egypt. This house is maintained by the government in the same condition as when Mohammed was a baby and swung in a cradle hung from the hooks in the ceiling of the room where he was born. Ali loved his birthplace, and when he became rich and powerful he founded here a great school attended by poor boys from all the region round about. Here once a week in the great dining-room everybody who comes is fed, Turks, Jews, Christians, Greeks, Armenians, Americans even—no one is turned away. As I visited the establishment I saw great fires of logs in the basement of one of the school buildings, and over the fires pots of pilaff cooking. This delicious concoction, made of rice and meat and various delicious sauces, gave forth a savory smell, and I do not wonder that many a hungry mortal who comes for a square meal once a week to this ancient foundation blesses the name of Mohammed Ali.

Apparently Paul made no stay in Neapolis. He hastened on to the more important city of Philippi, and thither we must follow him in our next article.

FROM A NINETY-THREE YEAR OLD READER

The premium, Twilight Tales, received. I am delighted with the book and I cannot speak too highly of it. When I take it up to read, it does my soul good and draws my affections heavenward. I take great pleasure in reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I would feel very lonely did it not come to me every week. I have passed my ninety-third birthday. A goodly number of friends came with little gifts to cheer me; they said perhaps it would be my last birthday. May the Lord bless you and all that is dear to you, and pour upon you all the riches of his grace and make you strong to win precious souls.

"The Jilt"

By Mary Hastings Bradley, author of "When a Man Loves"

The most exciting novel the Woman's Home Companion has had for a long time is the story of a girl who is perhaps unfairly described by the title of this story. "The Jilt" begins in December.

WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION

A Christmas Painting

A painting by the famous American artist, Francis D. Millet, is the Woman's Home Companion's Christmas gift to every reader. The picture is reproduced in all its original colors, on paper twenty-two by sixteen inches in size. It is the first of a notable series of art masterpieces in color.

Grace S. Richmond's Story

"Under the Christmas Stars," by the author of the "Juliet" stories, is one of the many absorbing stories in the Christmas Woman's Home Companion. It is a story that will bring laughter and tears, the story of a wonderful Christmas party; illustrated in color by Alice Barber Stephens.

The King's Only Daughter

Fifteen-year-old Mary is the pet of the royal family of England. The true story of this captivating little princess, illustrated with intimate photographs, is told by William Armstrong in the December Woman's Home Companion.

Jolly Christmas Tales

"The Little Brown House," by Marie Conway Oemler, is a Christmas story as jolly as its title. "The Return of Esau" is a striking tale by Georgia Wood Pangborn. "The Blakers' Baby" was left on the Blakers' doorstep, and his story is told by Frederick M. Smith; and among the others there is a delicious story of a boarding-school girl's escapade by Edith Brownell.

God. Now, if the genius of the world is capable of creating the content of the Gospel, then the Gospel is a misnomer; but just because "the world through its wisdom knew not God, it was God's good pleasure through the foolishness of the thing preached to save them that believe." Never was this more profoundly true than in our own age. For, with all our cleverness, we are no match, either in intellectual strength or philosophic subtlety, for the Greek mind to which Paul spoke. Thus, while modern Jews are asking for signs, and while modern Greeks seek after wisdom, let us, in the name of Paul's God, preach Christ crucified, though he be a stumbling block unto Jews and foolishness unto Gentiles; for unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ is at once the power of God and the wisdom of God.

The thankful heart will not overlook the Christian Church. Its toil and tears and substance will be consecrated to her service. In the best and broadest and deepest sense—and I am measuring my words—no man is a good citizen, a good father, or a good patriot; no woman is a good mother, a good wife, or a good neighbor who belittles the Christian Church; and no son, no daughter is worthy of inheriting the privileges of this republic who lays profane hands of scorn and skepticism upon that Ark of the Covenant named the Church of God. Those who practice the new persecution of neglect and indifference toward the church will one day confess: "I am not worthy to be called citizen or disciple, because I persecuted the Church of God."

But I must especially mention the home-makers. Of all the people who are placing heavenly mortgages upon the to-morrows of life, the Christian mothers are foremost. They shape the future for God and humanity by shaping their children according to high ideals. Our mothers are the most potent people in the world today. We do not underestimate the work of the statesmen, the physicians, the ministers, the bankers, the educators, for we are all workers together; but we cannot overestimate the importance of the mothers. Tell me what a nation's mothers are, and I will tell you what the nation itself is. God has indeed called motherhood to awful responsibility; and the majority of mothers, I like to think, are accepting, in fine sincerity and holy joy, the significance of their call. Oh, I like, at this Thanksgiving season, to think with grateful heart of the humble women whose fame is not great on earth, but who are well known in those radiant and invisible spheres where earth's shadows are never cast. No blocks of marble do they round into statues; no canvases do they adorn with glowing colors; no books do they write with scholarly taste; no music do they compose with sweet strains; no platforms do they occupy with persuasive speech. Yet are they all these, and more, because they are God's disciples of the unexplored and the unexpressed. Sculptors, they chisel the veined marble of flesh and blood into living, breathing, human statues; artists, they paint the colors of righteousness on undying souls; authors, they write the literature of godliness on the hearts of their sons; musicians, they sing the white songs of chastity into the souls of their daughters; orators, their lives speak so eloquently of the invisible things of God that, after quitting the world, they, being dead, speak on from the high places of eternity. So, to-day, we chant the beauty of these mothering lives which, like angel-watered lilies, grow close to God, and are quiet, sometimes quaint, and always queenly.

Look about you, then, and within you, and beneath you, and above you, and you will be sure to find many things which will fit in with the liturgy of the thankful heart. We should be grateful for the heavenly hurts which leave no scars, for the celestial benedictions which drop upon us in dark disguise. Some one has said that the late Francis Thomson, the young English poet, like Lamb, was "called by sorrow and anguish and in strange desolation of hopes into quietness, and a soul set apart and made peculiar to God." I saw a strong man kissing the cheek of his dead old father, venerable with years and wealthy with invisible gold. Turning away, the son said, half musing: "I wonder if father is not already young again, and if he has not lost even the memory of his terrible pain." Yes, I think we go to the land where we grow younger the longer we stay, and where, also, the younger we grow in the youth of immortality the more heavenly wise and the more soulfully healthy we become. Give your hearts to God, then, and he will take your hard questions, give you joy for sorrow, peace for pain, hope for despair, and love that knows no measure. And when life's school is out, and your lessons have been learned, you will run shouting and singing home to the outstretched arms of God, who will solve your intricate problems, illumine your dark mysteries, and wipe away your tears. For all things are for your sakes—all true teachers, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas; all wondrous schoolrooms, whether the world, or life, or death; all hopes and all experiences, whether things present, or things to come; all are yours, if you are Christ's, because Christ is God's, and nothing shall be able to separate you from his love. Ring out, then, your happy bells of gratitude, ring them clear across the world, ring them until their golden tones are heard in heaven, and so may you cause this and all thanksgivings to abound unto the glory of God!

heard the note struck by the shepherd, and thus its whereabouts are revealed to him, and he loses no time in going where it is, and gathering it in his arm, and returning it in safety to the fold. And so the love of Jesus is constantly in exercise between him and the children of his care, but we are the shepherds—we parents and teachers—and Jesus expects us to do our duty, so that not one of these little ones should perish."

Little children should be taught to realize the presence of the Christ child in their midst to-day, and for this presence they should become more obedient to parents, more loving to everybody, more careful always to do right because he is their example.

Jesus was once a little child,
A little child like me,
And he was pure and meek and mild,
As a little child should be.
He played as little children play,
The pleasant games of youth,
But he never got vexed if the game went wrong,
And he always spoke the truth.

Jesus was once a little child,
A little child like me,
And he was pure and meek and mild,
As a little child should be.
So, little childen, let you and I
Try to be like him. Try! try! try!

WAKE UP! IT'S CHRISTMAS MORNING

From the original painting by Arthur J. Elsley

ALL of us, grown-ups as well as youngsters, can enjoy the winter thoroughly without having our hands and faces become rough and chapped. The only thing we need do is to use a little care in washing.

Washing with soap containing free alkali and careless drying are the causes of most irritations of the skin during cold weather. Use instead a mild, pure soap, rinse with cold water and make doubly sure that the skin is thoroughly dry. Then the wind can give you nothing worse than glowing cheeks.

There is no soap milder or purer than Ivory—not even pure Castile. It cannot possibly irritate the most delicate skin. Then it rinses so readily that it is very easy to remove the lather and leave the skin in perfect condition for pleasant, thorough drying.

If the skin has become chapped, Ivory Soap—because of this same purity and mildness—is the best soap to use. With it the sensitive face and hands can be cleansed without smarting and the rough skin soon becomes soft and smooth again.

A CARAVAN ENCAMPED ON THE SHORE OF THE EUPHRATES RIVER

HOW THE GARDEN OF EDEN LOOKS TO-DAY

BY FREDERICK SIMPICH, U. S. Consular Service

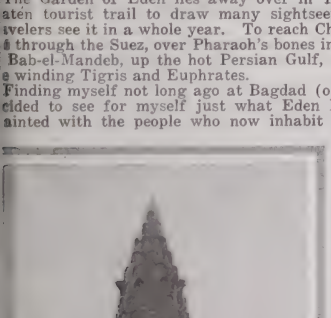
FORTY miles west of old Bagdad, in the vast level valley of the historic Euphrates, near Hit of the Hittites—lies the traditional Garden of Eden. Such is the interesting conclusion of Sir William Willcocks, the famous Egyptian engineer and Bible student, and many other authorities agree with him.

"Out of Eden came a river which watered a garden, and from thence it was parted and became four rivers." And these four rivers, known in Bible days as the Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel and Euphrates—the ancient "River of Babylon"—have been identified by Sir William.

It was while studying, surveying and mapping Chaldea previous to starting work on the giant irrigation scheme planned for Mesopotamia, that Willcocks became convinced that the real Garden of Eden lay in the region described.

The Garden of Eden lies away over in Turkish Arabia, too far from the beaten tourist trail to draw many sightseers. Probably not a dozen white travelers see it in a whole year. To reach Chaldea, the safest and surest route is through the Suez, over Pharaoh's bones in the Red Sea, through the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, up the hot Persian Gulf, and thence five hundred miles up the winding Tigris and Euphrates.

Finding myself not long ago at Bagdad (old home of Sindbad the Sailor), I decided to see for myself just what Eden looks like to-day, and to get acquainted with the people who now inhabit the old traditional homestead of Adam and Eve. I wanted to see Babylon, too, and the excavated palace of King Nebuchadnezzar—where the handwriting appeared on the wall—and I wanted to get a picture of the reputed Tower of Babel, which still lifts its battered head above the flat, empty plain of Mesopotamia.



The Tomb of Ezekiel in Kifil

So I crossed the odd pontoon bridge that spans the yellow Tigris at Bagdad, slipped through the massive West Gate, passed the supposed tomb of Zobedia, and mingled with the pilgrim horde on the great Shia caravan trail that stretches down from Turkestan and Persia, crosses Chaldea, and enters the golden-domed mosques at Kerbela and Nedjef. Millions have passed this way in the centuries, bringing with them the salted and dried bodies of their dead for burial in the sacred soil outside the walls of their holy Shia cities. Two hundred thousand mummified human bodies have passed through Bagdad in a single year, borne by these Shia devotees. For miles along this strange highway, our "arabanah," drawn by four galloping mules, passed these weird death caravans, silent and mysterious. The bodies of departed relatives were carried in oblong bundles, lashed to the backs of pack animals. Veiled women rode in queer, cage-like boxes, slung one on each side of a mule or camel. The men, clad in the round, hard caps and padded clothes peculiar to Persians, marched behind, prodding any lagging donkey or camel.

For miles out of Bagdad, not a human habitation, a tree, or any living green thing broke the empty solitude of the dry, flat plain. Yet the whole desert was marked off like a checkerboard with the ruined, half-filled canals which in ancient times watered all Mesopotamia, and made it "the cradle of the race and the granary of the world." Here and there, wind-torn mounds, glistening in the sun with broken tiles and fragments of glass, showed the sites of once prosperous cities, whose very names are now forgotten. In all the forty-mile journey from Bagdad to the Euphrates, we saw but one human habitation—the mud-walled khan of Mamoudieh, built beside a desert well.

It was late in the afternoon when a mirage-like fringe of date palms raised themselves from the western horizon, marking the banks of the Euphrates and the edge of the Garden of Eden. At nightfall we reached the Arab river town called Mussayeb. Hungry jackals wailed in the tumbledown cemetery outside the village. Redolent camels and goats crowded the narrow bazaar streets; odors of Bedouin cooking arose, and on the flat, Moorish roof of a coffee-house a tom-tom beat and an indolent dancing-girl amused a group of Bagdad Jews and Armenian wool-buyers. The muezzin's call to prayers awaked the town at sunrise.

This, then, was Eden! But how different from the paradise of Adam's halcyon days! What ruin, what wreckage wars and the ravages of ages have wrought! Yet what romance, what tragic events have been staged in this remote nook of the world! Scores of giants in history have passed this way since the episode of Eve and the serpent. Cyrus, Tamerlane, Ghengiz Khan, Alexander, Herodotus, Marco Polo, all famous in the annals of the East, have invaded this Garden of Eden. Just to the north ran the old wall of the Medes. Farther up the Tigris basin stands ancient Nineveh, where Layard and others unearthed so many wonders, and whence came the famous cuneiform tablets, confirming

THE depths of winter have now settled over the warring nations of the Balkans. With drifting snow and intense cold have come untold hardships to many who were left almost destitute when the sudden mobilization order called the men of their families to join the colors. In town and village and many a mountain hamlet women and children and old men have been left alone. Many are already in dire need. Not all the battles are being fought in the trenches; heroically those who have remained at home are facing their sacrifices. At the call of their persecuted brother Christians across the border these nations have laid their all at the altars of faith and patriotism. Both Servia and Bulgaria are nations which have been remarkable for their lack of poverty. It may truly be said of them that no one was poor, as we know poverty, and no one is very rich. They are lands of small farms which give a comfortable living but do not allow for accumulation of wealth. Bulgaria has never found it necessary to organize a society for the relief of the poor. There were none to relieve.

Now that their hour of need has come THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is rejoiced that it has been enabled to send an additional $1,000 for the relief work.

Pastor D. N. Furnajieff, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief committee at Sofia, in a letter just received, says:

"The weather is now bitter cold. The beginning of the winter is here. Around us the fields were covered with the first snow yesterday morning. This is the cause of great suffering. The other day some poor women, leading their half-clad little children by the hand, went to the committee that is charged by the city council with the distribution of the city relief appropriation. To each individual that is left without support in consequence of the mobilization of the army, eight cents a day is given—just enough for bread and salt. The women asked for wood and clothing. 'We are left penniless,' they said; 'our children are freezing and our husbands have been taken to war—you must support us!' But the answer was the almost tearful 'No' of the official. 'The city cannot afford to clothe and warm such great numbers of destitute.'

"There are many families whose little children, having no bread for supper and having to go to bed hungry, cry out loudly with bitter tears, 'Oh, when will father come to bring us bread to eat? We shall die of starvation before the war ends.' And surely for many of them the war has taken away their bread and supporter in life! What shall we do? May the good Lord provide!"

This is not the ugliest side of the situation. Rev. T. T. Halway writes and says: "Samokov has great need too. My sister writes from Bansko, where the liberating army has brought life and liberty to all, and says: 'In Eleshnitza the population was subjected to terrble tortures, violence and outrage by the retreating Turkish army and the local Turks. The eyes of many were put out. Others had their arms cut off. Many young girls were captured and carried off by the Turks. The cannons are thundering continually. How much violence and shame and suffering are in store for us to see and hear God only knows.'

"From the Adrianople district the news comes that the retreating army not only burned to the ground the villages that it had to give up, but robbed and pillaged the population so that thousands and thousands are left homeless and utterly destitute for the winter. Liberty is being brought to them, but at what a price! What will these people do without aid? Relief work is insistently urgent, and that without discrimination as to creed or nationality. More than ten thousand Turkish families have left their homes and fled to Constantinople, but many more are remaining in their home town or village. How will they pass the winter? The war has left them with no provisions, many without shelter and penniless. The land is filled with widows and orphans, poverty, suffering and crying need for help. These wretched people are God's people, and God is calling to-day on his better favored people through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to come to their aid."

From Samokov, Rev. R. H. Markham writes telling of the spirit of devotion which animates the Bulgarians in this struggle. In his letter he says: "To say that no selfish, cruel, or sordid motives enter into the quarrel would, of course, be false, but with Bulgarians, at least, the all-consuming motive is to establish justice, peace, security and freedom, to do away with oppression, and to glorify the name of Jesus. One continually hears such sentiments expressed, and the two most frequent words here are freedom and Christianity. An indication of this religious zeal are the church services which are held throughout Bulgaria. In Sofia, Philippopolis, Bourgas and other large cities not only the churches but even the streets have been filled.

"The service which was held here in Samokov after the war had been in progress for one week will illustrate all the others. The time of the meeting was at nine in the morning, and when it

HOW THE GARDEN OF EDEN LOOKS TO-DAY

Pilgrims Crossing the Garden of Eden as It Is To-day

An Engineering Train in the Garden of Eden

Arab Workmen on the Mesopotamian Irrigation Scheme

e Bible story of creation, the fall of man, and the od. Northeast of Eden lies ruined Opis, once the orld's center of wealth, and the site of the great m which irrigated all Mesopotamia. And when e invading hordes destroyed this dam, all canals n dry, crops withered, the famishing people per- ied or fled to the hills, and the ruin of Babylonia gan.

Is is to restore this lost fertility, to give back a h, productive Garden of Eden to modern man d a land-hungry world, that one of the greatest igation schemes ever planned is now being car- d out here in Mesopotamia. Millions of acres of h land, idle for ages, highly adapted for cotton- owing, grain and fruit, are to be reclaimed. Sir hn Jackson and Sir William Willcocks—it was e latter who built the great Nile dam at Assouan d won fame in Egypt—have been engaged by the rkish Government to direct this important work. arly $100,000,000 is required to complete this nt enterprise, which is already well under way. illcocks says the ancients were scientific irriga- rs, and that all he has to do is to clean out many their old canals and ditches, which will answer rfectly for use in his new system. At the British gineers' camp below Mussayeb, I saw four thou- id Arab workmen busily digging a new channel the Euphrates. A concrete-mixing machine m Chicago and tons of American interlocking el piles are being used to build a great dam in bottom of this false channel. Already the price land in the Garden of Eden, and as far away as gdad and Amarah, has risen on account of the ogress of this reclamation work. The Arab, un- foreign guidance, makes a good laborer. It s only when the British introduced a steam en- ne—the first ever seen in Eden—that a few of the douins became nervous. Desert sheiks came m miles around to see the strange "smoke-horse th fire in it."

Among these wild deserts Arab life is as primi- e as in Abraham's time. Sheep are still slain seal a vow. The salt or bread covenant is observed, and when a man dies his tent is torn down and destroyed. Old names like Joseph, Moses, Alexander, etc., are still in common use among Arabs, though pronounced "Yusuf," "Musa," and "Skandar." To divorce his wife a man may repeat the formula "Ent telek" three times; usually saying it once makes the woman behave, and its final repetition is not necessary. The "evil eye" superstition is common, and the first injunction given a visiting foreigner by experienced Arabian travelers is that he must not point at animals or persons in Arab settlements. Arabs say a man gifted with this malign power can look at a bird flying in the air and that it will drop dead; that if he chooses to cast his wicked spell on a camel, it may go lame, or a child so selected will be struck blind. None of the lower class can read or write, but the Arab is noted for his ready wit and his habit of speaking in allegory.

From the engineer's camp I followed the course of the old river of Babylon down to the famous city of Nebuchadnezzar, where the German Oriental Society is digging up the records of four thousand years ago. I saw the famous stone lion; the bas-relief of Nebuchadnezzar himself, with his quaint, curly beard; the stone goose which was the standard measure of weight in Babylonian grocery stores; the odd tribe of kinky-tailed cats; the thousands of queer dishes, urns, vases, utensils, figures of men and beasts, bath tubs, bowl-shaped coffins, and cuneiform tablets which have been unearthed by the careful Germans. They showed me the magic name of Nebuchadnezzar stamped on numerous bricks, and I walked through the very banquet hall where, peradventure, the handwriting came on the wall at the feast of Belshazzar and "a thousand of his lords." On the perfectly preserved walls of the palace I beheld the strange figures of mythological beasts, and the everlasting bull, which held a high place in Babylonian worship. Under German guidance a host of Arabs have toiled—toiled for a quarter of a century—digging carefully, as they dig at Pompeii, not to crack or ruin the priceless treasures which lie buried everywhere. And each day brings some new surprise.

From the mounds of Babylon, you may look off for miles in every direction—the view that led Nebuchadnezzar to boast of his great city. To the west is Ezekiel's tomb, to the south the Tower of Babel, to the east the great arch of Ctesiphon and the tomb of Salman Pak, private barber to the Prophet Mahomet. In Nebuchadnezzar's time the plain about was a waving mass of verdure, grain and fruit; canals of water traversed it everywhere, and here and there cities dotted the landscape. No wonder he was proud! It is to reclaim this historic land, to make the Garden of Eden over again, that the irrigation works and the famous German-Bagdad Railway are being built.

Now a wave of modernism sweeps the long, changeless East. As it reached out to transform China, so the long arm of progress is reaching out to Turkish Arabia. From the Mediterranean the inevitable railway to link Europe with India is stretching forth. Already trains are running on its western lengths, and the German engineers have surveyed it into Bagdad. The historic, untamed Euphrates is to be bridged at last, and Europe's dream of a railway to the Persian Gulf is about to be realized. Even an aeroplane race from Constantinople to Bombay, crossing the Garden of Eden en route, is now being discussed in the press of Europe. Soon excursion trains may be run to the traditional Garden of Eden, souvenir postals of the Tower and the famous stone lion may be sold in curio shops at New Babylon, and another of the world's once inaccessible regions will echo to the whistle of the engine.

Such is Eden to-day—vast as the basin of the Mississippi, and just as productive, if irrigated. Who can say that in a few years the Garden may not blossom again, a paradise as beautiful as when it staged the world's first romance?

"In the course of the service the chief clergyman unted a little platform and gave a stirring, fer- l address, which in many places showed real ngelical spirit. He said at the close:

"'Oh, mothers, dry your tears! Let wails give ce to prayers! Let our sons fall, our fathers ed their blood! It is for right, for Christ, and not be in vain.'"

Among the letters received from contributors to Relief Fund are many that express the fervent oe that peace may soon come. M. P. S., Brook- n, N. HOLY NIGHT

From the painting by Walther Firle

HOLY night, peaceful night,
Through the darkness beams a light
Yonder, where they sweet vigils keep,
O'er the Babe who, in silent sleep,
Rests in heavenly peace,
Rests in heavenly peace.

Silent night, holy night,
Darkness flies and all is light;
Shepherds hear the angels sing:
"Alleluia! hail the King!"
Jesus, the Saviour, is born,
Jesus, the Saviour, is born.

Silent night, holy night,
Guiding Star, Oh, lend thy light;
See the Eastern Wise Men bring
Gifts and homage to our King.
Jesus, the Saviour, is born,
Jesus, the Saviour, is born.

Silent night, holy night,
Wondrous Star, Oh lend thy light
With the angels let us sing
Hallelujah to our King.
Jesus, our Saviour, is born,
Jesus, our Saviour, is born.

WALTHER FIRLE, the painter of this picture, was born at Breslau in August, 1859. His parents had planned a business career for him, and at an early age he began his apprenticeship. It was not long, though, before Art claimed him for her own, and he entered the academy at Munich. He finished a course under the instruction of well-known masters, and went to Holland for a time, but soon returned to Munich for further study with the master Wohnsitz. His first pictures were in art's minor key—plaintive, almost melancholy subjects. Then an inborn love of the human face and form came into his work. During the following years of development he became well known as an illustrator of journals and magazines. His love was for the simple and sincere things of life. He found many of his favorite and most successful subjects amongst the peasants of his native land. The strong faces and simple faith o these people impressed him deeply and gave the inspiration for such picture as his "Holy Night."

The production of canvases in which scenes from sacred history wer peopled with the types the artist loved, was not at all unusual in the period t which Firle's best work belongs, though they seem to us to-day to be suc strange mixtures. Other artists of high repute have given us their concep tion of the Christ in what were to them modern surroundings. Such well known examples of this type of art as Israel's "Christ Among the Lowly," "The Power of Prayer," by Ludwig Roth, and "Suffer Little Children to Com Unto Me," by Ottilie Roederstein, are already familiar to many readers.

DR. ABBOTT ON THE "OUTLOOK'S" CREED

BY PROF. W. H. T. DAU

WHILE explaining its course during the political campaign just closed, the Outlook in its issue of November 9 declares that it wishes to be regarded neither as a partisan, not as a neutral, but as an independent journal. Its remarks about the position occupied by the Outlook on religious questions are of special interest.

The Outlook points out—and, we believe, correctly—that "it has not been a Protestant organ"; again, that "it has not been a Christian organ." While "it believes profoundly in the right of private judgment, in the ultimate authority of conscience, and in the direct and immediate communion between the individual soul and God," it has tested all claims of all churches, Catholic and Protestant, orthodox and liberal, by that religious faith." And while "it believes profoundly in Jesus Christ as Master and Leader and accepts his teachings and his spirit as containing the solvent of all spiritual and ethical problems," "it has been as ready to commend and to co-operate with Jew or agnostic as with orthodox Christians, etc."

These statements are fully borne out by facts. Especially in the signed articles of Dr. Abbott there is abundant material to show that the attitude of the Outlook in matters religious has been as here described. We still remember vividly the address by its editor-in-chief at the dedication of the Meeting House of the Society for Ethical Culture in New York. Dr. Abbott told his audience part of the history of his life in that address and stated his religious standpoint with great clearness. "I became convinced," he said, "that I could not be an Augustinian, nor a Calvinist, nor a Lutheran, nor an Arminian, nor a Wesleyan, but I could be a Christian. I could not be a disciple of any one of the theological leaders whose creeds were offered as more or less a solution of the enigma of life, but I could be a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, whose teachings were offered as a practical guide to useful and happy living. For fifty years I have been studying his life and teachings and endeavoring to apply to the problems of life his spirit and his principles, who is my Master and to whom I gladly acknowledge supreme loyalty and pay supreme love and reverence." While Dr. Abbott in these words declared his dissent from most of the established creeds of Christianity in the past, he also expressed his hope as to what the religious aspect of the future would be. He said in the same address: "In the Conference (at Lake Mohonk) last week, Jew and Gentile, Roman Catholic and Protestant, Quaker and Episcopalian, Agnostic and Orthodox, met together on terms of mutual respect in discussions for a common end. The time will come, though I am not quite optimistic enough to think that I shall live to see it, when, in the same spirit, Jew and Gentile, etc., in New York City will meet on similar terms of self-respect, united not by a common creed, nor by a common ritual, nor in a common organization, but in a common spirit and purpose." The speaker expressed the belief that the society, with its honored leader, Felix Adler, would hasten the time "when, with all our varied creeds and all our varied rituals, we can all subscribe to Abou Ben Adhem's dedication: 'Write me as one that loves his fellow men'" (The Outlook, November 19, 1910, p. 640 f.). Again, we find in the Outlook this statement by the same author: "The democratic spirit finds the authority and source of religion, not in priests or prophets, past or present—that is, neither in the Book nor in the church—but in the soul's recognition of its divinely ordered duties and divinely bestowed privileges. The church is an authority in so far as it gives true expression to the spiritual consciousness of spiritual souls. The Bible is an authority in so far as it is an expression of spiritual experience by men of a truly spiritual nature, whose experiences have power to awaken an indorsing echo in our own souls" (September 17, 1910, p. 123 f.).

In the same article the writer addresses himsel to answering the old question: What think ye o Christ? He says: "The democratic spirit is n longer interested in the old debates about the Per son of Christ, and is not satisfied with the old defi nitions. The various theological questions whic are different forms of the one question, What i the metaphysical relation of Jesus Christ to th Infinite? do not interest; the old definition o Christ as 'the only begotten Son of God; begotte of his Father before all worlds, God of God, Ligh of Light, very God of very God; begotten, no made; being of one substance with the Father does not satisfy. . . . Whether democratic Chris tianity will attempt a new definition of Jesu Christ may be doubted. Perhaps it will be conten simply to listen to him and follow him without de fining him. . . . Jesus Christ is not the founder o religion. . . . Jesus Christ defined his own mission in the memorable words, 'I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly.' He was and is a life-giver. This life is religion: the religion of faith and hope and love; the religion of doing justly, loving mercy and walking humbly with God. Of this life his own is a supreme example—an example possible for us to follow. It is characteristically a human life. . . . To all who profess and call themselves Christians the Christian religion can mean nothing less than this. And this is both a divine and a human life. For there is no difference. And he who manifests the ideal human life does, by so manifesting the ideal human life, reveal, that is unveil, the divine life—'the human life of God'" (p. 125 f.).

There is no need of multiplying statements like these, which have abounded in the Outlook. It is plain that the Outlook is not a neutral journal, like the Literary Digest. But it is not so plain that it is not partisan. The religious views advocated by the Outlook may not be found in an ecclesiastical organization like the churches now existing, but

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Miss Polly Harrington, a wealthy spinster of Beldington, Vt., receives word from the Ladies' Aid Society of a small Western town that her niece Pollyanna has been left an orphan by the death of her father, the pastor of their poor home mission church. Her mother, Miss Harrington's sister, had died some years before, having never received the forgiveness of her family for marrying the poor young preacher. Miss Polly consents to receive the little eleven-year-old girl into her home, and directs her servant Nancy to prepare a small attic room for her. She wished to put her at a distance from her own apartments and avoid the risk of her breaking the valuable furnishings of any other room. Nancy is sent to the station to meet Pollyanna. From every fresh disappointment she rallies amazingly, always finding something to be glad about. Left alone in her little room she clambers down the branches of a huge tree at her window, and runs to the top of a big rock which has attracted her attention. Nancy sees her and goes to bring her back.

CHAPTER V

THE GAME

FOR the land's sake, Miss Pollyanna, what a scare you did give me!" panted Nancy, hurrying up to the big rock, down which Pollyanna had just regretfully slid.

"Scare? Oh, I'm sorry; but you mustn't, really, ever get scared about me, Nancy. Father and the Ladies' Aid used to do it, too, till they found out I always came back all right."

"But I didn't even know you'd went," cried Nancy, tucking the little girl's hand under her arm and hurrying her down the hill. "I didn't see you go, and nobody didn't. I guess you flew right up through the roof—I do, I do."

Pollyanna skipped gleefully.

"I did, 'most—only I flew down instead of up."

Nancy stopped short.

"You did—what?"

"Came down the tree outside my window."

"My stars and stockings!" gasped Nancy, hurrying on again.

For a moment there was silence. The sky was darkening fast. Pollyanna took a firmer hold on her friend's arm.

"I reckon I'm glad, after all, that you did get scared—a little, 'cause you came after me," she shivered.

"Poor little lamb! And you must be hungry, too. I—I'm afraid you'll have ter eat bread an' milk in the kitchen with me. I'm sorry—I am."

"Oh, I'm not. I'm glad."

"Glad? Why?"

"Why, I like bread and milk, and I'd like to eat with you. I don't see any trouble being glad about that."

"You don't seem ter see any trouble bein' glad about everythin'," retorted Nancy, choking a little over her remembrance of Pollyanna's brave attempts to like the bare little attic room.

Pollyanna laughed softly.

"Well, that's the game, you know, anyway."

"The—game?"

"Yes; the 'just being glad' game."

"Whatever in the world is that?"

"Why, it's a game. Father told it to me, and it's lovely," rejoined Pollyanna. "We've played it always, ever since I was a little, little girl."

"What is it? I ain't much on games, though."

Pollyanna laughed again, but she sighed, too; and in the gathering twilight her face looked thin and wistful.

"Why, we began it on some crutches that came in a missionary barrel."

"Crutches!"

"Yes. You see, I'd wanted a doll, and father had written them so; but when it came the lady wrote that there hadn't any dolls come in, but the little crutches had. So she sent 'em along, as they might come in handy for some child, some time. And that's when we began it."

"Well, I must say I can't see any game about that," declared Nancy, almost irritably.

"Oh, yes; the game was to just find something about everything to be glad about—no matter what it was," rejoined Pollyanna, earnestly. "And we began right then—on the crutches."

"Well, goodness me! I can't see anythin' ter be glad about—gettin' a pair of crutches when you wanted a doll!"

Pollyanna clapped her hands.

"There is," she crowed. "But I couldn't see it, either, Nancy, at first," she added, with quick honesty. "Father had to tell it to me."

"Well, then, suppose you tell me."

"Goosey! Why, just be glad because you don't need 'em!" exulted Pollyanna, triumphantly. "You see, it's just as easy—when you know how!"

"Well, of all the queer doin's!" breathed Nancy.

"Oh, but it isn't queer—it's lovely," maintained Pollyanna enthusiastically. "And we've played it ever since. And the harder 'tis, the more fun 'tis to get 'em out; only—only—sometimes it's almost too hard—like when your father dies, and there isn't anybody but a Ladies' Aid left."

"Yes, or when you're put in a snippy little room 'way at the top of the house with nothin' in it," growled Nancy.

Pollyanna sighed.

"That was a hard one, at first," she admitted, "specially when I was so kind of lonesome. I just didn't feel like playing the game, anyway, and I had been wanting pretty things so. Then I happened to think how I hated to see my freckles in the looking-glass, and I saw that lovely picture out the window, too; so then I knew I'd found the things to be glad about. You see, when you're hunting for the glad things, you sort of forget the other kind—like the doll you wanted, you know."

"Why, Mr. Tom—Aunt Polly! Don't look so scared!"

"Humph!" choked Nancy, trying to swallow the lump in her throat.

"Most generally it doesn't take so long," sighed Pollyanna; and lots of times now I just think of them without thinking, you know. I've got so used to playing it. It's a lovely game. F-father and I used to like it so much," she faltered. "I suppose, though, it—it'll be a little harder now, as long as I haven't anybody to play it with. Maybe Aunt Polly will play it, though," she added, as an afterthought.

"My stars and stockings!—her!" breathed Nancy behind her teeth. Then, aloud, she said doggedly: "See here, Miss Pollyanna, I ain't sayin' that I'll play it very well, and I ain't sayin' that I know how, anyway; but I'll play it with ye, after a fashion—I just will, just will!"

"Oh, Nancy!" exulted Pollyanna, giving her a rapturous hug. "That'll be splendid! Won't we have fun?"

"Er—maybe," conceded Nancy, in open doubt. "But you mustn't count too much on me, you know. I never was no case for games, but I'm a-goin' ter make a most awful old try on this one. You're a-goin' ter have some one ter play it with, anyhow," she finished, as they entered the kitchen.

Pollyanna ate her bread and milk with good appetite; then, at Nancy's suggestion, she went into the sitting-room, where her aunt sat reading.

Miss Polly looked up coldly.

"I'm sorry, Pollyanna, to have been obliged so soon to send you into the kitchen to eat bread and milk."

"But I was real glad you did it, Aunt Polly. I love bread and milk, and Nancy, too. You mustn't feel bad about that, one bit."

Aunt Polly sat suddenly a little more erect.

"Pollyanna, it's quite time you were in bed. You have had a hard day, and to-morrow we must plan your hours and go over your clothing to see what it is necessary to get for you. Nancy will give you a candle. Be careful how you handle it. Breakfast will be at half past seven. See that you are down to that. Good-night."

Quite as a matter of course, Pollyanna came straight to her aunt's side and gave her an affectionate hug.

"I've had such a beautiful time, so far," she sighed happily. "I know I'm going to just love living with you—but then, I knew I should before I came. Good-night," she called cheerfully, as she ran from the room.

"Well, upon my word!" ejaculated Miss Polly, half aloud. "What a most extraordinary child!" Then she frowned. "She's 'glad' I punished her, and I 'mustn't feel bad one bit,' and she's going to 'love to live' with me! Well, upon my word!"

Fifteen minutes later, in the attic room, a lonely little girl sobbed into the tightly-clutched sheet:

"I know, father, I'm not playing the game one bit now—not one bit; but I don't believe even you could find anything to be glad about sleeping all alone way off up here in the dark—like this. If only I was near Nancy or Aunt Polly, or even a Ladies' Aider, it would be easier!"

Downstairs in the kitchen, Nancy, hurrying with her belated work, jabbed her dish-mop into the milk pitcher, and muttered jerkily:

"If playin' a silly fool game—about bein' glad you've got crutches when you want dolls—is got ter be—my way—o' bein' that rock o' refuge—why, I'm a-goin' ter play it—I am, I am!"

CHAPTER VI

A QUESTION OF DUTY

IT WAS nearly seven o'clock when Pollyanna awoke that first day after her arrival.

The birds were twittering joyously, and she flew to the window to talk to them. She saw then that down in the garden her aunt was already out among the rose-bushes. With rapid fingers, she made herself ready to join her. Down the attic stairs she flew, leaving both doors open.

Aunt Polly, with the bent old man, was leaning over a rose-bush when Pollyanna, gurgling with delight, flung herself upon her.

"Oh, Aunt Polly, Aunt Polly! I reckon I'm glad this morning just to be alive!"

"Pollyanna!" remonstrated the lady, sternly, pulling herself as erect as she could with a dragging weight of ninety pounds hanging about her neck. "Is this the usual way you say good-morning?"

The little girl dropped to her toes and danced lightly up and down.

"No, only when I love folks so I just can't help it! I saw you from my window, Aunt Polly, and I got to thinking how you weren't a Ladies' Aider, and you were my really truly aunt; and you looked so good I just had to come down and hug you!"

The bent old man turned his back suddenly. Miss Polly attempted a frown—with not her usual success.

"Pollyanna, you—I—Thomas, that will do for this morning. I think you understand—about those rose-bushes," she said stiffly. Then she turned and walked rapidly away.

"Do you always work in the garden, Mr. Man?" asked Pollyanna interestedly.

The man turned. His lips were twitching, but his eyes looked blurred as if with tears.

"Yes, Miss. I'm Old Tom, the gardener. "You are so like your mother, little Miss! I used to

CHRISTMAS

CAN anything new be said about Christmas? How many myriad words have been written about it, its cheer, its fragrance, its carols and chimes, its message and lessons! But Christmas is always welcome, always fresh and beautiful, always new.

No other day in all the year has the same charm, the same kind of joy, the same brightness. Even a rainy Christmas is delightful. The day's store of cheer is so measureless that it can conquer the gloomiest weather and fill it with glory. And a sunny Christmas—sunny and white with gleaming snow, with the amber twilight glow stealing on and the faint stars growing big and brilliant as the night comes down—what can possibly be like that! When has home such joy, love such sweetness, religion such glory, life such richness—as on Christmas Day!

But one Christmas lesson can never be repeated too often, emphasized too earnestly, applied too universally. We think of the Christ child coming to the Bethlehem manger, of the shepherds, the angels, the Wise Men; we hear the Christmas hymn:

> How silently, how silently,
> The wondrous gift is given!
> So God imparts to human hearts
> The blessings of his heaven.
> No ear may hear his coming,
> But in this world of sin,
> Where meek souls will receive him still,
> The dear Christ enters in.

And every earnest heart must ask itself: "Have I let him in?" Is it wise or fair to take the charm and cheer and melody of Christmas and keep the Lord of Christmas outside my own soul's door?

Christ came to Bethlehem centuries ago in order that he might come into your heart now. The shame that there was no room for him in the inn is nothing to the shame that there is no room for him in your heart. "Peace on earth!" It must spread by being let into human hearts one by one. How inexpressibly sad that after these many years there is still strife, and hard-heartedness, and woful bloodshed! The Prince of Peace looks at this world to which he once came and sees, as the anniversary of his birth draws near again, that leagues upon leagues of its ground are drenched in the blood of battle. Millions of souls do not yet even know about him. Millions who know about him are not spreading his message of peace. Millions who know about him do not know him personally as Peace-giver and friend. Are you helping the world to welcome him and his great gift of Peace? Christmas joy is all about you. You feel it in your finger tips; you hear it; you breathe it. It is in body and brain. Will you not let it into your soul, by opening the door—to him? You will find then that, sweet though the words have always been, you never before have known their meaning. Merry Christmas!

Is It a "Change of Heart"?

THERE are indications of unrest in the Roman Catholic camp. It is evident that its "Publicity Campaign" has reacted in a way that was wholly unexpected. Only a few weeks ago, there was hardly a Catholic newspaper in the United States that did not openly proclaim the purpose of the hierarchy to "make America Catholic." They gloried in the fact that the Papacy was making such magnificent headway. Their Publicity Bureau was doing splendid service through the daily press, in familiarizing the American people with the grandeur, pomp and mystery of the ceremonials of Rome. Their prelates were receiving the honors and ovations due to princes of the blood. Their cardinals sat on thrones like sovereigns, and in speech and printed page they pointed to the fact that here, in this republic, lay the hope of Rome and the future seat of its rejuvenated power.

Now, a change seems to have come over the spirit of their dream. The Catholic News of November 9, 1912, sounds the alarm in an editorial strongly deprecating the very natural and logical construction which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as well as many other independent Protestant journals, placed upon these events and utterances. It says:

> Who among Catholics has ever expressed the wish that the Catholic Church become a political power here? No one with authority to speak for Catholics. We American Catholics would consider it the greatest evil that could happen to our church if it became a political power. Catholics here desire only such rights as belong to them as American citizens, just as the members of other denominations expect to enjoy such rights. They want nothing more. Neither do they consider it just that because of their religion they shall be discriminated against in any way. We submit that our friends who are Methodists, Baptists, Episcopalians, or affiliated with any other Protestant body, would as strenuously object if any attempt was made to proscribe them. Then why should not Catholics protest when they are victims of discrimination?

If these expressions by an influential Catholic journal are to be accepted as the sober second thought of the Roman Catholic press and people generally, they would indicate a most salutary change of heart. But, unfortunately, there is abundant evidence that few if any other members of the Catholic press are of the same opinion as the News. (See details next week.) Here is the Catholic Citizen of Milwaukee, exulting in a double-column article, headed "Many Catholics Elected," over the fact that "Tuesday's election brought into prominent public position a larger number of Catholics than heretofore in the history of the country." It follows with a long list of governors, State officers, United States Senators and Congressmen—all Catholics—who won at the polls. The Cleveland Universe (November 15) also shouts a pæan of victory over the "High offices to be filled by Catholics," and prints a similar list. How does the Catholic News harmonize these jubilant utterances with its own fervent declaration that "We American Catholics would consider it the greatest evil that could happen to our church if it became a political power," when the Catholic journals are fairly screaming their delight that it is becoming a power in politics? Can it point to a single Protestant paper that is publicly glorying in the defeat of any Catholic candidate in this election? If any one did, its editor would be regarded as either a politico-religious incendiary or a lunatic. Yet this is the sort of thing which the hierarchy evidently approves on the part of the Catholic press. If it really disapproved, it could easily apply a wholesome quietus.

Now, the best and most satisfactory test of the whole matter will be the future attitude of the Catholic prelates and press. We shall watch these with interest. If they adopt the policy of the Catholic News, we may expect them to promptly disclaim any purpose of future interference in politics, or of further propaganda to "make America Catholic." The term is wholly their own—not ours. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD claims for Protestants, either as citizens or as religionists, no more than it would willingly accord to Catholics; but if any Protestant denomination were to declare its purpose of securing political control, we assure our neighbor that it would be visited with swift condemnation from other Protestant bodies and Protestant journals as well, ourselves included. While we would like to indulge the hope that other Catholic journals will speedily follow the sensible example of the News in disavowing the political pretensions of the Roman Church, we confess a doubt, which can only be removed by seeing such a disavowal in cold type in the columns of every Catholic paper that has been engaged in this wrong-headed, un-American crusade. What has happened in the last few months in the way of "stirring up strife" has been sole due to themselves, and we can assure them that they have the means of remedying the situation in their own hands.

Why Not Do It?

A PASTOR loves to meet his people outside of the pulpit and to greet them personally, and an editor enjoys cultivating the familiar personal relation between his readers and himself occasionally on the editorial page. If we were visiting together, we might tell you of the amazing growth of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and how it is steadily climbing the hill that leads to the great goal of world-wide influence and service which Dr. Klopsch saw in his vision—the Million Mark in Circulation! This advance has been made possible by the co-operation of very many of our readers, who have responded splendidly to our appeal to send in at least one new subscription along with their own. They are doing so now, and that we are greatly encouraged.

Let us tell you of the experience of one of our readers. She is a quiet, elderly lady, rather small of stature, but sweet of face and genial of heart. She came up to the subscription clerk's window in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House and laid her gloved hand on the glass counter. "I want to renew my seven subscriptions," she said with a smile. "To what address?" asked the clerk. "Oh," she said, "they all go to different places; some of them are here and others are across the water, in Ireland and Scotland. They have been my Christmas gifts to my friends for many years and I always renew on time, so that they won't miss the Christmas number."

There are many readers of this journal who, like the one quoted above, have been in the habit of regularly subscribing for a number of copies to send to friends as their weekly messenger of loving remembrance. This is the kind of Christmas hospitality which constantly rekindles with the arrival of every new issue, so that there is no danger of the donor being forgotten. Some of those kindly, thoughtful souls send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the aged, the invalid, the prisoner, or to those who are stricken with sorrow or affliction, knowing that it always brings a bright ray of cheerfulness and consolation.

If you are contemplating a Christmas gift to a friend, may we not suggest that, instead of sending your own copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD after reading it and when it is a week old, you make your friend a Christmas present of a year's subscription? Your friend will then get a copy fresh from the press every week, simultaneously with your own, and will enjoy it all the more, and value your gift very highly on that account. Besides, we are making a special rate to those who, like yourself, may contemplate subscribing for their friends. To any one of our subscribers sending us a new subscription with their own renewal, the rate for both together will be $2.25. You will find, by doing a little figuring, that this will be an actual saving to you in supplying both papers to different addresses at less outlay than if you paid the regular postage rates to mail your copy to your friend after you have read it. If you should send us two new subscriptions together with your own renewal with $3 to cover all, we will send three copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD weekly to three distinct addresses. This is an offer we are making for the special advantage of those who are interested in doing a kindness to others by supplying them with a copy of their favorite journal beginning with the Christmas season. Of course a free copy of The Christian Herald Almanac goes with every subscription.

—THE FOUR GUNMEN, charged with the actual shooting of Herman Rosenthal in New York last summer, for which crime Police Lieutenant Charles Becker has already been sentenced to death, were found guilty of murder in the first degree on Nov. 19 after the jury had deliberated only twenty-five minutes. They were Horowitz, Rosenberg, Lewis and Ciroñci. Jack Rose, Sam Schepps, Harry Vallon and "Bridgie" Weber, who had informed against the convicted men, were released from custody Nov. 2

Bird Dogs Detect Smugglers

TO STOP the smuggling of quail across the Oklahoma-Kansas line, the use of bird dogs as detectives has been started by three railroad companies in southern Kansas and orthern Oklahoma. Shipping quail by smugglers om one State to another is illegal, and the railads are held responsible for game thus transorted. Trainmen have been unable to discover e quail in the suit cases so often used for transortation, and it occurred to some of the employees the roads that trained bird dogs would be able scent the birds even through the leather of the ses, and the experiment of using them for the rpose succeeded so well that the rule has been lopted by the railroads, and the dog detectives are cely to break up this method of smuggling. Into e dogs God has put unerring instincts, one to ent the quail, another the rabbit or squirrel, anher to chase the fox or the deer; one care like a man for the sheep, anher to fight a wolf or a bear. The ithful dog can scent his master's otsteps among the prints of a thoud feet. Men, like dogs, have varia characteristics—one to cultivate e earth, one to buy and sell, one to ake machines, one to practice medne or law, or teach, or preach. It ould be well if people could always id out what they are fitted for as eas as the animal can. It would be well our instinct for the right, for God, r Christ, might be as certain and effient as the scent of the dog for the ail. The success of the dog detecve suggests that the moral law of the niverse tends to uncover wrong, and at it is folly to try to hide moral evil om the eye of God. Christ has anunced the principle:

For nothing is secret, that shall not be made anifest; neither anything hid, that shall not be own and come abroad. (Luke 8: 17.)

Ten Million Pension Fund

HE American Telephone and Tele- graph Company and its associate mpanies have announced a pension nd of $10,000,000 for the benefit of eir 175,000 employees, who receive in ages $115,000,000. The plans for the d age and disability pensions, as pubhed officially by the company, are as follows:

Male employees who have reached the age of 60 years, and who ve been twenty years or more in service, may retire on pens. They may be retired at the option of the company when y have reached the age of 55 years, and have been twentye years or more in service. The pension age of female emyees is in each case five years younger than that of male emyees. Any employee who has been thirty years in service, cardless of age, may be pensioned on the approval of the esident of the company. The amount of the pension is autoatically based on the years of service and the amount of pay. d will be one per cent. of the average annual pay for ten ars, multiplied by the number of years of service. Therefore, man who had been thirty years in service would get 30 per nt. of the average salary which he had been receiving during s last ten years of service. No pension will be less than $20 a nth. In the case of accidents occurring in and due to the rformance of work for the company, the employee will receive total disability full pay for thirteen weeks, and half pay for remainder of disability up to six years. If the disability is mporary, he will receive full pay for thirteen weeks, and half y until able to earn a livelihood, not exceeding six years. mployees who are disabled by sickness or accident outside of the gular course of duty after ten years or more in service will ceive full pay for thirteen weeks and half pay for thirty-nine eks; if from five to ten years in service, full pay for thirteen eks and half pay for thirteen weeks; if from two to five ars in service, full pay for four weeks and half pay for nine eks. In the case of employees who have not been two years in rvice, heads of departments will be permitted the same disetion as heretofore, in continuing pay during temporary illss. In the case of death resulting from accident in and due to rformance of work for the company an insurance amounting three years' pay will be paid to the dependents of the emyee, the maximum payment being $5,000. In the case of ath resulting from sickness or from accident outside of busiss, the payment will be one year's pay for employees who ve been ten years or more in service, and one-half of one year's y for employees who have been from five to ten years in rvice, the maximum payment being $2,000.

Such action will promote the dignity of labor, crease the productiveness of capital, go far ward correcting the unjust inequalities that ex- t in the industrial world, kindle a spirit of fraernity, and aid in ushering in the kingdom of God. is the reaching up of business and manhood to e standard of the Golden Rule, in the interest of personal character and of public righteousness and happiness, and in obedience to Christ's command:

Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets. (Matt. 7: 12.)

New Parcel Post System

THE new Parcel Post system authorized by Congress goes into effect January 1, 1913. The post will carry all kinds of manufactured articles and farm products whose length and girth combined do not measure over 72 inches and whose weight does not exceed 11 pounds. A group of postal department men were detailed to figure out a table of zones and rates, which they have done, and which has been approved by the Postmaster General. The following is the result of their work, which will go into effect on January 1:

A parcel weighing four ounces or less may be mailed at the rate of one cent an ounce regardless of distance. Each post office will be taken as the center of the series of zones. Zone One includes all territory within a radius of fifty miles from the mailing place. Zone Two includes all that area outside of Zone One, but within a radius of 150 miles. Zone Three reaches 300 miles away from the central point; Zone Four, 600 miles; Zone Five, 1,000 miles; Zone Six, 1,400 miles; Zone Seven, 1,800 miles; Zone Eight, all distances beyond Zone Seven. There is no calculating the advantage of this new system to the people of the country. There is a great difference between the mile-a-minute or minute-and-a-half transportation of the mail we have and that of the olden times when it went by the hand of a footman, or on the back of some animal, or in some chariot. There was a pretty good parcel post system of delivery when the king of Syria sent by mail not only a letter, but a number of packages also, to the king of Israel.

And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter unto the king of Israel. And he departed, and took with him ten talents of silver, and six thousand pieces of gold, and ten changes of raiment. And he brought the letter to the king of Israel. (II. Kings 5: 5, 6.)

Boy Swept to Sea

WILLIE TAYLOR and Clinton Fox, each eleven years old, went to the beach at Gravesend, N. Y., and paddled around in a leaky rowboat. The boat struck the stone breakwater, and threw Taylor out, but the ebbing tide carried Clinton and his dog Tim to death. There are so many physical and moral perils in childhood, so many high winds and swift tides carrying children in the oarless leaky boat out to physical and moral death, so many shipwrecked when scarcely started on the voyage of life.

Which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck. (I. Tim. 1: 19.)

Half Million New Autos

IT IS said there were 250,000 new automobiles in the United States in 1912, and that there will be at least 500,000 new ones in 1913. Word has been heard from 109 car manufacturers, and the conservative estimate on the information received is that a half million new pleasure cars will be disposed of during the coming year. It is estimated that the output of one firm alone will be 200,000 for the year, that another factory will produce 50,000, another 40,000, another 30,000, another 25,000, and twenty-five others from 3,000 to 15,000 each. The market for low-priced cars scarcely has a supply equal to the demand, few of which can be found for second-hand sale. It will never do for a country that has the ability or courage to demand 500,000 new cars in a year to satisfy the needs of its growing business and its desire for comfortable travel or exhilarating pleasure to whine much about hard times, or the high cost of living. Nor will it do for a country with record crops and fabulous expenditures for pleasure to be anything but generous with men and with God and his kingdom. There is a great difference between the automobile and the wagon of the early centuries thus mentioned:

And when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived. (Gen. 45: 27.)

$35,000 Fur Coat

THE fashion columns in the Paris papers and those of this country are interested in the rivalry of two women of America over the possession of the most costly fur coat. Last winter one of the rivals, who are relatives, had made a Russian sable coat at an estimated cost of $25,000. The other woman, who is very wealthy, determined to outdo that, and gave an order for a coat regardless of cost. Furriers were sent all over Europe to select the finest skins. Returning to America, they visited the New York houses for others. Out of $200,000 worth of furs 106 perfect skins were selected, from which the garment was made at a cost to the wearer of $35,000. A misfortune befell her rival before the coat was completed, for a thief stole the $25,000 coat. Rich and beautiful wearing apparel is becoming to those who can afford it. But a display of excessive extravagance is in bad taste, provoking the enmity and discontent of the less wealthy, and feeding a vanity in themselves which is unhealthy to the best growth of womanhood. Those tempted to extravagance of dress in the fashionable world might listen with profit to the apostle:

In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with braided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array. (I. Tim. 2: 9.)

The New King and the Kingdom

A Sermon

BY

Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis*

TEXT: "The kingdom of God is within you." Luke 17: 21

THIS is a proverb. Every picture has a right to be judged in the best light. It ought to be a principle that every man has a right to be measured by his best work. It is a truism that every discoverer has the first right to explain the nature of his discovery. Thus, we rank Webster by his reply to Hayne; we measure Victor Hugo by his Les Misérables; we estimate Raphael by his Sistine Madonna. Not otherwise is it with Christianity. The body of Christian truth has a right to be studied in the best light—that is, from the viewpoint of sympathy. It should be considered, also, with reference to its greatest and most distinguished teachers—the love of God, that love manifest in Jesus Christ, his tender providence, the forgiveness of sins, his redeeming cross, the immortal hope and its sure foundation.

To-day we hear much about going back to Christ. But we need to return to him in nothing so much as in this matter of definition. The questions, What is Christianity? Who is the Christian? What are the tests of discipleship? have been answered by a thousand different men. Unfortunately, also, they have been answered in a thousand different ways. In the midst of all the differences of the scholar, therefore, we turn to Christ's statement, for we can find rest when we allow him to define Christianity in his own words, and in his own way.

Consider the importance of this definition and right thinking. Nothing can be more certain than the statement that as a man thinks so he is. It is thought that makes life. Ideas color character. The principles that we accept shape our conduct. The river slowly digs a channel, the channel compels the river to remain within its banks, and the banks issue this decree, "Here stay thy proud waves; thus far and no farther." Some men will tell you that character shapes thought, and this is in part true, but primarily the thought shapes the character. The habits themselves are simply the grooves digged by thought for the movement of the faculties. The issues of life and death, therefore, are in the definitions and the thoughts that we think. There must be no careless thinking, then, as to what is Christianity, or who is a Christian. Fortunately Christ has defined Christianity in terms of great simplicity and clarity. "The kingdom of heaven is within you," he tells us. The kingdom of heaven, then, is a state of mind and character. It is a dispositional quality. It is not a city, located yonder behind the fretted firework of stars. The kingdom of heaven is enthroned in the city of man's soul. Sometimes we forget that Christ's use of the word "kingdom" has colored all scientific thought, and that, just here, science will help us. We characterize the stone as the kingdom of mineral, having weight; the tree represents the vegetable kingdom—it adds life to weight; the bird represents the animal kingdom—to weight and life it adds the power of movement; man represents the rational kingdom—to weight and life and locomotion he adds reason. Last comes the Christian—he represents Christ's kingdom of heaven. To weight and life and locomotion and reason he adds God's life in the soul of man, through righteousness, love, peace, joy. And who is this Christian who has the kingdom of heaven within him? He is one who loves what Christ loves, hates what Christ abhors. He also loves whom Christ loves—the chil the publican, the prodigal, the poor, the broken-hearted. He loves the dee Christ did and does them. And he who is conscious of the beginnings of lo for what Christ loved, and of abhorrence for what Christ abhorred, has begu to be a Christian.

This is Christ's definition of Christianity; this tells us who is the Christia and what are the tests of discipleship.

But it is not enough for Christ to define Christianity. He goes on to illu trate it. Indeed, Christianity is Christ. His test of discipleship was that man loves what he loved, does what he did, and does all of these thing under his personal leadersh and love. Indeed, for the pu pose of illustration I may sa that he did not emphasize t church as important, nor t doctrine as important, nor t government as important. C course, this is a half truth, bu for purpose of illustration I u this half truth. Lest men confu Christianity with the church, I never organized a church. Thirt years after his death, his disc ples were still offering sacr fices of lambs and wheat an doves in the synagogues, n did they suspect that a separa church would ever spring u Lest his disciples confuse Chri tianity with ecclesiasticism, never ordained any priest bishop or founded a presbyter or church. He wrote out sermon, he left no creed, spoke his words and his wor died with the vibrating a What did Jesus Christ do? H simply was. Jesus, in his ow person, was Christianity. Wha he was is light and leaven an salvation to the world. But w worship no dead Christ, bu the living Christ; and what he still saves men. He, therefor during his career, illustrate his definition of the kingdom heaven in the soul of man. H was poor in spirit; pure heart; meek and gentle; hu gered and thirsted after righ eousness; was a peacemaker was persecuted for righteou ness' sake; forgave his enemie unto institutions he was sal unto darkened minds he wa light; unto all who were pu sued he was a city on a hill, o fering refuge; he was leaven he was love. And being th and manifesting forth the kin dom of heaven in the soul man he lived it. Witness h love to children, his solicitu for the sinner, the prodigal; h succor for the lost, his patien all-forgiving love for his disc ples. Christ's Sermon on th Mount is only a verbal phot graph of Christ's life on th hills of Galilee. He is an en bodied sermon, an incarna Gospel, a fleshed kingdom heaven.

In view of these definitions Christianity, consider the beaut and attractiveness of the Chri tian life. At one single blo fallen all somberness, sadnes ugliness in connection wit Christianity. To be a Christian is to be an all-round man or woman, to b ample in faculty and fertile in resource. It is to love birds and flowers an trees and clouds, to be a nature-student, as Christ was. It is to love th market place, and all the movements of life at its heart, as Christ loved then It is to be interested in everything that makes for the home, the commerce, th government, the literature, for reform, for religion. It is to be Christlike i all ways. Some men think that to be a Christian means to wear sackcloth, t deny the eye beauty, to deny the taste loveliness. They dislike the duties, bu rather than be damned, they will do them. They have such a fear and horro

A CHRISTMAS CAROL

BY RICHARD ARNOLD GREENE

Be patient, Christian brothers!
The eastern sky's aglow;
Encompassed with its radiance
Blush all the fields of snow.
Take heart for daily duty;
Face frigid blasts of scorn;
The Sun of Peace is risen;
The Saviour Christ is born.

Be strong, O Christian brothers!
The dawn with rapture thrills;
In robes of tender glory
Stand forth the eternal hills.
The strength of God will triumph,
The foemen's ranks be torn;
Mount Sion shines resplendent;
The Saviour Christ is born.

Be true, O Christian brothers!
Clear is the Christmas sky;
Soft canopied beneath it,
How white the snow-fields lie!
Give welcome, hearts discouraged,
By strife with error worn;
The Truth Himself is with us;
The Saviour Christ is born!

Be loving, Christian brothers!
With holly boughs caressed,
The evergreen unbendeth,
In children's service blessed.
Let love-light banish shadows,
The rose displace its thorn;
The King of Love is with us;
The Saviour Christ is born.

THE NEW KING AND THE KINGDOM

being punished beyond death, that escape it they will wear sackcloth d sacrifice themselves here. Oh, serable, scant, pinched conception the Christian life! What is Chris-nity? The most beautiful of lives, e fullest, freest, amplest, happiest of reers. God has fitted this great rld up for his children and has ven men all things richly to enjoy, d a Christian is a citizen of the uni-rse. Nothing true, or beautiful, or od is foreign to him.

The kingdom of heaven is "right-usness," that is, character embod-, obedience to law, honesty, recti-de, integrity; it fills a man with aracter as the sunbeam is filled th warmth, and an apple with ripe-ss; righteousness, that makes a man manhood all compact. The king-n of heaven is "peace and joy." In s world full of anxiety and turmoil d strife, the things all men are king for are peace, mental tran-illity, the realm of restfulness, out-aking joy. The kingdom of heaven love. Who can be infidel to love? 10 does not desire it? What is the e thing that all the world's a-seek-g? To love and to be loved. Oh, at a magician is love! It steals o the life like a sunbeam, it warms e a winter's fire, it glows on the e like ripeness on the cheek of a ar, it binds us to life with a chain gold. These are the fruits of the ristian life. This it is to be a ristian.

Consider also that from Christ's wpoint of Christianity the Chris-n life is something that is to be rned. We begin as pupils, we are rners in his school. Ours is a rld where the seeds start at noth-g and journey toward the shock; ere the babe grows by long pro-ises toward the sage or statesman. man was ever born a poet, despite proverb. Slowly all the artists ve mastered the rules of color. No v ever entered the college, begin-ig at perfection. We hear men say it the church is full of imperfect ristians, and they will not join the urch where there are so many hypo-tes. Of all the statements full of ly, that statement is the most fool-and the most hypocritical. When-er a man says that he stays out of church because there are bad peo-e in it, you had better lock up your ons when that man is around. r this critic of the church and the ristian understands that the only ople that go to the school are im-rfect scholars. Men learn how to Christians as they paint pictures. e artist puts on his background of int, lays in the outlines of features. wly he puts in his colors. Little little the life lines come out. Then lets the paint dry that the features ly sink in. Then with a coat of rnish he lifts the lines again. wly the author perfects his book. wly the poem goes toward perfec-n, and by processes long and painful e Christian journeys upward away m littleness toward largeness. Let youth be discouraged because of his ilures.

Oh, all ye young hearts, consider, en, the claim of this higher life upon u. To have the kingdom of heaven your life and heart is the only thing rth while. When yonder sun is a rned-out ash-cinder you are to "live and on!" Do you love what rist loves? Do you hate deed at he abhors? Is the kingdom of aven set up in your soul? Being se for to-day, so be wise also for e to-morrows! For it profiteth an nothing "if he gain the whole rld, if he lose his own soul."

APPRECIATES TWILIGHT TALES

"Please accept my thanks for Mrs. Sangster's book, Twilight Tales. I appreciate it very much, for I have always been fond of Mrs. Sangster's writings. MRS. LINCOLN.

WORKING BY HEART POWER

HERE, as well as abroad, every department of the world's work-power is measured by its recognized units. We hear continually of the number of horse-power in a machine, or the watts and volts of an electric current, the voting power of a party, and the money power of big business. Power, of whatever kind, provided it can be harnessed and employed, is the one thing in greatest demand in the busy world to-day. Little is said in the factories, or the counting-houses, or the laboratories, or the political councils which would indicate any great desire for heart power, yet no occupation or pursuit is worth much which is not dominated and impelled by heart power.

Men have risen to great prominence in business or national life by skilful use of voting power or money power. In their day they have been regarded as mighty, and their will has prevailed. The newspapers have printed many columns about them. Their most trivial doings have been recorded among the events of the day, and their names have been as a household word in the mouths of millions. Surely they have had every possible opportunity to secure an imperishable place in the history of the world. Yet in a few short years their names are laid away with their bodies in the grave, and their fame vanishes like smoke before the onrushing wind.

Think for a moment of the great men of money who fill so large a place in the public mind to-day. We are inclined to regard them as exclusive products of the present age, yet every other age has had its giants of wealth. Perhaps you can remember two or three of the last generation, or even the last century; beyond that the mind fails to recall the names of those who ruled the world by money power alone.

In the ages long past a man named Crœsus gained much prominence because of his wealth. Who can tell now what place he occupied in the world? Was he a merchant, a king, a money-lender, or a pirate? What did he do, and what became of him? His name has been used as a symbol of enormous wealth and means nothing more. Ages ago, another man walked, and talked, and worked among the common people for a few years and then died in poverty a shameful death. He had no money, no military nor political forces, and very few influential friends. He was arrested, charged with crime, and his handful of followers forsook him and fled. Measured by most of the prevailing standards of power his work was doomed to failure and his name to quick oblivion. Yet he freely chose his poverty and ignominy and by the strange power of it his name has been exalted above every other name, and his work has redeemed a world. It has been said of him that he might have been a mere Crœsus, or a mere Cæsar, but he cast aside the petty power they grasped so greedily and rested his whole cause upon the prevailing might of heart power.

HAVE you anything to do? Put heart power into it. No life has ever become great, and no work has ever gained real success without the impulse in it of an eager heart. Search every achievement in science or art, in literature or music; hunt out the source and the life of every great movement for advancement and uplift, and if you go deep enough you will find at the beginning and at the very center of it a burning, throbbing heart.

Reform movements, political parties, and propaganda of every sort have been urged again and again for purely economic or theoretical reasons, and they have found partial acceptance for a time, but never have they won great success unless there was behind them and all through them a passion of human hearts. Patriotism, and service to the weak, and brotherhood will unite men, while questions of tariff will divide them. Man's brain is more liable to error than his heart. It will never carry him as far nor as high. It will never enable him to "endure hardness like a good soldier." It will never impel him to self-sacrifice for the good of others. It was not the music of Jenny Lind's wonderful voice as she sang at the Leeds Festival, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," which led a young man in Dr. Forest's parish to give his heart to Christ. It was the heart of the singer, who testified that she never sang the song without first asking God that it might be blessed to at least one soul in her audience. It was the passion of faith and love in her own heart which carried conviction and kindled a flame in another heart.

AS TO charity and welfare work, it is all very edifying to analyze the economic value of a man, his part in the wealth of the state, his share in the work of the community, the expense of his keep if he becomes a public charge. But what chance would a Bowery Mission have if its plea for support were based alone upon such argument? It is the love of men and women, the burning passion for saving a fallen, homeless, needy brother, which keeps the doors of the Bowery Mission open with its glad welcome, gives warmth and clothing and food to cold, hungry wanderers, and saves their lives from slipping away forever into darkness and anguish.

Paul had no use for cold-blooded charity. He urged again and again the burning heart—burning with the fervent heat of love. "Above all things," he said, "have fervent charity among yourselves." In fellowship, in service, in prayer, he proclaimed the need of heart power, of a heart burning with a passion which would prevail over every hindrance. "See that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently"—no mere conventional affection. "Fervent in spirit, serving the Lord"—no perfunctory service resting on habit and organization. "The fervent effectual prayer of a righteous man availeth much"—no repeating of accustomed phrases which reach no higher than the ceiling.

There is unceasing need for heart passion to combat the coldness of the world. If a cause is worth advocating, if a work is worth doing, if a friend is worth loving, if a life is worth living, put heart power into it.

HE KNOWS

IN THE times of trial and trouble,
When the way was hard to find,
And with tears that came unbidden
My eyes were often blind,
I have always found a comfort
For all life's bitterest woes
In the thought that, whate'er befalls me,
My loving Father knows.

Our feet may miss the pathway
That leads into happier lands;
Our backs may be bowed with burdens,
And cares fill hearts and hands;
But, though the way may be thorny
And the winds of sorrow blow,
We've a Friend that will never fail us,
For God will be sure to know.

So in the shadow and sunshine
That checkers this lower land
God always seems close beside me—
I can reach and touch his hand.
And a peace that is deep and lasting
The comforting thought bestows—
No matter what may befall me,
My loving Father knows!

EBEN E. REXFORD.

Dr. Clark in Jerusalem

WE HAVE reached Jerusalem on our second long journey following "in the footsteps of St. Paul," and as these journeys are made especially in the interest of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I thought your readers would like to know something of our itinerary. After spending a few days in Jerusalem (where St. Paul went to school, and which he visited several times in later life) we shall go back to Jaffa, and thence to Haifa by land, in order to visit Cæsarea, from which port St. Paul sailed as a prisoner on his last journey to Rome. Then we expect to go to Damascus by way of Nazareth to see the scene of St. Paul's conversion and enlightenment in the Christian faith. Later, from Beirut we hope to go to Tyre and Sidon, most interesting cities of antiquity, and also connected with St. Paul's wanderings.

Then we expect to go to Antioch of Syria, where the disciples were first called Christians. From this city St. Paul started on more than one of his missionary journeys. This is a difficult city to reach in these days, and, like Cæsarea, Tyre and Sidon, is seldom visited by Christians.

After this we shall probably sail back to Alexandria from Beirut or Alexandretta, and there take ship for Sicily for the sake of going to Syracuse and Rhegium, both of which cities are connected with Paul's pilgrimages. Then we shall go to Pozzuoli, near Naples, where Paul landed, and thence to Rome, where he met his martyrdom.

Thus, with the journey taken last year in Macedonia, Greece and Asia Minor, we shall have visited all the principal places that St. Paul is known to have touched, as well as the "Seven Cities of Asia." We shall appreciate the interest and prayers of the editors and readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for this journey, especially as the country just now is disturbed by war and rumors of war.

Faithfully yours,
FRANCIS E. CLARK.
Jerusalem, October 29.

HOW CHRISTMAS CAME TO MISS LAVINIA

BY ALICE E. ALLEN

A Story Complete in This Issue

THERE ain't one mite of Christmas coming into this house this year, Samuel Parsons," said Miss Lavinia. "Not one mite." Miss Lavinia closed the door with a slam upon the unfortunate vendors of Christmas postcards.

Samuel started to speak and thought better of it.

"What say, Samuel?" asked Miss Lavinia.

"I sort 'o cleared my throat," said the old man apologetically.

"Ever since last Christmas," said Miss Lavinia, now emphasizing her words with sharp snips of the scissors in her carpet-rags, "I've been thinking things over. We had a dozen or so things we couldn't be expected to want. We gave a dozen or so we didn't want to give—and probably the folks we gave 'em to didn't want 'em. I've decided there's such a thing as too much Christmas. We had enough last year to keep us goin' for two—mebby three—years. And this year there ain't a mite of it goin' to get in here with my consent and approbation. I'm goin' to notify folks." Miss Lavinia glanced at her brother over her spectacles, her keen dark eyes boring into his thoughts like gimlets.

"I ain't said nothin', Lavin'," said Samuel uneasily.

"But you're a thinkin', Samuel, and you know it," said Miss Lavinia. "Christmas ain't ever quite so bad on a man as 'tis on a woman. He just hands out the money. She has to work her brain threadbare plannin' how to do the very most with it, and her fingers to the bone doin' it. You went without that overcoat, though—"

"The season was so extra mild," said the old man, "I didn't need it none."

"You didn't know 'twas goin' to be," snapped Miss Lavinia. "You went without it just so we could give a few extra things to folks who didn't need 'em. Then didn't Ordelia tell Dolly Ann and Dolly Ann told me she'd a good deal rather have had a pinkish-lavender shawl than a bluish-lavender one? And didn't Ordelia's little Ordelia say she wished Aunt Vinnie'd made a red dress for her dolly 'stead of a blue one—'cause her dolly liked red the best? You can't suit even children and dolls at Christmas, any more, to say nothin' of grown-ups."

"We found a leetle fault, too, didn't we, Lavin'?" said Samuel.

"Who wouldn't?" cried Miss Lavinia. "I had six neck mufflers, Sam, and every one who knows me well enough to give me a Christmas present knows I never tie up my throat. And how about slippers, Samuel—those left-overs from the church sale?"

Samuel grunted.

"That's where the shoe pinches," said Miss Lavinia, not without a humorous appreciation of the aptness of her speech. "And gettin' and givin' things ain't all there is to it." She gave a vicious snip with her shears. "It's the thousand and one extras you're asked to do—getting things ready for church sales and poor-boxes and trees—I've got so I just hate the smell of popcorn, Samuel."

"Well," said Samuel. He twisted his foot anxiously in the ill-fitting slipper. "Mebby you're right. But it sort o' seems to me that you can try as hard as you want to keep Christmas out and somehow you just can't. I don't know why—but somehow you can't, Lavin'. That's just my way of thinkin'," he added humbly.

"We'll see," said Miss Lavinia, as she began winding the red carpet-rags into a firm round ball. "Not a scrap or a sign of Christmas is comin' into this house this year with my consent. Not a gift, nor a card, nor a message, nor a bit of holly, nor nothin'."

"Sort o' seems," said the old man with mild persistence, "that Christmas ain't really none o' them things, Lavin'. And I don't believe keepin' them out will keep out Christmas. It'll creep in somewheres."

"We'll see," said Miss Lavinia grimly.

"She'll do it," said Samuel the next morning when he talked things over with Lindy. "Lavin'll do it, Lindy. She always does what she sets out to do."

Lindy was the little orphaned school teacher who taught the dozen or so youngsters in the schoolhouse down the hill. She had found a good home with old Samuel Parsons and his sister, Miss Lavinia.

"Aunt Vinnie's tired herself all out with Christmas doing and giving," she said cheerily, "that's all, Uncle Samuel. Just you wait—something'll happen—you'll see."

"The day of mer'cles is past, Lindy," said the old man solemnly, "and 'twould take a perty good-sized mer'cle to stir Lavin' when once she makes up her mind."

It certainly looked as if Samuel was right. Miss Lavinia stuck grimly and silently to her determination. She declined outright to be present at the meeting of the Sewing Society to arrange for the annual Christmas box. She refused to donate her usual crocheted shawl to the church sale. When the subject of a Christmas tree was brought up in

Drawn by Joseph Cummings Chase

"I wants my mudder. I wants my fadder. I wants my Christmas tree"

Sunday school she arose and walked out of the church.

Everybody in the straggling little village knew that this year Miss Lavinia Parsons wasn't going to let a mite of Christmas get into her house.

Lindy, who was preparing a Christmas tree for her little flock, staid at the schoolhouse every night to make bags for the candy.

She kept her gifts at Ethel Davidson's, who lived in the one big house in the village. And all the rehearsing of verses and songs was done at the schoolhouse or at Ethel's.

One night, Samuel sat in his warm corner with his newspaper. Miss Lavinia snipped and sewed and wound carpet-rags. Lindy was knitting something in bright crimson silk. It looked like a necktie. Miss Lavinia feared it might be a Christmas gift. But she didn't ask. As Lindy's slender fingers moved in and out of the crimson meshes she sang softly, unconsciously:

O little town of Bethlehem!
How still we see thee lie!

Miss Lavinia glanced at her nervously. Her lips set themselves in uncompromising lines. She loved to hear Lindy sing—in fact, there was nothing that Lindy did or wore or said that Miss Lavinia didn't love. But— She opened her lips to speak, then closed them again.

The lamplight fell caressingly over Lindy's brown head, bent just enough to show the kissable spot at the nape of the neck. But it fell, too, on a long strand of twisted red and green wool, which clung to the back of Lindy's school gown. The immediate Christmas suggestion of the colors hardened Miss Lavinia's heart.

Above thy deep and dreamless sleep,
The silent stars go by, trilled Lindy unconsciously, her voice sweet as rippling waters.

Unconsciously, too, Samuel began to beat out the time with one rheumatic old foot. The sight of that foot, too big for its Christmas slipper, was too much.

"Sing something else, Lindy," said Miss Lavinia. "I'm sick and tired of Christmas hymns. Seems if—"

Lindy laughed softly.

"I'll sing Yankee Doodle," she said. And she did, till the living-room rang and Samuel quite forgot he'd ever had rheumatism.

But late that night, as Miss Lavinia was going off into her first sleep, a little hushed voice rippled across the darkness:

How silently, how silently,
The wondrous gift is given!

"For the land sake," said Miss Lavinia, as she turned over with her dear ear uppermost. But even deafness didn't keep Christmas out of her dreams. She dreamed all night of having to give every one in the world knitted slippers and crocheted ties, and awoke quite worn out the next morning.

Whether or not it was coming to Miss Lavinia, to the rest of the little village away up in the hills, Christmas was on the way. Each shortening day with its flurries of snowflakes and shimmers of sunshine, brought it nearer. There was a thrill in the air—not all of the first fairness of freshly fallen snow, not all of deepening cold, nor of frozen river and brightening stars. There was a joy, too—Miss Lavinia saw it reflected from faces everywhere, heard it echoing from every voice, felt it in the silence of her own heart, as if again, the Christmas angels were brooding above the earth with the message of peace and good will.

The day before Christmas Miss Lavinia and Samuel were going to town. It was not a Christmasing expedition Miss Lavinia made plain at the dinner table.

"I'm goin' to take my rags over to Christine Savage. Folks say she does real good weavin'. I'm goin' to have a rug to sort of brighten up the livin'-room."

"I won't be home until late, Aunt Vinnie," said Lindy. "There are so many things to pick up after the exercises at the schoolhouse. Ethel will help me—and her cousin John."

"John Davidson here again?" said Miss Lavinia. "What's he come here visitin' so often for?"

"I don't know, Aunt Vinnie."

"Hum-m," said Miss Lavinia with a glance at Lindy's reddening cheeks; "well—he's a mighty fine young man—John Davidson is."

"Yes," murmured Lindy.

Half an hour later the old wagon—there wasn't quite enough snow for sleighing—with the box of rags in back and Samuel and Miss Lavinia on the seat, rattled along the frozen road toward town. On their arrival there, Miss Lavinia climbed out at a small house on the main street. Samuel set the box of rags on the porch.

"I'll put Dolly in Barnes's shed," he called back, as he rattled out of the yard. "I'm goin' with Granther Barnes to look at a horse he wants to buy."

Barnes's shed wasn't far from Christine's. After Miss Lavinia had arranged for the rug, she walked slowly up the street, tugging the big empty box with her.

As she set the box in the wagon she noticed

THE "MILLION" MARK

IF every member of the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will carefully read every word on the following four pages, and will act upon the suggestions contained therein, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will at last reach the Million Mark.

It was the dream of the late Dr. Klopsch that the time would come when he would be able to send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week into one million homes. How hard he struggled to bring this about, every old member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family knows; and ever since his death we, who have followed in his foot-steps, have been trying our utmost to make his dream come true.

At first glance it would seem to be an easy task—this accomplishment of the Million Mark. There are millions of Protestant homes in the United States, and surely it would seem that every one of these Christian homes would demand, not alone desire, such a weekly paper as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. But while we have steadily progressed, the way has been hard nevertheless. For there are obstacles which no one, not directly concerned, could realize.

In order to be appreciated, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD must be read, not once, but many times. And to have it read many times in families where it has never before been taken, requires an expenditure of time, ingenuity, and money. It cannot be circulated free. There are, for instance, the limitations of the Post Office Department, which impose upon publications certain rules which are meant to safe-guard the interests of the public.

There is, moreover, the cost of paper and of printing to be considered, which, in the case of so well illustrated a periodical as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, amounts to many thousand dollars in the course of the year.

However, we have had the faith to believe that if THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can be introduced into new Christian homes and read there long enough, it will become a fixture therein. And as each Christian home becomes a new working adjunct to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family as a whole, so the accretion will necessarily go on until not only the Million Mark, but even a higher standard will be reached. It is hardly necessary to point out the influence which would be possessed by such an army of earnest workers.

The greater the circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the greater will be its power for doing good in the world. We can give you a better and bigger paper; we can enter into campaigns for the common good with the assurance of wider success than ever before. We can extend CHRISTIAN HERALD enterprises — your enterprises — as we have never been able to extend them before.

But how shall we bring it about? The figures are climbing slowly, but steadily. But how shall we accelerate them? How shall we cause them to mount to the Million Mark in the shortest possible time? Only with your personal help, dear Reader. If you will help us we can succeed. We know you will, and so we have provided Special Coupons for your use, each of them good for one quarter dollar on account of a four months' subscription, which brings the actual price of the paper down to twenty-five cents for one-third of a year. And in addition, for your trouble we give YOU free, the splendid premiums described on the following pages.

This is an opportunity of which every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family should take advantage. It is an opportunity which we may not be able to repeat, and certainly this coupon offer as printed here will not be repeated.

We earnestly hope that every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will realize just what this means to the broadening influence of the Family itself. Read the coupons carefully. If every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family induces but one friend to send in only one of the coupons on these pages, properly signed, the number and the influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will be doubled.

If every member induces two friends to send in a coupon each, we shall be within sighting distance of the Million Mark. And if every member induces the sending in of all four of the coupons, properly signed, we shall have gone beyond the Million Mark and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will have become the most influential congregation on earth.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

WONDERFUL PRE[M]

For Short-Term Sub[scr]ion

MORE THAN ONE MILLION COUPONS

MORE than one million coupons are printed with this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. If each of our subscribers will return only two coupons, we would be very close to the Million mark. There are more than twenty million members of Protestant churches in the United States. If you help us reach only one out of twenty, we will then have the million subscribers we are so earnestly striving for. Would you not be glad with us to know that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was being read and enjoyed in more than these million homes each week? It is easily possible for us to reach this number if you will give us your help. We co-operate with you in an extremely liberal way by offering four months' subscription for exactly one half the regular price. We do this by making each coupon worth 25 cents. It may seem wonderful to you that we can, in addition to making this special half price on the subscription itself, give such extraordinary premium values to you for so little effort on your part. We could not afford it, only that a large percentage of these short-term subscribers will renew with us this fall and be glad to pay the regular subscription price for their CHRISTIAN HERALD. They, in turn, will help to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a still wider circle among their friends and acquaintances. So you see it is of the greatest importance that you send us at least two coupons with new subscriptions. A single one may lead on and on in an ever widening circle until your single effort has produced hundreds or even thousands who have been started and helped by your initiative.

Talk The Christian Herald to Your Friends

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is widely known, and almost every Christian man and woman in America is more or less familiar with it, but many do not know of its progress and improvement during the last few years.

First, do you realize that last year we gave our readers more pages of reading matter than in the previous year, and that the year before last we gave an increased number of pages over the year before that. We shall continue during the coming year to add additional reading matter to our paper.

Call your friend's attention to our illustrations. We have the very best that money can buy. Our covers are a great feature, and we give during the year more than a score of reproductions of famous paintings.

The Six Reproductions on Art paper which are offered and described as a Grand Extra Free Premium upon this double page are examples of what we have given—and of those to come during the next year.

Take the matter of price: Our subscription rate is still $1.50 a year—the figure at which the paper was started more than thirty years ago. Thus we have continued to keep down the subscription price against the rising tide of all kinds of costs which have made it necessary for other publishers to raise their rates time and time again. It must be therefore self-evident to every CHRISTIAN HERALD subscriber that they are receiving in their paper splendid value for so low a subscription price. It will be easy to impress this fact upon your friends and get two, three, four or more to take advantage of this great special mid-summer offer of four months for half price—or only 25 cents.

Read the Coupons Carefully

Each Coupon attached hereto will be accepted in lieu of ONE-QUARTER DOLLAR, if accompanied by 25 Cents for a FOUR MONTHS' Subscription to The Christian Herald.

But no subscription induced through this offer will be permitted to take the place of one now on our books. Each subscription must be NEW.

A SUMMER DAY

One of the most attractive of the pictures we offer. The scene gives a vivid idea of a hot June day in the country. By the shadows under the trees, one can see that it is nearly noon. The quiet peace of the country stretching away to the distant mountains suggests a "Sunday stillness"—and this, with the contentment of the children, is wonderfully restful.

CHRISTMAS, THE FORGIVING SEASON*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

PEACE on earth, good will toward men." This was the glad note of the angel song when Christ was born, and Christmas bells have been echoing it ever since; and not only the bells, but heart-throbs as well; for if ever there is a time in the year when one does not want to feel mean and be mean, it is at the Christmas time.

Come thou, dear Prince, oh come to us this holy Christmas time!
Come to the busy marts of earth, the quiet homes, the noisy streets, the humble lanes,
Come to us all, and with thy love touch every human heart,
That we may know that love, and in its blessed peace
Bear charity to all mankind. EUGENE FIELD.

Nothing could be better for us to study as a Christmas forgiving-lesson than the incident assigned for our lesson to-day, which embodies Christ's teachings concerning forgiveness. The incident was one of Jesus's parable stories, and was probably given to the apostles at Capernaum, in the summer of A.D. 29, in the latter part of the third year of Christ's ministry. It was not the first time Jesus had spoken to his apostles about the duty of forgiving others (see Matt. 6: 14), and Peter had been so impressed that he had forgiven more than the Jewish teachers said was according to the law, "three times." Peter had probably forgiven seven times, and so brought the reproach of the rabbis upon himself—hence his appeal to Jesus: "Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? seven times?" How wonderful the answer of Jesus: "I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven," that is, four hundred and ninety times; that is, without number. One would get lost in trying to keep the count. A teacher once tried to represent the four hundred and ninety times on the blackboard, making one straight mark at a time, and having the class of one hundred and fifty children count aloud each mark as it was made. Now and then the teacher stopped and asked the question, "What are you counting?" "Marks," said some children. "No," said others, "we are counting how many times Jesus said we must forgive others." And when the four hundred and ninety times were counted from the blackboard, the children exclaimed, "We should think they would forget what they had to forgive." That was just the point: all bitterness would disappear before forgiveness had reached the limit.

Jesus, knowing that Peter had been taught that the threefold forgiveness was based upon Jewish law, then proceeded to instruct Peter and all of the disciples on the bedrock of the new law of forgiveness, and this he did by a parable. A king had a reckoning with his overseers or managers. One acknowledged himself greatly in debt to his master; it would seem that he had misappropriated funds—used for his own purposes the large sum of ten thousand talents—in all about ten millions of dollars. The master commanded that he and all his family should be sold as slaves, as well as all his possessions, and that payment should be made; that was according to Jewish custom (II. Kings 4: 1-7). But the defaulter prayed that he might have time to make good—to pay all. The king was so moved by the sad plight of his servant that he did more than he was asked to do—he forgave the whole debt. What followed? The man should have been humbled by such kindness; but, instead, he was so set up by his added riches that he determined to collect to the last farthing the amount which others were owing him. He came upon an associate who owed him about sixteen dollars, or a trifle more; he took him by the throat, saying: "Pay me what thou owest." The man begged that time might be given him to pay. "No!" was the response, and instead he was put in prison until he should pay the whole debt. How monstrous! The king heard about it, and sent for the unfeeling man to come into his presence. Then he recalled his mercy, and again fastened the debt upon the man, and delivered him to the tormenters until he should pay all that was due—ten million dollars.

Jesus Discoursing with His Disciples

From the Painting by J. J. Tissot

The parable thus spoken by Jesus had a deep and terrible significance: that among those men who had been redeemed and forgiven by a merciful God for all their shortcomings, some were so uncharitable that they harbored all sorts of grudges against those they thought had wronged them by word or deed; men who would not yield an inch by way of forgiveness. The carrying of a grudge is worse than carrying a bullet embedded in a bone or muscle. The bullet becomes encysted and is no longer a menace to health or life, but not so with a grudge; it becomes the center of a canker in the soul, which eats its way into immortality. Jesus pronounced woe upon the unforgiving: "So shall also your heavenly Father do unto you if ye forgive not every one his brother from your hearts." The worst tormenter to whom the unforgiving can be delivered is Self. Our worst enemies are our own unhappy and wicked thoughts. Read the biography to be found in Ps. 36: 1-4, and see if you have any personal acquaintance with the person there described.

The verse chosen for the Golden Text puts the cap sheaf upon the large harvesting of forgiveness which the whole world owes. It is this: "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you."

It is said that Louis XII, king of France, had many enemies before he succeeded to the throne. When he became king, he caused a list to be made of his persecutors, and marked against each of their names a large black cross. When this became known, the enemies of the king fled, because they thought it was a sign that he intended to punish them. But the king, hearing of their fears, caused them to be recalled, with an assurance of pardon, and said that he had put a cross beside each name to remind him of the cross of Christ, that he might endeavor to follow the example of him who had prayed for his murderers, and had exclaimed, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

We quote a story from Tarbell's Notes, which is just to our point. It will do for a teacher of little people to give her class. John and his sister Gladys were out in front of the house. Gladys was making a bead necklace for her doll. The beads were on a little work table beside her. John was playing at trains. "Don't come here, John," said Gladys. But John soon forgot his sister's warning. The train came around the corner, and before he knew it the table was upset and the beads were scattered in every direction. "Oh, John," cried Gladys, with an angry face, "what did I tell you?" "I'm awfully sorry," said John, as he helped to pick up the beads. Gladys did not answer for a moment, and then she said, "Never mind, John, I'll forgive you," for she remembered the lesson she was studying for next Sunday about Jesus telling Peter that he must forgive others seventy times seven. "I'll keep a forgiveness account," she said to herself, "so as to know when it's seventy times seven." Before she went to bed she wrote at the top of a clean page in her last year's copy-book: "List of times I forgive John," and under this: "Monday, for spilling my beads." Then she remembered that on that very day she had upset a block tower John had built to show his father when he should come home, and John had not been the least cross with her. She then wrote on the other side of the page, "The times John forgives me: Monday, for knocking down his tower." That made them even. And so day after day it went on. One day she had the longer list, and another day John had it—often they were even. And Gladys was beginning to feel very humble, and said to herself: "I guess if I forgive all I can without keeping any list, it will take me all my life to make four hundred and ninety times. Perhaps, after all, that was what Jesus meant.

Let us determine, at this Christmas-forgiving season, we shall clean up the record by going to each person we have "something against," saying that we wish to forgive and to be forgiven. Let us begin now so as to get the slate clean before the anniversary of the angels' song: "Peace on earth, good will toward men." It will be the grandest tribute of praise we can give to the Prince of Peace.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for December 15, 1912. Forgiveness. Matt. 18: 15-35. GOLDEN TEXT: "Be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you." Eph. 4: 32.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—IN THE RECENT annual gathering of the District of Columbia Sunday School Convention, at Washington, Mr. W. C. Pearce, the superintendent of the Adult Department of the International Sunday School Association, gave a lecture illustrated by the stereopticon, showing men's classes held in churches, in mines, mills, manufactories, railroad round-houses, battleships, mostly at the noon hour on some week day, for Bible study, even the cowboy class standing beside their ponies—some of them having ridden twenty-one miles to attend. Mr. Pearce stated that within the last four years one million and a half of men have joined the Sunday school in these men's classes.

THE EDITOR OF THE Round Table has heard and read thousands of incidents of conversion, not one of which occurred on Christmas, the very day on which Christ should be born in more souls than on any other day of the year. Surely this is proof that our celebrations are radically lacking in this respect. As it is very hard for one home or one Sunday school to reform its Christmas alone, there ought to be a town council of pastors, superintendents, teachers and parents to study prayerfully the reason why the day when Christ became a child for the very purpose of showing that a child may be like Christ fails to carry that message effectively. Is it not that the children incongruously and by our fault celebrate too much by getting instead of giving? Many, instead of thinking joyfully what they can give to those less favored, in imitation of Him who "for our sakes became poor," are thinking what they will get. We believe that children, and especially boys and girls in altruistic teens would enter joyfully into some plan by which one or several Sunday schools—or, better, all the Sunday schools of a city—should celebrate Christmas by carrying loads of gifts to an orphanage, or to the scattered poor, or to a newsboys' home, or sending barrels of gifts to the children of home missionaries, or gifts of money to Sunday schools in missionary lands.

—SOME SUNDAY SCHOOLS have had a happy success in getting pupils to bring each on Christmas a pound for the poor wrapped so that the poor child's gift of a pound of potatoes looks no less valuable than a pound of anything else. But even such giving is not enough—nothing but the self-giving to Christ of a multitude of children all over the land and world will ever make a fitting celebration of the fact which Christmas represents—that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." He says:

"I gave, I gave rich gifts for thee—
Hast thou given aught for me?"

Why not add to the thought of the giving of gifts and make the one absorbing thought of Christmas the giving of hearts to Christ? With that the giving of a generous sheaf of the year's savings to the agencies that make known to all the world that God loves and gives and calls us to love and give to God and man, to our own great gladness as well as theirs. In any case, the very holy of holies of Christmas should be some sweet, quiet meeting of children where they can be gently shown the fitness of giving themselves to Christ freely, fully and forever. The best Christmas tree is the tree of life, whose root is love, whose trunk is law, whose sap is life, whose fruit is liberty.

[CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are beginning to send suggestions for this Round Table. More are invited, especially from superintendents who have seen good results accomplished in their own schools or others. Send them to Wilbur F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.]

SHOPPING, AN ART OR A MANIA?

A GENTLEWOMAN who has spent many years abroad commented unfavorably in conversation with a friend on the manners of the American woman when she goes on a round of shopping. She said:

"It would not occur to me to omit 'Good morning' or 'Good afternoon' when I addressed the young woman who waits on me in a shop, nor should I ever think of going out after buying what I wanted without thanking her for the trouble she had taken. I have seen surprise on the faces of saleswomen when I have addressed them courteously and have noticed smiles on the countenances of people around me. I shall continue to be as polite at home as I learned to be on the other side of the Atlantic."

Another woman, young, beautiful and gifted, was called from earth to heaven suddenly a few years ago. In a sketch of her life written by a friend the statement was made that she never entered a department store in New York without diffusing around her an atmosphere of good cheer. She had friends at every counter, and as she passed along the aisles would nod a greeting or toss a pleasant word to the girls who sold ribbons and laces and to others whom she remembered and who never forgot her. She would stop an instant to say at the glove counter, to one of the young women:

"You were not very well last week. Are you feeling better now?" To another she would bring a rose or bunch of violets and say, "I thought of you this morning and brought the flowers for you. Perhaps you will take them home this evening to your sick mother."

The name of this gracious lady was Janet McCook Whitman, and there were a great many people in various stations in society who missed and mourned her when God called her hence. She was grace and graciousness personified. Why should we keep our good manners and our courtesy for one set of friends, and not carry them with us to offices and shops and everywhere else on the road of life? It costs nothing to be considerate.

On a tombstone in a New England cemetery, under the name of the silent sleeper, the simple phrase is inscribed, "She was so pleasant."

NOW for a little talk about shopping. With the recurrence of Christmas the shops and stores all over the land are gay with myriad colors. The red and green of the decorations mingle with rainbow tints of the holiday goods the merchants have spread to tempt our generosity and our pocket books. Like magnets the shops and their windows draw us to them. We all must do some shopping. In our Family Circle are many who may spend lavishly for the joy of others on Christmas morning. There are some who must burden small gifts with the love they would send to friends and dear ones. Then, too, there are some for whom the rest of us must provide the cheer of this season when we celebrate the greatest gift of all the ages—the birth of Christ. So we hie us to the shops impelled by the love that fills all the air—but we come home tired and nerve-worn. This shopping takes such a lot of energy! Is there any way we can help matters?

In the first place, the woman whose object it is to spend some hours in this interesting pursuit should know beforehand what she intends to buy and how much she can afford to spend. Then she should make a list and economize time and strength by systematizing her errands. When she is selecting toys or gloves or sweaters or skates, she may as well complete all the business she has in that store or portion of the store. In the larger stores there are goods to be found in the basement; there are goods distributed over a dozen other floors and galleries; thoughtless chasing may make your task a frightful burden. By itemizing her purchases and, above all, by making quick decisions and satisfying herself that she is not going beyond her margin, the lady who sets out on a Christmas shopping tour will go back from it feeling as a victorious general does when the battle is over. She may be tired, but she is proudly satisfied.

The woman to whom shopping is merely a foolish way of killing time is wantonly wasteful unless her object is to tell other people where to find specific articles and how much they will probably cost. If this be her purpose she is not a mere spendthrift of time. Clerks and salespeople in general soon learn to discriminate between the shopper who comes with intention and the other who has not the slightest idea of doing anything except amuse herself. She who needlessly obliges men to unroll and display heavy rugs and carpets, she who allows bales to be taken from shelves and exhibited, she who handles all the small objects displayed and stops to price many things she has no intention of buying, she, in fact, who makes useless trouble, is not a thoroughly worthy member of her sex. Women who are deliberately reckless of other people's time are to blame because they give color to assertions continually made as to the childishness of the ordinary woman. Few of us deserve to be stigmatized as immature, stupid or silly, and we cannot help resenting the occasional patronage of those who seem to think that women never grow up.

THIS has been said so often that you may well be tired of hearing it, but please let me remind you once more of the weeks of arduous labor for the men and women behind the counters, in the packing-rooms and on the delivery wagons. Their feet will be tired, their nerves will be strained and their heads will ache when the days of the final rush come. Let us each try to ease their burdens by buying early, by deciding promptly, and by taking the Christmas spirit with us as we buy.

JUST one thing more before we leave the subject of shopping. This is for all the year and is not particularly Christmasy. The word "bargain" is irresistible to a multitude of shoppers. There are women who do not understand that ninety-eight cents lacks only two cents of being a dollar. There are others who have never learned that there are seasons in the year when one may buy to advantage and secure for future use materials at a reduced cost that will compare in quality and style with stuffs that cost far more at another season.

Unless a woman has a large and sufficient income she would very much better pay as she goes than shop on the credit system. Husbands occasionally prefer to settle their bills monthly and let their wives purchase goods on account. Watch these expenditures most carefully, for the business man sometimes criticizes items that seem superfluous, and the wife is not quite happy in explaining why she wanted this or the other bit of trimming.

A Christmas Quotation

ARE you willing to stoop down and consider the needs and desires of little children; to remember the weakness and loneliness of people who are growing old; to stop asking how much friends love you, and to ask yourself whether you love them enough; to bear in mind the other things that other people have to bear in their hearts; to try to understand what those who live in the same house with you really want without waiting for them to tell you; to trim your lamp so that it will give you more light and less smoke, and to carry it in front so that your shadow will fall behind you; to make a grave for your ugly thoughts, and a garden for your kindly feelings with the gate open—are you willing to do these things for a day? Then you can keep Christmas.—Henry Van Dyke.

THE YOUNG MOTHER

From a painting by B. L. Blommers

chow her when she was even littler than you. You see, I used ter work in the garden—then."

Pollyanna caught her breath audibly.

"You did? And you knew my mother, really—when she was just a little earth angel, and not a heaven one? Oh, please tell me about her!" And down plumped Pollyanna in the middle of the dirt path by the old man's side.

A bell sounded in the house. The next moment Nancy was seen flying out the back door.

"Miss Pollyanna, that bell means breakfast — mornin's," she panted, pulling the little girl to her feet and hurrying her back to the house; "and other times it means other meals. But it always means that you're ter run like time when you hear it, no matter where you be. If you don't—well, it'll take somethin' smarter'n we be ter find anythin' ter be glad about in that!" she finished, shooing Pollyanna into the house as she would shoo an unruly chicken into a coop.

Breakfast, for the first five minutes, was a silent meal; then Miss Polly, her disapproving eyes following the airy wings of two flies darting here and there over the table, said sternly:

"Nancy, where did those flies come from?"

"I don't know, ma'am. There wasn't one in the kitchen." Nancy had been too excited to notice Pollyanna's upflung windows the afternoon before.

"I reckon maybe they're my flies, Aunt Polly," observed Pollyanna, amiably. "There were lots of them this morning having a beautiful time upstairs."

Nancy left the room precipitately, though to do so she had to carry out the hot muffins she had just brought in.

"Yours!" gasped Miss Polly. "You mean you raised those windows without any screens?

"Why, yes. There weren't any screens there, Aunt Polly."

Nancy, at this moment, came in again with the muffins. Her face was grave, but very red.

"Nancy," directed her mistress, sharply, "you may set the muffins down and go at once to Miss Pollyanna's room and shut the windows. Shut the doors, also. Later, when your morning work is done, go through every room with the spatter. See that you make a thorough search."

To her niece she said:

"Pollyanna, I have ordered screens for those windows. I knew, of course, that it was my duty to do that. But it seems to me that you have quite forgotten your duty."

"My—duty?" Pollyanna's eyes were wide with wonder.

"Certainly. I know it is warm, but I consider it your duty to keep your windows closed till those screens come. Flies, Pollyanna, are not only unclean and annoying, but very dangerous to health. After breakfast I will give you a little pamphlet on this matter to read."

"To read? Oh, thank you, Aunt Polly. I love to read!"

Miss Polly drew in her breath audibly, then she shut her lips together hard. She did not speak, indeed, until the meal was over. Then she rose, went to the bookcase in the sitting-room and took out a small booklet.

"This is the article I spoke of, Pollyanna. I desire you to go to your room at once and read it. I will be up in half an hour to look over your things."

Pollyanna, her eyes on the illustration of a fly's head many times magnified, cried joyously:

"Oh, thank you, Aunt Polly!" The next moment she skipped merrily from the room.

Half an hour later when Miss Polly, her face expressing stern duty in every line, climbed the stairs and entered Pollyanna's room, she was greeted with a gay burst of eager enthusiasm.

"Oh, Aunt Polly, I never saw anything so perfectly lovely and interesting in my life. I'm so glad you gave me that book to read! Why, I didn't suppose flies could carry such a lot of things on their feet, and—"

"That will do," observed Aunt Polly, with dignity. "Pollyanna, you may bring out your clothes now. What are not suitable for you I shall give to the Deans, of course."

"You have been to school, of course, Pollyanna?" asked Miss Polly a moment later, as she inspected her niece's pitiful little wardrobe.

"Oh, yes, Aunt Polly. Besides, fath— I mean, I was taught at home some, too."

Miss Polly frowned.

"Very good. In the fall you will enter school here, of course. Meanwhile, I suppose I ought to hear you read aloud half an hour each day. Have you studied music?"

"Not much. I don't like my music—I like other people's, though; but I'd just as soon let that go as not, Aunt Polly. I'd rather, truly."

"Very likely," observed Aunt Polly, with slightly uplifted eyebrows. "Nevertheless I think it is my duty to see that you are properly instructed in at least the rudiments of music. You sew, of course."

"Yes, ma'am," Pollyanna sighed. "The Ladies' Aid taught me that. But I had an awful time. Mrs. Jones didn't believe in holding your needle like the rest of 'em did in buttonholing, and Mrs. White thought backstitching ought to be taught you before hemming (or else the other way), and Mrs. Harriman didn't believe in putting you on patchwork ever, at all."

"Well, there will be no difficulty of that kind any longer, Pollyanna. I shall teach you sewing myself, of course. You do not know how to cook, I presume."

Pollyanna laughed suddenly.

"They were just beginning to teach me that this summer, but I hadn't got far. They were more divided up on that than they were on the sewing."

Miss Polly paused a moment, then went on slowly: "At nine o'clock every morning you will read aloud one-half hour to me. Before that you will use the time to put this room in order. Wednesday and Saturday forenoons, after half past nine, you will spend with Nancy in the kitchen, learning to cook. Other mornings you will sew with me. That will leave the afternoons for your music," she finished decisively, as she arose from her chair.

Pollyanna cried out in dismay.

"Oh, but, Aunt Polly, Aunt Polly, you haven't left me any time at all just to—to live."

"To live, child! What do you mean? As if you weren't living all the time!"

"Oh, of course I'd be breathing all the time I was doing those things, Aunt Polly, but I wouldn't be living. You breathe all the time you're asleep, but you aren't living. I mean living—doing the things you want to do: playing outdoors, climbing hills, talking to Mr. Tom in the garden, and Nancy, and finding out all about the houses and the people and everything everywhere all through the perfectly lovely streets I came through yesterday. That's what I call living, Aunt Polly. Just breathing isn't living!"

Miss Polly lifted her head irritably.

"Pollyanna, you are the most extraordinary child! You will be allowed a proper amount of playtime, of course. But, surely, it seems to me if I am willing to do my duty in seeing that you have proper care and instruction, you ought to be willing to do yours by seeing that that care and instruction are not ungratefully wasted."

Pollyanna looked shocked.

"Oh, Aunt Polly! as if I ever could be ungrateful to you! Why, I love you—and you aren't even a Ladies' Aider; you're an aunt!"

A Little Detective on a Great Machine

Accuracy is the basic principle of the Remington Adding and Subtracting Typewriter

Visible Writing and Adding (Wahl Adding Mechanism)

The machine is accurate. But this is not all. It enforces accuracy on those who use it. Likewise it admonishes to accuracy all those on whose work it affords a check.

It detects errors. Likewise prevents errors. Fewer errors are made in every office where the

Remington

Adding and Subtracting Typewriter is used. Why? Because every clerk knows that this machine will infallibly detect his errors and this knowledge makes him more careful in everything that he does.

Thus the machine adds accuracy to mechanical labor saving in every kind of work where writing and adding are done on the same page.

POLLYANNA

"Very well; then see that you do not act ungrateful," vouchsafed Miss Polly, as she turned toward the door.

She had gone halfway down the stairs when a small unsteady voice called after her:

"Please, Aunt Polly, you didn't tell me which of my things you wanted to —to give away."

Aunt Polly emitted a tired sigh, a sigh that ascended straight to Pollyanna's ears.

"Oh, I forgot to tell you, Pollyanna. Timothy will drive us into town at half past one this afternoon. Not one of your garments is fit for my niece to wear. Certainly I should be very far from doing my duty by you if I should let you appear out in any one of them."

Pollyanna sighed now; she believed she was going to hate that word—duty.

"Aunt Polly, please," she called wistfully, "isn't there any way you can be glad about all that—duty business?"

"What?" Miss Polly looked up in dazed surprise; then, suddenly, with very red cheeks, she turned and swept down the stairs. "Don't be impertinent, Pollyanna!"

In the hot little attic room Pollyanna dropped herself sorrowfully into one of the straight-backed chairs. To her, existence loomed ahead one endless round of duty.

"I don't see, really, what there was impertinent about that," she sighed. "I was only asking her if she couldn't tell me something to be glad about in all that duty business."

For several minutes Pollyanna sat in silence, her rueful eyes fixed on the forlorn heap of garments on the bed. Then, slowly, she rose and began to lay the dresses away.

"There just isn't anything to be glad about that I can see," she said aloud; "unless—it's to be glad when the duty's done!" Whereupon she laughed suddenly.

At half past one o'clock Timothy drove Miss Polly and her niece to the four or five principal dry goods stores, which were about half a mile from the homestead. The shopping expedition consumed the entire afternoon; then came supper and a delightful talk with Old Tom in the garden, and another with Nancy on the back porch, after the dishes were done and while Aunt Polly paid a visit to a neighbor.

Old Tom told Pollyanna wonderful things of her mother, that made her very happy, indeed; and Nancy told her all about the little farm six miles away at "The Corners," where lived her own dear mother, and her three equally dear brother and sisters. She promised, too, that sometime, if Miss Polly were willing, Pollyanna should be taken to see them.

"And they've got lovely names, too. You'll like their names," sighed Nancy. "They're 'Algernon' and 'Florabelle' and 'Estelle.' I—I just hate 'Nancy'!"

"Oh, Nancy, what a dreadful thing to say! Why?"

"Because it isn't pretty like the others. You see, I was the first baby, and mother hadn't begun ter read so many stories with the pretty names in them, then."

"But I love 'Nancy,' just because it's you," declared Pollyanna.

"Humph! Well, I guess you could love 'Clarissa Mabelle' just as well," retorted Nancy; "and it would be a heap happier for me. I think that name's jest grand!"

Pollyanna laughed.

"Well, anyhow," she chuckled, "you can be glad it isn't 'Hephzibah.'"

"Hephzibah?"

"Yes. Mrs. White's name is that. Her husband calls her 'Hep,' and she doesn't like it. She says when he calls out 'Hep—Hep!' she feels just as if the next minute he was going to yell 'Hurrah!' And she doesn't like to be hurrahed at."

Nancy's gloomy face relaxed into a broad smile.

"Well, if you don't beat the Dutch! Say, do you know? I shan't never hear 'Nancy' now that I don't think o' that 'Hep—Hep!' and giggle. My, I guess I am glad—" She stopped short and turned amazed eyes on the little girl: "Say, Miss Pollyanna, do you mean—was you playin' that 'ere game then—about my bein' glad I wan't 'Hephzibah'?"

Pollyanna frowned; then she laughed.

"Why, Nancy, that's so! I was playing the game—but that's one of the times I just did it without thinking, I reckon. You see, you do, lots of times; you get so used to it—looking for something to be glad about, you know. And most generally there is something about everything that you can be glad about, if you keep hunting long enough to find it."

"Well, m-maybe," granted Nancy, with open doubt.

At half past eight Pollyanna went up to bed. The screens had not yet come, and the close little room was like an oven. With longing eyes Pollyanna looked at the two fast-closed windows —but she did not raise them. She undressed, folded her clothes neatly, said her prayers, blew out her candle, and climbed into bed. Just how long she lay in sleepless misery, tossing from side to side of the hot little bed, she did not know; but it seemed to her that it must have been hours before she finally slipped out of bed, felt her way across the room and opened her door.

Out in the main attic all was velvet blackness save where the moon flung a path of silver halfway across the floor from the east window. With a resolute ignoring of that fearsome darkness to the right and to the left, Pollyanna drew a quick breath and pattered straight into that silvery path, and on to the window. Outside, there was a wide world of fairylike beauty, and there was, too, she knew, fresh, sweet air that would feel so good to hot cheeks and hands!

As she stepped nearer and peered longingly out, she saw, only a little way below the window, the wide, flat tin roof of Miss Polly's sun parlor built over the porte-cochère. The sight filled her with longing. If only now her bed were out there! And folks did sleep out of doors. Joel Hartley at home, who was so sick with the consumption, had to sleep out of doors.

Suddenly Pollyanna remembered that she had seen near this attic window a row of long white bags hanging from nails. Nancy had said that they contained winter clothes, put away for the summer. A little fearfully now, Pollyanna felt her way to these bags, selected a nice fat soft one (it contained Miss Polly's sealskin coat) for a bed and a thinner one to be doubled up for a pillow, and still another (which was so thin it seemed almost empty) for a covering. Thus equipped, Pollyanna in high glee pattered to the moonlit window again, raised the sash, stuffed her burden through to the roof below, then let herself down after it, closing the window carefully behind her—Pollyanna had not forgotten those flies with the marvelous feet that carried things.

How deliciously cool it was! Pollyanna danced up and down with delight. The tin roof under her feet crackled with little resounding snaps that Pollyanna rather liked. Finally, with a sigh of content, she curled herself up on the sealskin coat mattress, arranged one bag for a pillow and the other for a covering, and settled herself to sleep.

"I'm so glad now that the screens didn't come," she murmured, blinking up at the stars; "else I couldn't have had this!"

Downstairs in Miss Polly's room next the sun parlor, Miss Polly herself was hurrying into dressing gown and slippers, her face white and frightened. A minute before she had been telephoning in a shaking voice to Timothy:

"Come up quick!—you and your father. Bring lanterns. Somebody is on the roof of the sun parlor. I have locked the attic door down here—but hurry, quick!"

Some time later, Pollyanna, just dropping off to sleep, was startled by a lantern flash, and a trio of amazed ejaculations. She opened her eyes to find Timothy at the top of a ladder near her, Old Tom just getting through the window, and her aunt peering out at her from behind him.

"Pollyanna, what does this mean?" cried Aunt Polly then.

Pollyanna blinked sleepy eyes and sat up.

"Why, Mr. Tom—Aunt Polly!" she stammered. "Don't look so scared! It isn't that I've got the consumption, you know, like Joel Hartley! It's only that I was so hot—in there. But I shut the window, Aunt Polly, so the flies couldn't carry things in!"

Timothy disappeared suddenly down the ladder. Old Tom, with almost equal precipitation, handed his lantern to Miss Polly, and followed his son. Miss Polly bit her lip hard—until the men were gone; then she said sternly:

"Pollyanna, hand those things to me at once and come in here. Of all the extraordinary children!" she ejaculated a little later, as, with Pollyanna by her side and the lantern in her hand, she turned back into the attic.

To Pollyanna the air was all the more stifling after that cool breath of the out-of-doors; but she did not complain. She only drew a long, quivering sigh. At the top of the stairs Miss Polly jerked out crisply:

"For the rest of the night, Pollyanna, you are to sleep in my bed with me. The screens will be here to-morrow, but until then I consider it my duty to keep you where I know where you are."

Pollyanna drew in her breath.

"With you?—in your bed?" she cried rapturously. "Oh, Aunt Polly, how perfectly lovely of you! And when I've so wanted to sleep with some one some time that belonged to me, you know; not a Ladies' Aider. My! I reckon I am glad now those screens didn't come! Wouldn't you be?"

There was no reply. Miss Polly was stalking on ahead. Miss Polly, to tell the truth, was feeling curiously helpless. For the third time since Pollyanna's arrival, Miss Polly was punishing Pollyanna—and for the third time she was being confronted with the amazing fact that her punishment was being taken as a special reward of merit.

A DOCTOR'S SLEEP

Found He Had to Leave Off Coffee.

Many persons do not realize that a bad omach will cause insomnia.

Coffee and tea drinking being such an ncient and respectable form of habit, few alize that the drug—caffeine—contained coffee and tea, is one of the principal uses of dyspepsia and nervous troubles.

Without their usual portion of coffee or a, the caffeine topers are nervous, irrita- e and fretful. That's the way with a hiskey drinker. He has got to have his am "to settle his nerves"—habit.

To leave off coffee or tea is an easy atter if you want to try it, because ostum gives a gentle but natural support the nerves and does not contain any rug—nothing but food.

Physicians know this to be true, as one om Ga. writes:

"I have cured myself of a long-standing ase of Nervous Dyspepsia by leaving off offee and using Postum," says the doctor.

"I also enjoy refreshing sleep, to which 've been an utter stranger for 20 years.

"In treating dyspepsia in its various pes, I find little trouble when I can in- uce patients to quit coffee and adopt 'ostum."

The Dr. is right and "there's a reason." ead the little book, "The Road to Well- ille," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in concentrated owder form called Instant Postum. It is repared by stirring a level teaspoonful n a cup of hot water, adding sugar to aste, and enough cream to bring the color o golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's o waste; and the flavour is always uni- orm. Sold by grocers—50-cup tin 30 cts., 00-cup tin 50 cts.

A 5-cup trial tin mailed for grocer's ame and 2-cent stamp for postage. Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

WOMEN AND THE SUFFRAGE

EVELYN BAKER DODD'S article on "The Rule of American Women," which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 13, has brought out replies from several readers, who criticize the writer's views sharply. Mrs. Dora Kerschner, of Winfield, Kan., writes:

I ask a little space in these columns to call upon the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to note the misleading statements and inconsistencies of Mrs. Dodd's article. One of the most glaring of these is the assertion that three of the suffrage States do not prohibit children from working at night, while many other States do. Mrs. Dodd here gives us a splendid opportunity to impress on the readers that in all of the four oldest suffrage States, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and Idaho, child labor is not permitted at all, either day or night. Is Mrs. Dodd honestly ignorant or would she willingly mislead her readers? She cites several other similar instances in an attempt to prove that the welfare of women and children is not well guarded in the suffrage States. The best answer to this is found in a summary of facts on these matters, a partial list of which is given below, the full list being too lengthy. The women of Mrs. Dodd's acquaintance seem to be "fame-seeking, pampered, self-indulgent, highly emotional, undisciplined," etc., etc.; and I grant that the women she describes are not desirable as voting citizens; and far less are they desirable as mothers, wives and home-makers. We believe that the home deserves the finest and best of humanity for the shaping of its destiny. We believe that the home-makers should be invested not only with the finest qualities of heart and brain, but also with the fullest powers, the largest liberties and the widest opportunity for full development that man can find.

Mrs. Dodd is alarmed lest women should neglect the home, invade man's sphere and finally lose her maternal instincts. The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will doubtless be slow to accept the advice of one who knows so little of the "mother-heart" that she thinks it may be so easily eradicated. Does Mrs. Dodd know anything about the thousands of heart-hungry women who are working in factories and shops, because there are no homes for them under the conditions of man suffrage? Does she know anything about the mothers who have been forced away from their firesides and their little ones to earn a living, under the conditions of man suffrage? Let her ask herself what has prevented the complete overthrow of the home under the misgovernment of a half-race in its greed for profits, in its mad rush to coin into gold the loving hearts of women and the smiles and dimples of little children. And if she ever finds the answer to that question, she will begin to understand something of the width and depth and height and power of the mother-love.

This cry for the ballot of which Mrs. Dodd is so fearful is the veriest manifestation of this mother-love. It is the struggle of the mother-heart to preserve her place in her own realm. It is for the sake of the home and the children that she asks it, and it is the enemies of the home such as the saloon-keeper, the gambler and the corrupt politician, that make up the large part of the opposition to granting it.

absently that in the next stall was a wagon similar to theirs, with a similar box in the back. She fastened the blanket a bit more securely about Dolly; then, not knowing what else to do, went slowly along the street. Lights were already flashing out from homes and shops. And look where she would, wreaths and ropes of Christmas greens met her eyes. Bells of all sizes hung in the windows. Christmas trees, with flashing tapers, gave alluring invitations. And everywhere, happy hurrying people filled the walk, all with Christmasy looking bundles and holly.

In front of a window filled with toys, Miss Lavinia found herself held a prisoner for a moment by the jolly, jostling crowd. Next her was a young poorly-dressed woman with a baby in her arms. A little girl clung to her skirts. A young man, with a broad, good-natured face, stood near, his arms full of packages.

"Guess I've got 'em all, Ben," the woman said in a tired but vibrantly happy voice. "The baby's and Mamie's and Bennie's—I'm so glad we could manage 'em all. A ten-cent store's a blessing to poor folks, ain't it, Ben? Benny'll be so pleased—where is Benny, Ben?"

"While you and the kids was in here, Ben and me did a little shoppin' on our own account," said the young man, with a smile so broad and beaming that it embraced Miss Lavinia. "A man in one of the stores gave Benny a big bunch of holly, and the little chap wanted to go to the shed and trim up the old horse. Then he wanted to trim all the horses—thought they'd feel bad, mebby, if they didn't have any Christmas. I told him, when he was through, to just climb into the wagon and wait. Come on, now, Mayme, I'm goin' to buy you a new dress."

"We can't afford it," began the girl, but her eyes shone like stars.

"Can't afford it? Well, I guess my wife's goin' to have a Christmas present."

They disappeared in the crowd, talking eagerly. But others came and gazed in at the brilliantly lighted window, went in, and came out with packages and Christmas greens. Miss Lavinia hurried back toward the shed. She found herself thinking how Samuel did really need a new overcoat. Passing a jewelry shop, she fairly saw the glint of one of the necklaces on Lindy's pretty round neck. Once she opened her purse. But she shut it again with a snap. And her lips came together tightly.

In the shed she found Samuel untying Dolly. The other wagon, with its similar box, still stood in the next stall.

The ride home was a silent one. Snow was coming quietly—big white flakes, soft as cotton-wool.

"Guess we'll have sleighin' by tomorrer, all right," said Samuel.

As they drove into the yard, the door of the kitchen flew open. In the broad path of lamplight which lay across the porch, stood Lindy. She wore a white wool gown. There was a red ribbon in her hair.

"Supper's all ready," she cried. She flew down the steps. Regardless of the snow, she reached up to give Dolly her lump of sugar.

"Where did you get your holly?" she cried.

Sure enough, bobbing rakishly over one ear, Dolly wore a bit of Christmas green.

Samuel was already shaking his head when Miss Lavinia turned inquiringly toward him.

"I d'know where it came from, Lavin'," he said. "Some one 'sides me must have stuck it there."

"Dolly looks about as well pleased as most folks do with Christmas things," said Miss Lavinia, as she stepped down from the wagon. "Catch holt here, Lindy—we'll just set this box in the store room."

Lindy on one side, Miss Lavinia on the other, they started to lift the big box from the wagon.

"I didn't know there was anything in it," laughed Lindy. "I almost dropped my end of it."

"What have you gone and loaded into this box, Sam Parsons?" called Miss Lavinia, but old Samuel on his way to the barn didn't hear.

Miss Lavinia and Lindy tugged the box up the steps and into the kitchen. Lindy, proudly anxious about her supper, ran to the oven to see that the potatoes were just right. The next minute she heard a sharp exclamation.

"For the land o' mercy, Lindy Blake," cried Miss Lavinia, "there's a live baby, or something, in this box."

Lindy ran to the box, knelt down, and peered in. There, sound asleep, a jumping-jack in one hand, holly a-top of him, lay a small, plump, yellow-haired boy.

"Where'd it come from?" gasped Miss Lavinia.

The boy opened a pair of big round brown eyes. At sight of the strange faces they grew bigger and rounder and browner.

"I wants my mudder," he cried, "I wants my fadder. I wants my Chrismas tree."

Fifteen minutes later, stamping off the snow from his boots, Samuel limped into the kitchen. Near the door he stopped short, his mouth wide open in astonishment.

Before the stove sat Miss Lavinia. In her lap was a small, woe-begone, yellow-haired boy. Even while old Samuel gazed, he wailed, "I wants my mudder! I wants my fadder! I wants my Christmas tree!"

On the floor knelt Lindy, making distracted efforts to soothe the child. A jumping-jack sprawled near by. Adding the last touch to the picture, on the back of Miss Lavinia's chair, was a large spray of holly. In the oven the potatoes burst their brown skins. On the stove the bacon sizzled crisply. The air was full of the odor of coffee.

"Land sake alive!" cried Samuel.

"You'd better say 'Land sake alive,' Sam Parsons," cried Miss Lavinia. "How in the name of goodness did this baby get in our box?"

Before Samuel could make any answer, the boy sat up.

"I'm not a baby," he said, "I'm—I'm Benny. I bought Baby's Christmas present and Mamie's and mudder's wiv my own pennies—I did. An' 'en I trimmed the hosses an' 'en I trawled in the box to wait for fadder and mudder. I wants my mudder. I wants my fadder. I wants my Christmas tree."

"He belongs to those people in front of the ten cent store," cried Miss Lavinia. "That must have been their wagon next ours in Barnes's shed, Sam. It had a box in the back, too. He got into the wrong box—that's all."

While Miss Lavinia told all she knew and Samuel ejaculated, "For the land sakes!" several times, and Lindy ran to save the coffee from boiling over and the bacon from burning, Benny sobbed and cried, and refused all comfort.

"S'pose I'd better harness up and take him back to town?" said old Samuel anxiously.

"Take this baby back in this storm?" cried Miss Lavinia. "Have you lost your senses, Sam Parsons? Not a step shall he go before morning."

"You couldn't go 'way back to town yourself to-night, Uncle Samuel," said Lindy softly to the old man. "Besides, if you did, maybe you couldn't find Bennie's people. We'll take good care of him till morning."

"But what's his folks do? That's what beats me," cried Samuel. "Think of losing your baby at Christmas time."

"I wants my Christmas tree!" wailed Benny.

In spite of a good supper, in spite of Lindy's tender cuddling and coaxing, in spite of everything every one could do, the piteous homesick little voice kept saying over and over, "I wants my Christmas tree!"

"If you'll do up the supper things, Lindy," said Miss Lavinia, when the meal was over, "I'll rock him a spell. He ain't anything but a baby if he is the oldest of 'em."

She carried the child to the firelit dusk of the living-room. She sat down in the old rocker and began to rock, crooning softly. Lindy, splashing the dish-water in the sink, smiled to herself. For Miss Lavinia was singing, "Hush, my dear, lie still and slumber."

Fainter and fainter grew the sobs. At last they died away altogether. After some time, Miss Lavinia came back into the kitchen, softly closing the door of the living-room.

"Now," she said briskly, "we'll all get right to work."

"Work?" cried Samuel. "There ain't such a sight of work to do to-night, is there, Lavin'? Lindy and me's been thinkin'—mebby we could telephone over to Barnes's shed about the boy—says she's most sure John Davidson would do it."

"There's considerable to see to first, Sam," said Miss Lavinia, lifting a cover from the stove. "To begin with, we've got to have a Christmas tree."

"Christmas tree!" gasped Samuel.

"That's what I said, Sam," said Miss Lavinia; "you can get right to work shellin' corn."

"Oh, Aunt Vinnie!" cried Lindy; "there's the children's tree at the schoolhouse, and all the trimmings. We can use that."

"How'll we get it, Lindy?" said Miss Lavinia. "It's stormin' something dreadful."

"John—Mr. Davidson—will get it—I know he will," said Lindy. "He's so good about such things. He helped me set it up and trim it. And he was Santa Claus—he loves children."

"How'll we get John Davidson?" asked Miss Lavinia, with a grim little smile. "It's further to the Davidson's than 'tis to the schoolhouse—quite a piece."

"He—I think—that is, he said he might drop in this evening to see you and Uncle Samuel," said Lindy.

"It'll take something more than Sam Parsons and me to get John Davidson out in this storm—still, Lindy, I wouldn't be a mite surprised to see him. Meanwhile, we'll just go up to the attic, you and me, and look up some of great-nephew Tom's old toys. There's a cart and a rocking-horse and a horn. I guess it'll toot some yet, mebby. Sit there and stare, Sam Parsons, if you want to. I guess I've got mind enough to change it, if I see fit."

In spite of one of the worst blizzards of the season, John Davidson did get to the Parsons house. And in spite of it, too, he brought the little tree from the schoolhouse. Then he went back to his cousin's home, and, after an hour's patient trying, got into communication with a distracted father still hovering about Barnes's shed, and set him easy about his small boy. And late as it was, with the storm worse every minute, he went back again to the Parsons house to tell them all was well and that Benny's father and mother and Mamie and the Baby would all be there early the next morning.

"There's plenty of turkeys and pumpkins and mince-meat and jelly," said Miss Lavinia from her place on the stepladder, where she was hanging a bunch of scarlet holly. "I guess Lindy and me'll just fly around and give 'em all a good Christmas dinner 'fore they go back."

At quarter past eleven that stormy Christmas Eve, the little tree stood in the living-room of the Parsons house, ready for lighting when Benny awoke in the morning.

"Don't take so long to trim a tree, if you go at it right," said Miss Lavinia. "And if I do say it as shouldn't, Sam Parsons, I never saw a prettier tree in my life."

It was pretty with its colored paper chains made by the school children, its popcorn, popped and strung by Samuel, its shining red apples, its tinsel and ornaments John Davidson had found somewhere.

Samuel nodded his head in wordless approval. From the kitchen, where John Davidson still lingered with Lindy, came the murmur of voices. It didn't seem one small home could hold quite so much love and joy and good cheer. They must run over and bless the world.

"Christmas did come in spite of me," said Miss Lavinia. She laughed happily. But something like a tear sparkled for a moment on her cheek and then was lost among the sparkles of the tree. "I guess I'm as glad as any one that it did. And I shan't ever try to keep it out again."

"It came with the little one there." Samuel jerked his thumb toward the door of the bedroom where the child lay asleep. "I knew, somehow, Lavin', when you was a talkin' a spell back, that 'twasn't just holly and them things—not even givin' gifts—that made Christmas. They're just signs and symbols, or suthin' like that. It's the little Child makes Christmas, Lavin'."

"Guess like enough you're right, Sam," said Miss Lavinia. "Hush—Lindy's singing."

And Lindy, who had just said good-night to John Davidson, came slowly through the firelit dusk of the kitchen, trilling tenderly,

How silently, how silently,
The wondrous gift is given!

GENERAL NOTES

—THE RECENT CONTRIBUTION of Evelyn Baker Dodd in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the suffrage question has stirred up some healthy criticism on the other side, and we take pleasure in giving place in this issue to some of the letters received from the friends of woman suffrage. These letters, it must be admitted, make out an excellent case in disposing of Mrs. Dodd's statements.

—THE AMERICAN BAPTIST Publication Society has issued a new translation of the Scriptures. The work has been under way for twenty-three years and some of the most eminent Biblical scholars have contributed to the production of the new volume, which is named "An Improved Edition." It is based in part on the "Bible Union Version." Professor Barnard C. Taylor, of Crozer Seminary, was assigned the task of revising the Bible Union Version of Genesis, Job, Psalms and Proverbs, and also the translations of Exodus, Levitieus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth and I. and II. Samuel; Professor J. R. Sampey translated I. and II. Kings, I. and II. Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon and Lamentations. President Harper began the work of translating Isaiah and the Minor Prophets; his work was continued after his death by Professor G. W. P. Smith. Professor Ira W. Price translated Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Some notable changes are the following: Exodus 20: 5 is made to read, "visiting the iniquity of fathers upon sons upon the third generation and upon the fourth generation of them that hate me." "Graven image" is made to read "carved image." In Luke 16: 23 "hell" is made to read "underworld." In many places where the word "baptize" occurs the word "immerse" is set beside it in parentheses. The Lord's Prayer according to the new version reads as follows: "Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debt, as we also have forgiven our debtors. And bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one." A more extended notice of the new Bible will appear in a future issue.

Business Boys
And Business Men

are much the same thing these days. The only big point of difference is just years. Day by day the Business Boy is widening his field of action—keeping up with his increasing opportunities. And day by day the Business Man is coming to recognize in him a worthy rival.

When You Stop to Think that thousands of boys are doing men's work—doing it well, too—you get the point of this argument clearly.

Any bright, energetic boy can earn more money than a sluggardly man, if he will apply himself. Some of our boys, in fact, receive weekly incomes that compare favorably with salaries paid to hundreds of full-grown men, working in steady positions. By far the larger per cent. of them make enough to supply all everyday needs, and numbers are actually supporting themselves.

Besides their cash incomes, they also earn a great many very fine premiums and prizes—just such things as appeal most to a boy. When our big new plan goes into effect (which will be right away) every boy in our organization will be able to increase his earnings very largely. It will give the hustlers a chance to double and triple their harvest of dimes and dollars.

Christmas is Coming and this is the time when business is at its best. There never was a better time for a new boy to join us than now. We need thousands more to help us handle the increasing volume of business. We could take care of 10,000 new boys very easily.

If you know any bright, manly boy (or boys) whom you would like to aid in obtaining easy, congenial, and profitable employment — something of really exceptional educational value, which he can apply himself to during spare time—send us his name and address. You will confer a favor on us both. Do this right away, for his sake. Just drop us a letter or a postal and enclose the boy's address. We will write at once and tell him all about our new plan. The quicker you do this the better. Address inquiries to the Sales Division:

RELIEF FOR THE BALKAN SUFFERERS

Ashmead-Bartlett, the London Daily Telegraph's correspondent, wired in part as follows:

"Every village through which I passed has its victims, every road over which the troops move to the front is marked by a trail of corpses or of men dying by the roadside. As there are no medical arrangements of any sort, it is impossible to succor and save any of these wretched victims of the war. Those who fall are left to die where they drop. No pleading or prayers will move the living to raise a helping hand, even if they are in a position to do so. . . . Three days ago I rode over the hills, intending to visit Hademkeui. I mounted the last slope which hid the valley in which it lies, and then I was brought to a standstill by the awful babel of sounds which arose beneath me. . . . In the center of Hademkeui lay a large square, formed on one side by some barracks, on two others by lines of white hospital tents, on the fourth by the highroad. This square resembled a successful flypaper in midsummer—it was covered with corpses of dead and writhing bodies of living in all attitudes; some prone, some sitting, some kneeling, some constantly shifting, some with hands clasped as if in supplication. In some parts of the area dead were piled in heaps, in others those still living were almost as closely packed."

The Bulgarian troops operating before the Turks' strongest position at Hademkeui were ordered to cease fighting and merely hold the positions they had won until the outcome of the negotiations for an armistice were known. The Turkish reports that have come via Constantinople state that the Bulgarians have been repulsed and that fresh troops are arriving daily from Asia Minor. From Sofia, on the other hand, the reports announce the retirement of the Bulgarians from their most advanced positions for the purpose of avoiding further contamination from the cholera. Already a number of cases have appeared among the Bulgarian troops, but with the more effectual medical arrangements of the Bulgarians it is hoped that the numbers of those attacked may remain very small.

Due apparently to a misunderstanding of the terms set forth by Bulgaria on behalf of the allies, the Turkish Government refused to treat further on the matter of a cessation of hostilities, and on the morning of November 21 fighting started again on the Chatalja lines. The allies demanded the surrender by Turkey of practically all the territory that their troops have won at the point of the bayonet. This the Sublime Porte declared impossible to grant, and despatched Nazim Pasha to the front to resume the fighting.

As this statement is prepared for the press, the despatches bring unconfirmed news of a Bulgarian naval victory. Through London it is reported that the Bulgarian torpedo boats attacked the Turkish cruiser Hamidiyeh off Varna and sent her to the bottom. Greek success is reported in their occupancy of the Turkish town of Florina to the south of Monastir.

The latest despatches bring still further tales of devastation and suffering. From THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S own correspondents we have received further letters and an excellent photograph of the Relief Committee at Sofia. These will appear in the next issue.

All contributions for the relief of the widows and orphans and the treatment of the wounded should be sent as early as possible to the BALKAN RELIEF FUND, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY. Every contribution will be acknowledged.

KNOX CHRISTMAS CANDY

KNOX GELATINE is as popular for the candy it makes as for the desserts and other good things that have made it famous for twenty-five years. Just try these

KNOX DAINTIES

Soak 1 box KNOX ACIDULATED GELATINE in 1 cup cold water 5 minutes. Add 1½ cups boiling water and when dissolved add 4 cups granulated sugar and boil 25 minutes. Divide into 2 equal parts. When somewhat cooled add to 1 part ½ teaspoonful of the pure fruit acid dissolved in 1 tablespoonful water, and 1 tablespoonful lemon extract. To the other part add ½ teaspoonful extract of cloves and color with the pink color. Pour into shallow tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand until quite firm; cut into squares with a knife dipped in hot water. Roll in coarse granulated sugar and let stand to crystallize. Vary by using different flavorings and colorings.

NOTE: To use the Sparkling package instead of the Acidulated for the above recipe, for the first part use 4 tablespoonfuls lemon juice and 1 teaspoonful lemon extract instead of the pure fruit acid. For the other part follow directions in the Acidulated recipe.

SENSE AND NONSENSE

CONDUCTED BY JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

Talk About Spectacles

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

JOSIAH wuz cleanin' his fur-off and near-to spectacles. And I wuz readin' about a famous actress who ad just married a man oung enough to be her on, and I sez:

"It seems dretful resky, osiah."

And he sez, "I d'no; ome wimmen are born d, and some are born kinder young nd always stay so."

But I sez, "Considerin' the elastic ater of men, I consider it resky."

He kep' on with his work and I be-an to eppisode how necessary it wuz keep spectacles crystal clear. Thinks how many spots on the sun are win' to spotty specs. How many aults in our neighbors we see through aulty glasses! how many books are illed dull, owin' to critics' dull specs! ow many hearts are broken and ves ruined by somebody lookin' rough nasty glasses and tellin' what ey see and makin' folks believe it! nd how much sorrow folks cause by riticisin' them that's richer and more stinguished — middlin' good folks ebby they are, only the pizen vapors sin' from envy and jealousy have ettled on their spectacles and they on't see clear through 'em. The ood nater in them they envy is alled heartlessness, their pleasant ords, deceitfulness, their dignity is alled haughtiness, their honest desire be friendly is called patronizin' and alse, and their attempts to help and etter the community, looked at rough them dirty specs, looks black nd offensive.

And friends, congenial friends, who ved each other—oh, how did the dust gin to gather on their glasses? Only speck at first, mebby, but gatherin' ther atoms of distrust, suspicion, alse gossip, and they gatherin' dis-ke, till the glasses are dim and the nes who wuz so dear look fur off, as snow covered mountains lay be-ween 'em. Oh! the tragedies of lone-ness and sorrow caused by poor mor-uls tryin' to look through such lasses!

Josiah got through with his near-oos, and as he begun on his fur-offs ly thought turned itself over and I ee the other side on't. I begun to ppisode on how necessary it wuz to ot see too plain sometimes—some ke the Bible verses, "Answer a fool ccordin' to his folly, and answer a ool not accordin' to his folly." Some-mes you must look at things with our near-toos and then agin with our fur-offs.

Now, sometimes to git along peace-ble with folks, you have got to look ver through 'em, not see a thing, r act as if you didn't. In bringin' p children you've got to use both pair f specs on lyin', theft, laziness and uch, magnify 'em, and make 'em look as big as possible. But thoughtless naughtiness, a cross word or look, accidental damage, etc., look over and beyond 'em, and most likely they will disappear of themselves. Yes, it is good sometimes to not see things that annoy. No two folks can always think alike, and thoughtless, impatient words and acts that might, if noticed and magnified by altercation, bring on onhappiness—don't see 'em, look on the blue onclouded sky till the sunshine is reflected back in your heart, and from your heart to theirn.

And as I set musin' on these deep subjecks, the article I had been readin' come into my thoughts agin, and I begun to eppisode on marriages occurrin' late in life. Fair and downy and blessedly happy the little fellow with wings and arrows looks, seen through the glowin' eyes of youth. But the down on the wings seen through near-too spectacles is but feathers and quills sharp-pinted, liable to prick and smart. The arrows show their brassy pints, pizened by fears, cautions, and disappointments. The naked limbs look cold and shivery, the laughin' face takes on a scoffin' mirth. Be careful, elderly lovers, how you look at the form of young love. If you must gaze on him at all, look through the tinted glasses called goggles, coloring the objects looked at, and don't look too closely and critically.

Indeed, I would advise my elderly friends who are in such a case to take off their spectacles entirely, and contemplate things through eyes too dim to see what I have mentioned. But let me warn 'em that Love, though centuries have passed since Adam and Eve entertained him in the beautiful garden, his eyes are always fur-seein' and keen, they have never needed spectacles and never will. They can see plainly the white threads amongst the gold; they note the failin' strength, the dimmin' vision, and see just how hard it is for a cane and halt to keep step with boundin' footsteps.

My beloved pardner wuz now polishin' the bows to a golden luster, and with a gentle sithe I told him my thoughts. "Why, Samantha," sez he, "I set more store by you now than I ever did, and," sez he, settin' his near-toos firmly on his nose and lookin' at me fondly through 'em, "you look more beautiful to me every day, every hour." Onconsciously he had fell into the words of a familiar him, in his desire to let me know that I wuz still charmin' in his eyes.

"Yes, Josiah," sez I, as I looked through my near-toos on his dear but small-sized figger, "no other linement looks so good to me as your linement duz. But," sez I half happily, half sadly, "we both look through glasses, Josiah."

A Burroughs at $250

Here is an adding machine bargain—a nine-column, fully-equipped Burroughs for any straight adding or tabulating figure work, for only $250. Sold for years at $375. Only 1097 of them are offered at this reduced price.

These machines are demonstrating samples; have been used only enough to wear off their "brand new" appearance. They are not second-hand in any sense, but are positively as good as new.

We had occasion recently to look up the record of one of the first machines we made (No. 347) sold to the Alamo National Bank of San Antonio, Texas, Jan. 17, 1894. The bank used it nearly 13 years, then sold it for $175 and bought a special bank Burroughs. The original machine is still in use elsewhere, after 19 years' steady service.

We use 20,000 machines continuously in our plan of letting business men try the Burroughs before buying. To make room for others in our constantly increasing variety of demonstrating models, we have picked these 1097 machines and offer the purchaser this reduction of $125 to insure quick sale.

Though greatly reduced these machines carry the same guarantee, the same Burroughs service and the backing of the same organization as the highest priced Burroughs.

Naturally, these 1097 machines can't last long at such a price—we expect to clean up within thirty days. May we show you one of them before they're all sold? Seeing, of course, doesn't obligate you to buy.

they are, to all intents and purposes, a religious creed, which a class of men has for centuries embraced, and is now embracing, with more or less consciousness, and which it has voiced, and is now voicing, with more or less distinctness. The men who deny the eternal generation of the Son out of the essence of the Father, or the incarnation of the eternal Logos in the infant Christ, or the vicarious atonement effected by the Life, which "was given as a ransom for many," or that the Scriptures, in the view of Christ, "cannot be broken," hence are authoritative; that repentance from sin is possible now and here by "hearing Moses and the prophets," and that men "must be born again by water and the Spirit" to be admitted to the kingdom of God—the men who decline these teachings of the Christ and the Book are a party in this world, although they may not have formed an organization by adopting a Declaration of Faith, a Constitution and By-laws, elected officers, etc. The history of the Church is evidence that Christians have always regarded the advocacy of these views, which negative the teaching of the Master by either rejecting it entirely or giving a strange meaning to the words of Scripture in which it is expressed, as coming from an opposition with which the Church would always have to wrestle, not indeed, in a warfare of carnal weapons, but with the might of God. The Outlook has served this party, and will continue to serve it, while the principles before indicated are advocated in its columns.

As to independence—what is that? The terms "independent" and "independence," when used to describe the actions or attitudes of men, cannot be taken in an absolute sense. There is no one absolutely independent except God. When applied to men, independence can mean nothing else than freedom from determining influences other than such as come from God, or arise from the operation of the fixed laws of nature and of being. A person is said to act independently when he is swayed by no force other than that of his own mind, when he is under no constraint to shape his actions to suit the demands of secondary, or human, authorities. Practically, independence is a person's own way of seeing, saying, doing things, regardless of what others may want him to see, say, or do. It will be difficult to show that the Protestant and the Christian who accept the views which the Outlook rejects are not as independent in their acceptance as the Outlook is in the rejection of these views. Such independence to willingly subscribe to all that the prophets and apostles have spoken is one of the trophies of Christian faith, yea, is faith. "If ye continue in my word, ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free," says Christ.

Whether a person's independence is worth anything to himself or to others depends entirely on the person. The quality of a person's independence is never better than the quality of the person's mind. Independence is not a good thing in itself. The independent thought or action of an anarchist, for instance, benefits nobody, not even the anarchist himself, though he may think so. Nor is all striving for independence good. The immature aspirations to independence of the ambitious youth who is still sorely in need of the wholesome tutelage of masters, and whose sole safety lies in following authorities, does not impress us favorably. We merely hint at these things in order to show that as regards independence—very much depends.

"The natural man," says Paul, "receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; they are foolishness unto him,

"I made big interest on $150,000 this year"

That is the reply which Mr. L. Casalagno, of Oakdale, California (in the San Joaquin Valley), made to the query: "What is your 120-acre fruit ranch worth to-day?"

Think of it! If his net profit was only six per cent, it would mean $75 an acre, and six per cent is not big interest in California.

Couldn't you, with your native intelligence, industry and ambition, do better than you are doing to-day, if you were located in a country where a man can make big interest on an average investment figured at $1,250 an acre, and the land costs but one-tenth of that?

If you own your own place, can you earn big interest on the present value of your farm?

If you are renting, are you getting ahead?

How long will it take you to buy a farm of your own?

Can you see your way clear to a position of independence?

Think about this.

Talk it over with your family.

Would it not be the part of wisdom to at least investigate the possibilities of California?

I, as General Colonization Agent of the Santa Fe Railway, tell you that the chances to succeed are greater in California than they are in any place with which I am acquainted.

You can buy desirable farms, with water, in the San Joaquin Valley, for from $125 to $150 an acre, and these farms, properly cultivated and planted, will return to you as much as Mr. Casalagno received from his land.

Even if your net returns were no greater in California than they are to-day, wouldn't it be worth while moving there just to live where there is no winter — where mere existence is a delight?

The Santa Fe has no land to sell. Its interests are tied up with your interests, and unless you succeed, the railroad will be better off if you stay where you are.

We know you will prosper.

You can go and see for yourself at small expense.

On the first and third Tuesdays of each month the Santa Fe sells homeseekers' excursion tickets from Chicago to California, and elsewhere in the Southwest. Before you go, write for our two books, "The San Joaquin Valley" and "What California Means for You."

Dr. ABBOTT ON THE "OUTLOOK'S" CREED

neither can he know them; for they are spiritually discerned." The origin of Christian faith in any heart necessitates a break with the old mind in us, the thinking the thoughts of God as he teaches us to think them in his Word, and the willing of volitions after his will revealed in his Book. Such faith is a miracle of grace in us. It sets a person directly in opposition to his old self. But it is a free and independent act of the person's own intellect and will. That a divine power prompted the act, and teaches submission to the divine Word, detracts nothing from the independence of the action. Ask any true believer whether he is conscious of any constraint other than that of the Spirit of God in him in what he believes. The answer will invariably be "No." The Augustinian friar of Wittenberg, whose creed Dr. Abbott has found it impossible to adopt, was free and joyous and rejoiced in his newly found independence, at the same time declaring his dependence. He says: "In my heart there rules solely and shall ever rule this single article, viz.: faith in my dear Lord Christ, which is the beginning, middle, and end of all my spiritual and divine thoughts, which I may ever conceive by day or night."

There is much false assertion of independence in our days among those who decline the teachings of the Bible and stand aloof from organized Christianity as it exists in the Christian congregations. Men who lack critical acumen are being led to believe that it is a certain mark of bias, prejudice, ignorance, to still submit to the authority of Scripture, and the Apostolic or Nicene Creed. Over and against this it is necessary to assert the independence and freedom that goes with the old faith. The bias and prejudice may be altogether on the other side, and men may think they are independent but are not.

The Outlook, however, must be credited with perfect sincerity in stating again what it has always claimed for itself, that it is not a Protestant nor a Christian journal. The religion which it advocates will be found, in the last analysis, to be the religion of social service, of general good feeling among men because of their common origin and interests. "Political democracy," says Dr. Abbott, "unites us in nations; industrial democracy in trades; educational democracy in a republic of letters; but religious democracy unites men of all nationalities, trades, and social classes in a universal brotherhood. Because one is our Father which is in heaven, because we are all his offspring and share in his life, we are all brethren." (The Outlook, September 17, 1910, p. 127.) This religion can, indeed, exist without any reference to Christ except as an exemplary man. Abou Ben Adhem, or Renan, will be sufficient as guides; for even this independent religion of the future will have its guides and authorities.

As for ourselves, we wish to be written down as one who subscribes to Paul's declaration and dedication: "Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified. . . . I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

Questions and Answers

T. M. L., Penobscot, Me. What is pidgin English?

Pidgin English is a jargon which originated in the efforts of English-speaking persons to make themselves understood by Chinese in doing business with the latter. It consists of broken English with several words of Chinese and Portuguese origin construed according to Chinese idiom. Pidgin is a corruption of bidginess (bidgin), which in itself is a corruption of business.

Mrs. P. G., Montgomery, Ia. I. Cor. 5: 5 deals with a peculiar case. The protecting power of the Holy Spirit may be withdrawn from a persistent sinner (who has been repeatedly admonished without avail) in order that he may feel the depths of his own degradation and wickedness. At such times he may be said to be "delivered over" to sin, since the restraining power is absent. (See Ps. 109: 6 and I. Peter 5: 8.) Paul, however, points out that this is not to be a finality, but that the spirit may be saved. In this particular case it seems to have been in a sense a chastening permitted for the individual salvation (see I. Cor. 11: 32).

C. G., Annapolis, Md. I have seen a piece of poetry somewhere about a man who will smile when everything goes dead wrong, but I cannot quote it, nor do I know the author. Can you tell me anything of it?

Probably you refer to the following stanza from a poem by Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox:

"Tis easy enough to be pleasant
When life flows along like a song,
But a man worth while is a man who will smile
When everything goes dead wrong.

Subscriber, Agosta, Ohio. 1. How old was Jesus when the Wise Men came to see him? 2. How long did it take them to travel from the East?

1. The infant Saviour was probably over two months old when the visit of the Magi took place. They had seen the phenomenon of the Star long before their arrival in Jerusalem, two months after Jesus had been presented in the temple, and it was some time after this that the Magi arrived in Jerusalem and went thence to Bethlehem to worship him and offer gifts. 2. It must have taken them many months to accomplish the journey from their own country to Palestine. They came "from the East" and tradition has preserved their names as Melchior, Gaspar and Balthasar. Some accounts say they came from the Euphrates with a large retinue, and were nearly two years on the journey.

B. M., Quincy, Ill. Who wrote "You will reach the house of Never by the street of By-and-By?"

Cervantes, the great Spanish romancer, had it—"By the street of By-and-By one reaches the house of Never." Mary Howitt, the English authoress, paraphrased the expression into verse.

Reader, Lincoln, Neb. In II. Cor. 8: 12 the apostle is speaking of the cheerfulness and willingness with which believers should give to the Lord's work. He does not limit the giving to a tenth, but urges them to give freely and to spare not, that their abundance may make up for the lack in others. The widow's mite (Luke 21: 3, 4) was the largest offering, in a sense, for she gave all she had, and her faith and generosity were commended above those that gave far richer gifts. (See answer to A. S. C. on next page). There are many worthy people who practice tithing and we would not dissuade them, and there are others who do not limit their gifts to a tenth, but exceed it, and they, too, are worthy of commendation. God looks at the spirit of the gift more than at the gift itself. There are cases in which a tenth might work hardship and, on the other hand, there are many where a tenth would be a small offering.

J. R. J., Baltimore, Md. How old was Jesus when he began to understand the nature of his mission?

Although one cannot trace with any degree of precision the various stages of development of the consciousness of his mission, it is evident from the Gospel record that it must have begun early and gradually increased to complete appreciation as manhood approached. We are told that even in childhood he "grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom," and the "grace of God was upon him." (Luke 2: 40.) In youth we find him questioning and expounding to the rabbis in the temple and "increasing in stature and in wisdom and in favor with God and man." His wonderful knowledge, his amazing questions and his discerning answers to the elders must have become more and more accentuated during the passage of these early years, and we may gather that Mary had already premonitions of the future career of her Divine Son, since she pondered over and "hid all these things in her heart." There are indications that seem to warrant the conclusion that long before the opening of his public ministry, Jesus was absorbed by the thought of the mission to which he was destined. He knew his Father's business and did it, and he fr quented his Father's house. His life and su roundings in Nazareth brought him in conta with a simple, earnest people and with sorro and suffering. These were years of characte building and development. They bore fru when the time was ripe for his public ministr and prepared him for the baptism at John hands. This was the last act of his privat life and the first that marked the beginning his public mission, when the heavenly voic proclaimed him as the "Beloved Son" and th Baptist bare record that he was the Son of Go

M. R. C., Jackson, Tenn. 1. Can a gas gaseous substance be classified as matter 2. How many kinds of matter? 3. Defin matter.

1. Certainly; whatever has substance is ma ter, and some even classify the lack of a re essence as matter. 2. There are three states matter, determined by the motion of the mol cules composing it. According to the velocit of the molecules we have solids, liquids an gases. When the movement of the molecules oscillatory, there is a fixed relative position, th body has size and shape, and is called a solid When the velocity is able to carry the molecule beyond the reach of opposing forces, they mov in elliptic orbits, like the planets round the sun the body loses shape but retains volume and called a liquid. When the molecular velocity raised so high that the molecules move in para bolic paths, the body loses form, but tends t increase in volume, and is called a gas. 3. Ma ter is the indefinable of the universe. It is sai to be that form of being which is distinguishe by properties that can be cognized by the sense It is a very abstruse subject, and one which ha puzzled the greatest minds. "What is mind? It is no matter.
What is matter? Never mind."

W. H. F. 1. The Los von Rom movement i Austria is one that in many cases looks rathe to escape from Papal domination than to abar donment of Roman doctrine; for out of th reported loss to Rome since 1898 (when th movement began) to the end of 1909, 14,97 had joined the Old Catholic Church founde by Dr. Döllinger, 1871-1873. This body we understand, accepts all the most importan Roman doctrines, while rejecting the dogma o Papal infallibility. The figures in both case are derived from government registratio sources, and undoubtedly represent an anti Papal sentiment far wider and deeper tha any cold official figures can indicate. 2. Meet ings are still held at Christ's Mission in Ne York City. The nature of the work probabl accounts for lack of information given to th public. 3. We have not heard of any sustaine or organized effort for the evangelization o our Roman Catholic fellow citizens, but th widespread awakening to the real nature o Papal claims and pretensions cannot fail t lead many to study the system that in larg measure withholds the Word of God from th people, and the spiritual failure of which is s ostentatiously displayed in the widespread prac tical atheism of France and Portugal, in whic countries the Roman Church has held prac tically undisputed sway for centuries.

Inquirer, New York City. During his earthl ministry, Jesus set before his hearers the wa of eternal life and also showed them the wa that leads to perdition and the means of escape There were many among the Pharisees an Sadducees who, having heard the message, stil persisted in their unbelief. He warned them o the fate that awaited the impenitent wicked He had come to save the world, and those wh rejected him must bear the burden of their ow rejection. The record of the Scriptures canno be altered or done away with. God is a God o love and ever ready to forgive; but if we rejec his Son and continue in sin after having re ceived the Gospel invitation, we should blam ourselves alone for what may befall us. W bring our punishment upon our own heads an are self-condemned by our own act.

J. K. C., Chicago. Please give Scripture ref erences which would authorize the use o quartets, duets, solos, voluntaries, etc., i the New Testament church worship. I not such music more entertainment tha worship? The congregation is not per mitted to join even if it could.

In I. Cor. 14: 26, Paul referring to the form of worship of the Corinthian church, wrote "When ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, etc." This verse, especially wher read in connection with verse 15, "I will sing with the spirit and I will sing with the under standing also," implies that certain member sang alone. Tertullian and Augustine refer t this custom: "Every one," says Tertullian, "wa invited in their public worship to sing unto God according to his ability, either from the Scrip tures or one indited by himself." These song were often extemporaneous. From the time of the Song of Miriam, who either sang alone in response to the other women, or led off their singing (Ex. 15: 20, 21) there have been spe cial singers and groups of singers to lead the music in the worship of God. The organization of the ancient Hebrew choirs was very elaborate. (See II. Sam. 6: 5; I. Chron. chapters 15, 16, 23, 25, etc.) The congregation of Israel was so enormous that it was difficult if not wholly impossible for all the people to sing at once; and the songs were learned first by the great choirs and must have been sung first by them before the people learned them; but there is no reason for believing that all the congregation joined in all the songs. Such solos as those sung by Philip Phillips, P. P. Bliss, Chaplain McCabe, Mr. Sankey were certainly used by the Holy Spirit to do good. And many unsegregated Gospel singers are still rendering acceptable worship and service to God in solos, duets, quartets and choruses. You are undoubtedly right in holding that such music should be really spiritual. It should be sung without show, simply, clearly, earnestly, to the glory of God. You are also right in believing that the body of church singing should be by the congregation as a whole. But the special solo and choir numbers also have their place.

Reader, Greenville, N. Y. What is the belief of the Christian Scientists aside from their belief in healing?

Christian Science is based on the philosophy of idealism, or a disbelief in the existence of matter. Its followers claim that they achieve victory over pain and sin, not by recognizing these things as facts and claiming deliverance from them by faith, but by entirely denying the existence of these things. They hold that pain and sin are simply states of mind, that nothing really exists but God, who is also light, love, truth, health. This teaching, while it does undoubtedly lead some people to a calm and healthful life, is utterly opposed to the teaching of Scripture and of philosophy and of the great bulk of human experience. The Bible recognizes the existence of sin and wrong and pain; then teaches that we may always be delivered from sin and often delivered from pain by faith in the power of Christ.

A. S. C., St. Cloud, Fla. 1. A tithe is a tenth of the increase over and above all administrative expenses and not a tenth of the principal. In early days, when agriculture was the almost universal calling, it was generally a tenth part of the produce of the land or the flocks. Later it became a tenth of the profits of personal industry of any character. See Deut. 14: 22, 28; 16: 12; II. Chron. 31: 5, etc.). There is evidence, however, that at certain times it may have meant a tenth of one's entire possessions. The modern interpretation would limit it to a tenth of the increase. 2. It is our duty to employ all the means at our disposal for the preservation of health and to look to God for his blessing on our efforts. He has given us reason and a certain amount of knowledge, and these are to be used and not neglected. If one were accidentally to sever an artery, the first duty would be to bind a ligature around the limb.

G. L. B., Tarrytown, N. Y. 1. I cannot understand how a day is gained in going around the world—how, for instance, Tuesday can follow Sunday. Please explain. 2. Where is the constellation of the Southern Cross first sighted by a traveler going south, and what is it like?

1. A day is gained or lost according to what direction the traveler is proceeding. Suppose a person starts from New York at noon of a Wednesday and reaches Chicago an hour later, he will still find it noon in that city, for as he is proceeding west the earth rolls round 15 degrees to the eastward every hour, consequently the sun will be on the meridian. If in another hour he reaches Denver he will still find it noon, and in yet another hour it will be noon in San Francisco, and so on in all places fifteen degrees of longitude apart. Suppose he travels completely round the earth, making fifteen degrees to the hour, he will have a perpetual noon with no sunset or night until he returns to New York. But will it be the same noon on which he set out, the noon of Wednesday? No; it will be Thursday noon. So in going east a traveler gains one hour for every fifteen degrees; in going west he loses an hour. Consequently at the 180th degree of longitude twelve hours are either gained or lost, and this must be balanced by either adding or dropping a day. 2. The Southern Cross should be seen on the southern horizon about 30 degrees north latitude, but owing to the haze it is not much observable until the traveler is within 20 degrees or so of the equator. It gradually ascends the heavenly arch until when Australia is reached it is at its highest. It is not much like a cross, and only two of its stars are of the first magnitude.

Oregon

the haven of the Homeseeker

¶ Physically the state is attractive, geographically its location is excellent, climatically it leaves nothing to be desired.

¶ The Willamette Valley in Western Oregon, 150 miles long, contains about 5,000,000 acres of very fertile land. It is well watered, thickly settled, embraces many fine farms, has much water power, and is the oldest settled part of the state.

¶ The Hood River Section along the Columbia River, has made itself famous with prize winning fruits.

¶ In Southern Oregon along the foothills and slopes of the Umpqua and Rogue Rivers are some of the most prolific fruit lands in the west. The valley lands are valuable for grazing, poultry raising, and dairying. This region produces bountifully of Spitzenburg and Newtown Pippin apples, and pears are a close second. There are large timber areas on the mountains, and extensive mineral deposits, including coal. There is much good water power and the climate is ideal.

¶ Eastern and Central Oregon embrace millions of acres undeveloped and now inviting settlement. Here, general farming is largely practiced, grains, grasses, vegetables and fruit all doing well, stock raising being an important industry. The mountains abound in fine timber and magnificent water power. Numerous irrigation projects are in operation and a great change is under way in this section, owing to the construction of the Oregon Trunk Ry.

¶ Oregon is said to have the best school laws of any state in the Union. Her State University, Agricultural College, Normal and public schools, and several denominational colleges, etc., provide educational facilities of the highest type.

¶ Write for free booklet about Oregon and details of low round trip Homeseekers Fares. Address

L. J. BRICKER, Gen'l Immigration Agent or A. M. CLELAND, Gen'l Pass'r Agent Northern Pacific Ry., ST. PAUL, MINN.

¶ The Northern Pacific Railway and its numerous affiliated lines have 429 miles of railway in Oregon. Much of this is comprised in the new Oregon Trunk Railway through the Deschutes River Valley from Fallbridge, on the Columbia River, into Central Oregon—that great virgin field for the Homeseeker. The remainder is in the valleys of the Columbia and Willamette rivers, comprised in the lines of the Spokane, Portland & Seattle Ry., the United Railways and the Oregon Electric Railway.

¶ Oregon may aptly be termed the land of PRESENT OPPORTUNITIES. Central Oregon has millions of acres of homestead lands awaiting the homeseeker, while Western Oregon, more closely settled, has abundant opportunities on every hand for dairymen, poultry raisers, fruit growers and farmers.

¶ Send for free copy of "Central Oregon" and "Oregon for the Homeseeker" books, fully descriptive and containing names of Secretaries of Commercial Clubs, who will gladly help you in any way to get located.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO HOMESTEADERS:

¶ Recent revision of homestead law reduces period of required residence from 5 to 3 years and allows 5 months absence each year. Write quick for list of homestead lands adjacent to Northern Pacific, and full particulars.

ED. PINAUD'S LILAC VEGETAL

Paris creates the world's finest perfumes; hundreds of new brands are brought out every year. Few of them live beyond a season, but ED. PINAUD'S LILAC has been a world-wide favorite for a generation.

This is not remarkable, since its quality is really wonderful—each drop as fragrant as the living flower—and its price is moderate—75c per bottle (6 oz.). However, the great thing about this Lilac is not the low price, but the high quality, which is so fine, so delicate, so appealing, that its use has become an international habit. It is the favorite perfume of refined men and women everywhere.

Women use it for the handkerchief, atomizer, bath and finger bowl. Men use it for their personal linen and also after shaving (instead of bay rum or witch hazel).

If you want to please your friends, send them ED. PINAUD'S Lilac for a holiday gift. Six bottles are a fragrant reminder lasting six months.

You can test ED. PINAUD'S Lilac before buying—we have 50,000 little bottles to distribute. Send 10 cents to our American Offices to-day, mention your dealer's name, and if you like the perfume buy a 6-oz. bottle from your dealer for 75 cents.

Questions and Answers

D. C. E., Forestville, Conn.; D. C. M., Harrisburg, Pa., and others. Kindly advise as to the best education for one wishing to take up missionary work. What college or school would be the best to attend? At what age could one enter such a school? Would a high school education be necessary?

The prevailing idea among experts in the modern missionary movement is that the missionaries should have the very best training offered by the schools and colleges of the home land. The work of the missionary is difficult and intricate; it demands the best possible mental training. A missionary who is going to preach should take a college and seminary course; one who is to be a doctor, the college and the medical course; one who is to teach, the college course and, if possible, some graduate study in pedagogy. If the decision to go as a missionary was not made in time to take these full courses, training may be received at such excellent schools as the Moody Bible Institute at Chicago or the Bible Teachers' Training School at New York. For more detailed advice write to the Missionary Education Movement, New York; the Student Volunteer Movement, New York, or to the Missionary Board of your own denomination.

S. B., Waterbury, Conn. What is the largest planet in our system, and how does it compare with the earth?

Jupiter, having a diameter of 86,500 miles, with a mass 316 and a volume 1,300 times that of the earth.

M. G. C., Rowan, Iowa. 1. Are all church members true Christians? 2. Can the head of a house live a true Christian life without conducting family worship in his home? 3. Can one be a good Christian without joining the church?

1. Unfortunately it is impossible to say that all church members are true Christians, but it is very wrong to judge any particular member or members by thinking or stating that he or they are not true Christians. The New Testament commands about judging others are very strict and severe. 2. A man who is a real Christian should certainly have daily family worship in his home unless the circumstances of his work make it impossible. It is one of the most serious and dangerous facts of present-day life that so many homes are without family prayer. Yet here again it would be wrong to say that a man who does not conduct family worship is not a Christian. God must do the judging. 3. Every good Christian surely ought to join the church. It is hard to imagine a condition which would justify him in remaining outside.

W. F., West Middlesex, Pa. Will you kindly give some suggestions for conducting rural schoolhouse prayer-meetings so as to keep up a lively interest?

Make them real prayer-meetings. Prayer is the most interesting thing in the world. If people really feel that they can come together and talk with God, asking him for things they need and expecting to receive what they ask for, they will find the prayer-meeting a fascinating place. Get the people to bring in definite, personal requests for prayer. The petitions can be read without mentioning names; other requests will be made orally. The leaders and workers must really believe in the power of prayer. A small prayer-meeting, whose members ask great things from God and expect great things from him, may change the character of an entire community. Great revivals have begun in this way. With the prayers the service should include a careful study of some passage of Scripture, honest testimonies to the grace and blessing of God, and spiritual, hearty hymns. Outsiders will come if they know that something real and vital and intense is going on. Be sure to use good song-books and do not let the music drag.

M. E. B., Brookshire, Texas. Why are not our sins blotted from our memory when God's word declares (Isa. 43: 25; Jer. 31: 34) that he will not remember them?

The sense of "remember" in these passages is clearly that God does not remember the sin against the sinner. The account is canceled; the sins are no longer imputed to him. Since the revelation of God's plan of the atonement we see that the debt is paid. When a debt is paid it is forgotten, though the record of the transaction may remain in the brains of the people concerned. In this sense God forgets our sins, but there is no reason for supposing that he undoes or limits his omniscience by literally not knowing that certain past events have occurred. The very fact which your question brings out indicates that God must continue to know about our past sins; we know them, and God cannot observe our own minds without seeing there the record of our sin. It is simply a law of nature that a record made in the brain is made forever. We cannot, by the exercise of the will, make ourselves forget anything. It would be a subtle and almost inconceivable miracle for God to disentangle from our brains the memory of our sins and yet leave there the memory of other acts and events of the same days and hours. While we know that in every sense of debt or blame God forgets our sins when he forgives us, it should help to restrain people from sin to recognize the fact that a sin once committed will probably never be erased from our memory, at least in this life, and that it can never be lost from the simple, truthful record of the world's events.

Several Readers. The "Bible Question" Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be continued during 1913. Its popularity with our readers has been demonstrated by the very large number who have sent answers to the questions on the monthly lists. These studies are profitable as a means of instruction, and lead to a better acquaintance with the Scriptures.

A. H., York, Pa. It has often been urged that cards in themselves are not sinful, but the fact that they are the familiar tools of gamblers should be enough to deter us from their use. We are told to "avoid even the appearance of evil." If only for the sake of example—which has such an influence upon others, and especially the young—the use of cards is to be condemned. A card-playing Sunday school superintendent cannot be said to set a good example to his class. The same would of course apply in degree to any Christian, whether a church officer or not.

Mrs. A. N. H., Silver City, N. M. 1. Sound is the result of vibration, and if there be no vibration there can be no sound. Without a wireless receiver with its sensitive attachments, there can be no wireless message. The ear is a delicate instrument, and when its wonderful internal mechanism is absent or destroyed, there can be no sound. 2. The Bible contains no warrant for mass, purgatory, priestly confessional, the burning of candles, the use of holy water or the homage paid to images. Indeed, the latter is distinctly forbidden in Scripture: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any likeness of anything," etc.

Mrs. H. J. H., Gilsum, N. H. A prominent writer, in an article in a recent magazine says: "No more unreligious word was ever written than Paul's: 'What advantageth me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we perish.'" What is your idea about this?

We cannot agree with such a view of the passage in question. Paul was quoting from Isa. 22: 13, and describing the reckless indulgence of those who despised the divine warnings to repentance and the call of the Spirit. It was as though he had said that if this life ended all and if men believed they were to die like beasts they would live like beasts. He imitates the language of the skeptics only to reprove them. See the application in verse 34.

W. G. H., Athens, Ga. 1. Please explain Lev. 16: 21. And who was the "fit man"? 2. How did the days of the week receive their names?

1. "Fit" here means a person already instructed concerning what was to be done and how to do it. According to Jewish tradition the goat was to be led not by a common halter, but by a piece of scarlet cloth tied around its horns, and if this scarlet cloth (or what ultimately remained of it after the death of the scapegoat) turned white, it was a token of divine acceptance. 2. The names of the days of the week are Saxon, and originated in Scandinavian mythology: Sunday, Sun's daeg (Sun); Monday, Moon's daeg (Moon); Tuesday, Tiu's or Tuesco's daeg (Mars); Wednesday, Woden's daeg (Mercury); Thursday, Thor's daeg (Jupiter); Friday, Frygga's daeg (Venus); Saturday, Sæter's daeg (Saturn).

J. B. G., Wilton, Me. Please explain the parable of the unjust steward, Luke 16. What truth did Jesus mean to teach in that parable?

Verse 8 gives the key. Though the children of light are infinitely superior to the worldlings, the latter display some qualities the former might imitate, viz.: sagacity, discretion, energy, determination, perseverance. These qualities they employ to evil purpose, and in the pursuit of fleeting enjoyments. But that the children of darkness should excel the children of light in anything is a reproach on the latter for their indolence and indifference. The parable has its parallel in a sense in the advice, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves."

R. D., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. What is the origin of the prophecy that when the Golden Gate is assailed the Mohammedan power will pass away?

It was Emperor Constantine Palæologus who, over five hundred years ago, forecasting the future, uttered the famous prophecy that the successor of Mohammed should yet hear the blows of the nations upon the Golden Gate, demanding the restoration of the Christian ruler's heritage which had been taken by the Moslems. Through all the centuries, this prophecy has been remembered both by the Turks, the people of the Balkans and the Greeks, and now it seems in process of fulfilment.

Miscellaneous

C. E. T., Woodriver, Neb. Modern commentators hold that there is nothing in the Gospels to identify Mary of Magdala with the "sinner" mentioned in Luke 7: 37, or with other women of like character.

J. M., Decatur, Iowa. According to recently compiled statistics, the Empire of Germany has 64,925,933 population. The Protestants number 39,991,411; Catholics, 23,821,453; Jews, 615,021; 2,114 non-Christians (unallotted); 205,900 belonging to various creeds; 6,138 religion not given.

Reader, Ionia, Mich. Teaching that the soul dies with the body is distinctly opposed to the Scriptures. Christ himself tells us that the souls of the redeemed have a place prepared for them in glory. (See John 14.) Doctrine such as that to which you refer is pagan in the last degree. You only need to read the Gospels to be fully convinced that it is not Christian.

B. A. T., Troy, Vt. 1. In 1. Thess. 5: 12, 13 the apostle commends the leaders in church work—pastors, elders and teachers—to the respect and confidence of the congregation. They were to recognize their office and treat them with respect, giving attention to their admonitions and responding liberally to their requests for material aid in the Lord's work. The church in Thessalonica had been lately organized; some of the ministers were probably new to the place and the people and Paul urged that they be cordially received. They were specially chosen laborers in the vineyard and were entitled, if for no other reason than that they had been selected for places of such importance and responsibility in the Gospel ministry and to work for the salvation of souls, to reverent love and cordial support. Above all this they should be well received "for the very works' sake." It was advice which might be taken by many congregations to-day with great advantage, especially in dealing with any new spiritual leader who comes among them. 2. We do not know the address your letter calls for. 3. There are many legitimate amusements, social and otherwise, which are quite proper for Christian people to have a share in, but we do not count dancing as being among them. Your other question is a matter to be decided by the individual conscience.

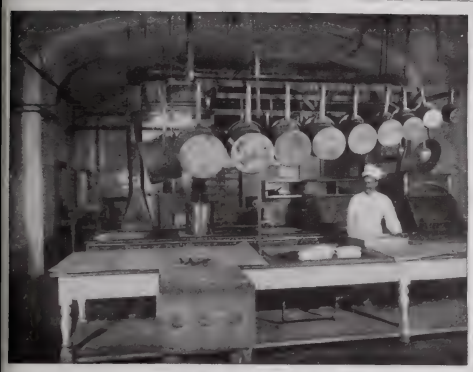
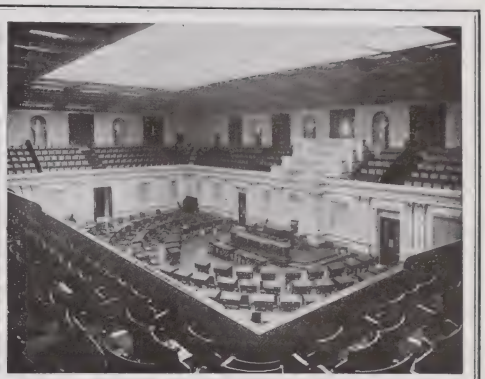
A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

The Model Kitchen in the Capitol Where Meals Are Cooked for the Congressmen



Spraying the Trees at the Capitol

The Redecorated Senate Chamber, Where the Archbold Impeachment Trial Will Be Held



CONGRESS REASSEMBLES IN A REJUVENATED CAPITOL

IMPORTANT work awaits Congress during the winter of 1912-13, although this interval will constitute what is known as a "short session" of our national legislature, and it is only reasonable to expect that atmosphere of restlessness and uncertainty which usually precedes a change of ational administration. To add to the confusion is the circumstance that so any of the members of both houses of Congress are not coming back to the ecial session of Congress which President-elect Wilson has announced his tention to call for a date not later than April 15.

Of the law-makers who will deliver their valedictory at the Capitol this inter a number both in the Senate and in the House are withdrawing volun- rily, or, at least, were not candidates for re-election. Others—some of them eterans of long service on Capitol Hill—went down to defeat at the polls in ovember. Among those who will pass, at least for the present, out of ational politics at Washington after this winter, are a number of the rominent figures who are always pointed out by the guides at the apitol—former Speaker "Uncle Joe" Cannon; Representative cKinley, the millionaire congressman from Illinois, and epresentative Nicholas Longworth of Cincinnati, who was arried in the White House to Miss Alice Roosevelt. The ry circumstance that so many members have not been able "renew their leases" on their offices in the Senate and ouse Office Buildings that flank the Capitol, will in itself responsible for considerable activity at this session. ost of the retiring members have what may be called rsonal bills (in behalf of faithful constituents), or pet ojects which they are anxious to see enacted into laws fore the clock strikes twelve on that eventful day next arch, and they will put forth strenuous endeavors to cure action. However, there are so many weighty mat- rs pressing for disposition at this brief session that ere would seem to be little chance for lesser responsi- lities. In the Senate much of the time during the first onth or two of the session will be taken up with the mpeachment trial of Robert W. Archbold, judge of the nited States Commerce Court. Judge Archbold has been cused of having had business dealings to his own profit ith parties having cases before him, and of having accepted oney from attorneys practicing in his court. President Taft, as is his duty, brought these charges to the attention of the Judiciary ommittee of the House of Representatives, and that body, having ncluded that there was ground for the accusations, recommended the House that the jurist should be impeached, which was done. he Constitution of the United States provides that, whereas the ouse of Representatives has the sole power of impeachment, such ses must be tried in the Senate, and accordingly the Archbold case will cupy the attention of the Senators, sitting as a jury, for several weeks after e opening of the session.

Elliott Woods
"Housekeeper to Congress"

Meanwhile, considerable new legislation of importance will no doubt be cumulating in the House. The Lower House of Congress is expected to take e initiative at this session for a much-needed revision of our patent laws. dditional legislation will be required for our new Parcel Post and certain ovisions will have to be made in anticipation of the inauguration of a new esident. With a special session of Congress assured for the early spring, it not anticipated that there will be much tariff legislation at this closing ssion of the present Congress, but certain special investigations by Con- essional committees, such as the probe of the so-called "money trust," may come in for attention. Altogether it is likely to prove a very lively three months in the great white-domed building. And, speaking of the Capitol, it is worthy of mention that, for all that Congress was rather tardy in getting away from Washington last summer, the brief respite has sufficed to provide a rejuvenated Capitol for the use of the law-makers. The "housekeeper to Congress," Mr. Elliott Woods, superintendent of the United States Capitol, has been more than busy since his five hundred employers departed. His has been the task of crowding a six months' housecleaning job into half that time, but he has managed to accomplish it, and the huge building has been rendered spick and span outside as well as in. The exterior of the building was given a "bath" by means of the co-operation of four fire engines and a large force of firemen, who dragged hose into position from which it was possible to turn streams of water on all the marble surfaces in need of scrubbing. Some rather notable improvements had been planned at the United States Capitol for this year's recess, but when Congress continued in session until "dog days' lack of time placed a veto on such ambitious plans. Minor improvements and ordinary repairs were carried out, however, and perhaps the scope of this work will be the better appre- ciated when it is stated that in the quarter of a year a total of nine hundred and eighty-one separate tasks have been completed. Not all of these were within the Capitol build- ing. Considerable "freshening up" was done in the two office buildings that serve as annexes to the Capitol, and Uncle Sam has spent a tidy sum this autumn on the Capitol grounds—the beautiful park which surrounds our legislative headquarters and which Congress has lately voted to enlarge through the purchase of much of the adjoining property. The severe winter of a year ago left its scars on the Capitol grounds as it did elsewhere in the country, and the most unwelcome outcome was the loss of a number of the stately trees that have won the admiration of visitors to Washington in years gone by. Such loss is in a great measure irreparable, but the gov- ernment has hastened to plant a number of young trees, and that these newcomers may, in after years, possess added interest for the nation, the custom has been followed of having them planted by prominent men. Speaker Champ Clark planted one, as did the late Vice-President Sherman, and a number of the leading Senators followed the example. Meanwhile the officials at the Capitol have bestirred themselves to safeguard such of the forest monarchs as have been spared. The trees have been re- peatedly sprayed to discourage insect pests, and the most expert "tree doctors" in the country have been engaged to practice the new science of "tree surgery" in an effort to arrest the decay of the older trees. From the standpoint of the housewife perhaps the most interesting of the improvements at the Capitol have had to do with the kitchens in which the food of our law-makers and their guests is cooked. Among the new furnishings in the kitchens are two refrigerating machines of four tons' capacity each, and a variety of cooking utensils, including some designed for the use of Mrs. Murphy, the Senate's much-praised official "pie- baker," who turns out each day fifty pies of the proverbial kind "that mother used to make." In keeping with the improvements in the kitchens is an enlargement of the Capitol restaurants, including the provision of an addi- tional dining-room at the Senate restaurant. Easily the most notable of the current improvements at the Capitol is a novel railway on which our Senators

TURNING DARKNESS INTO LIGHT

RUDYARD KIPLING in The Light That Failed told how Dick Heldar, the war correspondent, gone blind in the service, and eating his heart out in London, sensed the battle afar off in the Soudan, and how he made his way by steamer to Port Said, down the Suez Canal to Suakin, by armored train to Tanai-el-Hassan, until at last he rode out over the desert, perched high on the hump of a light riding camel, calling loudly for his friend Torpenhow, and breathing joyfully, blissfully, the old smell of the East.

There are two versions of that story. In one, Dick, picked off at last by the bullets of the Soudanese, falls headlong from the hump of the "bisharin" into the arms of "Torp," dying. In the other he recovers and goes home to "Maisie," his old sweetheart, hand in hand with whom he walks through life, blind as to eye, but clear-seeing as to soul.

Only a story, you say, compelling though it be. Well, then, listen to the truth about another newspaper man whose light went out only to fall with greater brightness upon the lives of others more unfortunate than he.

It is usual in writing the story of a man who is going blind to picture the sad interview that takes place when the specialist tells him for the last time that there is no hope, and to tell how he goes brokenly home to his wife and children, there to receive the precious sympathy which forever after shall brighten the days of his darkness. This is not going to be a story of that kind, for when W. I. Scandlin realized the full force of the specialist's verdict in his case, he then and there made up his mind that repining was not to form any part of his conduct. He had been a good business man, a good writer, and a good friend all his life, and so he bravely resolved that if he was to be blind he was going to be the very best specimen of a blind man that it would be possible for him to be. True, he received the sympathy of his wife and children; but it was not the kind of sympathy that spends itself in words, for his wife, who had been his good comrade ever since they started in life together, also resolved bravely to be that good comrade still, to go hand in hand, to keep step with him in the dark days to come.

Naturally, his first thought was of his family. What could he do as a blind man, not only to support himself, but support them as well? That his children were grown and might be expected to look to themselves never entered his head. He had always provided for them and he meant to keep on doing so. He began assiduously to cultivate such arts as may be pursued by those who are without sight. For instance, it occurred to him that he might become a lecturer, and so he proceeded to write out and to memorize a series of lectures to be delivered after he became blind. He had been an enthusiast in photography, so he proceeded to make a set of lantern slides with which to illustrate each lecture, and for practice he gave these lectures in the privacy of his own home, his brave wife learning them with him, one by one, so that she too might help him in the coming darkness.

He also took lessons on the typewriter, learning every part of it with his hands so that one day he might be able to manipulate any part of it without sight.

Of course, this is all very far from the sad story of a blind man, but this man was a good soldier. He was not looking for sympathy. He had been an efficient worker in all the days of his sight, and would be an efficient worker within his limits during all the days of his darkness; and in this our story gains its greatest pathos.

And so, when the time came that W. I. Scandlin was forced to take up his work as a blind man, he never was compelled to depend upon the generosity of his friends. He soon found work to do along the lines mapped out by him, and, having prepared himself to do that work, he had no difficulty in setting himself to it. Even that in itself is a very good achievement for one who simply refused to be depressed by what is generally accorded to be a most unfortunate condition. But Mr. Scandlin did not stop here. He knew that while he had been foresighted in providing for his own future, there must necessarily be others who had not been, who must need help.

And now a still finer and more beautiful part of the story. With his wife as his eyes he went down into the slums, for there he could expect to find the greatest congregation of poor blind people. And from the little surplus moneys which he earned he began not only to help those blind people who had not been as foresighted as he, but to teach them how to become efficient themselves. So with this one, skilful with his hands, it required but a little manipulation to bring him in touch with work which could be done either at home or in an institution. Did that one possess an acute intellect? There were ways where it might be used to the profit of its possessor.

Naturally, it was not long before his personal efforts became known to those who had tried to help the blind in a larger and perhaps more efficient way. He, as a blind man, could gain the sympathy and the confidence of other blind men more quickly than a sighted person. The New York Association for the Blind asked him to become its regular authorized investigator. He accepted the position, as he says, because he knew it would widen the scope of his work among the sightless. He had been successful to the utmost degree, making daily visits to the slums and even visiting unaided distant points in New York and other States in his constant endeavor to bring work-a-day opportunities to those who wish to take advantage of them.

Of course he has found that all blind men are not of as self-reliant a character as himself; that there are failures among them for reasons that are exactly similar to those which occasion failures among sighted people. A blind man may be just as lazy, just as impractical, just as likely to lie down under misfortune as any person with sight. On the other hand, there are men who have gone blind after reaching the adult period, who are willing and anxious to earn their own living, and who will do so gladly, rather than become a burden on their friends. Mr. Scandlin's own description of his efforts reveals a world of endeavor which is without the ken of the ordinary person. He tells of it in a matter-of-fact way that gives no hint of that tragedy which is revealed in every case where lack of the power to see the beautiful sights of this world is concerned. He says:

"When I found that darkness was inevitable, I started in to work up three illustrated lectures. I had been fond of photography, and I had a lot of prints showing phases of the United States Life-saving Service. Then I worked up a lecture on 'Photography in its Relation to the World'—that is to say, its everyday use—illustrated by seventy or eighty slides. I had still another lecture describing the Postal Service. I started in to learn these slides in regular order, so that to-day I have a number of lectures with seventy to eighty slides each. I can now start in on any of them, talk over an hour and a quarter without a break, and if my operator makes no slip, I can guarantee to make no slip myself. I sometimes get mixed up if the operator becomes unsteady, but Mrs. Scandlin usually goes with me and soon straightens that out. She has been my help and inspiration. I could not do anything without her.

"Well, I won out splendidly. I got $10 a night at first, but nowadays for out-of-town lectures I receive thirty-five and sometimes fifty dollars. In the meantime I had written some short stories which were sold and published, and I have written and published many verses for special occasions, such as Christmas, Easter, and for birthday cards.

"I keep up with the literature of the day as far as I am able, and of course new ideas keep coming constantly. Mrs. Scandlin reads to me, but that can be only when she is disengaged. She has been eyes to me ever since the beginning of my trouble. She learned the typewriter with me so that she might relieve me of the burden of correspondence. She keeps my books. She does everything that a confidential clerk or private secretary could do and more. She gives me ideas, and her off-hand intuition is oftentimes much better than my studied decision.

"Of course, it is but natural to suppose that there would be many blind men who had not gotten ready to be blind; but very little work is required to fill them with the inspiration to do things. Not every one possesses initiative in the first place, but initiative may sometimes be communicated. That is, if you can get close, very close indeed, to the person who is to be helped. In nine cases out of ten, when a man goes blind he will give up and do nothing, but I can take you to half a dozen cases right here in New York of people who have responded to our efforts to help them to help themselves and are doing it splendidly. We have a blind man's improvement club that meets twice a month. I happen to be president of it. We have nearly a hundred members who are profiting by the contact.

"I gain more and more in enthusiasm every day, although naturally I meet with failures. However, the cases which do respond splendidly to treatment are a sufficient encouragement and more than make up for the failures. We keep this constantly in mind. Blind men are just like sighted people except that they do not see. We go on the principle that a person blind or not should be helped accordingly as he deserves it. The sighted public will agree to this as a general proposition, but in the next breath will say, 'Well, he is a poor blind man and he ought to be helped anyway. Why don't you get busy and do something for him?' We may find that he has been helped on many occasions, has had opportunities for self-help given him, and has fallen down in every case.

"Only a short time ago my attention was called by a regularly organized philanthropic society to an appeal which had been inserted in a daily paper for a blind man who had lost his position with a firm where he had been getting $16 a week. Investigation was made and it developed that this man had been kept employed by that concern to the last possible moment, and when informed of the inevitable had become so lazy and abusive that they had been forced finally to lay him off. He is now living almost in luxury owing to the appeal. That appeal should never have gone out, simply because he did not want to work. However, as I said, the successes more than compensate for the failures. I am able very quickly to approach the man who really deserves help. There is a bond of sympathy between us that brings the blind investigator in closer touch with his subject than could be possible with a sighted person.

"I may go into a tenement house, stop in the basement, and ask for John Jones, 'the blind man.' Half a dozen youngsters will immediately volunteer the information that 'he lives on the third floor back' or 'in the rear of the alley way.' I grope along and find the steps, and as I go on up the stairs I hear people whisper under their breath, 'Poor man! he's blind.' That is no deterrent to me. I get up to the third floor, and ask 'Does John Jones live here?' If he does, I greet him with 'Hello, Mr. Jones; I hear you are walking along in the dark like myself. How are you?'

SOULS WON AT THE BOWERY MISSION

THE unexpected often happens to us workers at the Bowery Mission. Never a day passes but some strange human craft appears in the offing, some new star shines out upon the midnight sky, some unexpected traveler stands upon our threshold, some sudden tragedy thrills our hearts.

It was a recent Sunday morning and I was on my way to our meeting. I had just descended the stairway of the Houston Street elevated station on the Bowery, when a man accosted me whom I did not remember to have seen before. He told me he wanted assistance for an old man who had been robbed. No officer was in sight. Guided by my informant I found the man who had "fallen among thieves" in a most deplorable condition, sitting on the stairs of a tenement house. It was the old story. A man of over seventy years of age, overcome by liquor, had been stripped of nearly everything he possessed. He was sober enough by this time to tell me that if only he had a pair of shoes (for the robbers had taken even his shoes), he could manage to get home.

I was already due at the meeting and was obliged to perform the Good Samaritan act through the proxy of my new acquaintance. We obtained a pair of shoes and he promised to see the old man home and report to me later at the Mission. To my great delight, he appeared during the course of the meeting and heard many of the testimonies. When the usual "invitation" was given at the close, he was the first man to rise to his feet. He stayed to the after-meeting and gave himself to God, and since that time has been most regular in his attendance at the Brotherhood meetings and at the Mission services. He had faithfully carried out his commission in attending to the old man, and the little spark of goodness in him, fanned into a flame by his pity for a suffering fellow creature, swept him into the kingdom.

In that same meeting I noticed a respectably dressed man, who, somehow or other, did not seem to fit into our usual crowd. I wondered whether he was a drummer, or a minister on a vacation, or a left-over cart-tail spell-binder from the recent election. He was a man of gigantic stature, weighing probably two hundred and fifty pounds, and of an exceedingly intellectual appearance.

To my surprise he also responded to the closing invitation, and stayed to the after-meeting. There he rose and in decided terms declared his intention to lead a better life. There was no opportunity to converse with him, but in passing out he hurriedly and surreptitiously pushed something into my hands, saying, "There, I will not want that any more." It was the murderous slung-shot of a highway robber. The possession of it, had it been discovered by the police, would have condemned him to a term in the penitentiary. He came to the evening meeting, and next day into our Labor Bureau seeking for honest work. He got it. He is in our Labor Settlement, doing well, qualifying himself for an upright life, and with every promise of success.

Another after-meeting incident of the same day was very dramatic. One of our leaders was formerly connected with a large detective agency, and during that connection had many exciting experiences. On several occasions his life had been in great peril. A few years ago a gang of desperadoes were cornered in a room in the northern part of the city, and a pistol was leveled at the detective's head. His life was saved by one of the crowd, who, realizing the game was up, and that there was no need for loss of life, dashed the gun from the hand of his companion. Other scenes and circumstances soon effaced the memory of this event from his mind, until this particular Sunday in the Bowery Mission of which I am writing. Here, in the after-meeting, the ex-detective met face to face the man who had saved his life. The ex-gangster had come as a penitent sinner, seeking deliverance from a sinful life, and tenderly and patiently did the ex-detective lead him to the Saviour who gives eternal life to all who believe in him.

Distributing Thanksgiving Baskets in the Basement of the Bowery Mission

Never was the work of the Bowery Mission so much needed as at present. The crowds of homeless, hopeless, Christless men are bigger than ever. This is the time of year when we look to the generous readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to contribute to the support of the work. I know we shall not look in vain.

J. G. HALLIMOND,
Superintendent.

Sunday, November 24, was the thirty-third anniversary of the founding of the Mission. The day was one of the best, in spiritual results, in its history. At the morning service, Dr. W. P. Ferguson spoke most forcibly and winsomely on the subject: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." Forty-three men accepted cards, and at the evening service forty cards were returned signed, bringing two score men into the fellowship of the Mission "Brotherhood." This is an unusually large percentage; ordinarily about a third of the men who are willing to take cards sign and return them. The intense spiritual impression made at the morning service was well sustained in the evening by the address of the beloved Bishop Darlington, one of the Mission's best friends, who had come all the way from Harrisburg to talk to the men of the Bowery about "Thanksgiving," reminding them of the things they still have to be grateful for and gently urging them to a better life. At the evening service eighteen men took cards. Mr. Hunt, at the bishop's special request, sang "The Homeland." Monday night was devoted to the industrial interests of the Mission. Reports were made, showing that in the five years the Labor Bureau has been in operation, positions have been found for 17,334 men. Figures for the present year will run to five thousand. Mr. Hunt, manager of the bureau, is proud to state that of all the thousands of men who have found positions, unsatisfactory reports have come from less than five per cent. The successful work of the new Industrial Settlement in the Bronx was also described. Nearly fifty men at a time are now kept at this Home from which they are sent out to positions at useful labor. It is expected that the capacity of the Home will soon be increased to 100. The mission is also establishing industries such as chair-caning, upholstering, mattress-making, etc., etc., in its Bowery building. Mr. Bolton Hall, lawyer, author, labor and farm expert, delivered a telling address at the night meeting.

On Tuesday evening Mr. George B. Class conducted an evangelistic service. On Wednesday evening Dr. Wilbert W. White, president of the Bible Teachers' Training School at New York, delivered a devotional address. At midnight Mr. C. D. Usinger, a convert of the Mission and now superintendent of Faith Mission, New York, led a service inaugurating the "Bread Line" for the winter, after which the first long line of hungry, homeless men were given their one o'clock lunch. Thanksgiving Day morning at nine, the basket dinners were distributed; at eight P.M., the great annual Thanksgiving dinner was given to twelve hundred men. On Friday evening, Dr. C. H. Mead, president of the board of directors of the Mission, delivered a temperance address, and on Saturday evening the Brotherhood held a social reunion. A fuller account of the Thanksgiving Day proceedings and the later events of the week will appear in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—REV. L. F. OSTRANDER, an American Board Missionary at Samokov, Bulgaria, who was a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Macedonian Relief Committee in 1904, writes us as follows: "The following paragraph appeared in the issue of October 25 of The Near East, a publication that is decidedly pro-Turkish in its sympathies and attitude: 'The "victims" mentioned in the Turkish newspapers as having been maltreated in Bulgaria of late have telegraphed to the ministry of the interior indignantly denying the statements of the Turkish press. Two Turkish notables, inhabitants of Dobritch, near Varna, whom the Turkish newspapers reported as having been murdered, have sent the following telegram: 'The statements in the Turkish newspapers Sabah and Tanin that we have been murdered are not true. We are alive and enjoying good health, and up to now have not been molested in any way. It is not true that £T3,000 were taken from me, Hajji Hassan Bekiroff. We indignantly reject the aspersions cast upon the Bulgarian authorities. Signed: Turham Bey, Hajji Hassan Bekiroff.' Almost all the chiefs of the Turkish communities throughout the country have sent similar telegrams, stating that they are quite satisfied with the care and protection of the Bulgarian authorities.' In confirmation of the view that all such reports of massacres by Bulgarians are malicious fabrications disseminated by enemies and non-sympathizers for the purpose of discrediting Bulgaria, it may be stated that Turkish inhabitants of Bulgaria have the same political rights as Bulgarian citizens; that there are Turkish officials both local and in parliament. During a residence of more than ten years in Bulgaria I have known of no acts of public or mob violence of Bulgarians towards Turks in Bulgaria in spite of the great provocation that has so often been given by atrocities perpetrated on Bulgarians across the boundary in Turkish territory. The fairness, moderation and self-restraint of the Bulgarian population of the country has been simply wonderful in view of all the circumstances. We are glad that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has started a relief fund for the Balkans. The ravages of war and massacre cannot be fully stated at the present time, but what we have already heard indicate an appalling condition in many places. Moreover, winter has begun unusually early and threatens a long period of suffering for those who are destitute of food, fuel, clothing and shelter. We therefore pray that your efforts for this humane purpose may be abundantly successful."

—CLARENCE W. BOWEN, the proprietor and publisher of The Independent, has retired, having transferred his ownership to Hamilton Holt, who for the past ten years has been managing editor.

—EUROPEAN TURKEY comprises about 60,000 square miles. Bulgaria is about the size of Indiana; Greece of West Virginia; Montenegro is smaller than Connecticut, and Servia has an area equal to New Hampshire and Vermont. Constantinople has 1,000,000 population. These statistics are interesting in view of the present war.

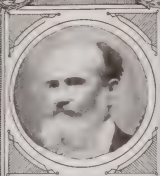
—COUNT ROMANONES, a man of distinguished family and great wealth, has been appointed prime minister of Spain to succeed Premier Canalejas, lately assassinated. The choice seems to be a popular one, but whether the new appointee will carry out the policies of his predecessor is not made clear. The count has been at the head of great business enterprises and has successfully financed large undertakings in Morocco, where he holds valuable concessions.

—IN A RECENT after-dinner speech in New York, President Taft declared strongly for a single six-year term for President, and favored the admission to both Houses of Congress of members of the presidential cabinet, but without a vote.

—THE VOTE ON THE Prohibition amendment in West Virginia, November 5, resulted in about 80,000 majority for the amendment. Every county in the State but two went "dry." The temperance forces were federated and the churches thoroughly united in the contest, and they regard the result as one of the greatest temperance victories within a decade. The law goes into effect July 1, 1914. The States now in the Prohibition column are Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, Georgia, Oklahoma, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee and West Virginia.

—WITH VERY LITTLE publicity, the movement for a union on vital questions of faith and order among the Protestant churches makes steady progress. This movement was begun at the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church two years ago, since which time a number of the leading denominations have appointed representatives and others are looking toward similar action. Among those that have already appointed representatives are the following bodies: Episcopal, Congregational, Disciples, Presbyterian, Reformed Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Moravian, Evangelical Lutheran, United Presbyterian, Free Baptist, Church of England in Canada and others. The scope of the proposed joint commission includes all questions touching faith and order and the invitation is open to every Christian communion throughout the world which confesses Christ as Lord and Saviour. It is too early to speculate on the possibilities of this great work for the harmonizing of Christian beliefs, as its labors will hardly be concluded within five years from the time of organization.

The Eastern Question and Armageddon



A Sermon

BY

Rev. A. B. Simpson, D.D.*

TEXT: "And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon." Rev. 16: 16

THE Eastern Question has been the traditional problem of European statesmen for many generations. The Balkans have been the storm center of Europe for more than a century. The watchful eyes of diplomacy are ever upon these little nationalities which to-day are waging such successful war against the Turkish Empire. The subject is one of intense spiritual as well as political interest, and God only knows what the issues of this great conflict may be.

While these Balkan States are petty nationalities in themselves, none of them having more than a few million inhabitants, yet their location and the elements that constitute their population and their relation to the surrounding nations, all combine to give them a peculiar significance and to make them the source of infinite possibilities of trouble.

One cause for this is the fact that they are what diplomatists call buffer States. A buffer State is one that is geographically placed between two Powers to keep them from getting too close together. The neutral territory of this intervening State makes it impossible for them to reach each other with hostile armies.

The Cause of the War

These Balkan States are political cushions that soften the force of military aggression as between Austria, Russia, Germany, Italy and Turkey, and for that reason it has been considered by diplomats a matter of supreme importance to keep their territorial limitations and political relations as unchanged as possible. That is the problem that is now facing the Great Powers.

A still stronger reason for trouble arises from the different races and religions which we find in these different States. Less than one-half the population are Mohammedans. The rest are Oriental Christians belonging to various ancient churches of the East, but all united against the hated despotism of the Turk and the Moslem.

In view of these conditions there has been ceaseless strife and constant suffering in all these little communities, and war after war has arisen because of these difficulties. The Powers of Europe have tried to compel Turkey to treat her Christian subjects in these provinces with justice and fairness. She has been lavish in promises, but has invariably failed to fulfil them, so that revolution after revolution has broken out in Macedonia, Albania and other European provinces of Turkey. At last these four Powers, Servia, Bulgaria, Montenegro and Greece, have united their forces against the Turk, and we hear the echoes of the thunders of war from the Bosporus and the Balkans.

This is the human side of the question and one of intense interest. The forces are perhaps evenly matched. About ten millions of allies are fighting European Turkey with about eight or nine millions, and Asiatic Turkey, with still a larger force behind.

As It Was Prophesied

Turning from the human to the divine side of this question the light of prophecy falls upon all the interests involved here with peculiar significance. In the seventh and eighth chapters of Daniel we have a prophetic vision of the great empires down to the end of time. Among these various powers that are to rise and fall the vision of the prophet was concentrated upon two which he described as "Little Horns." The one described in the seventh chapter is a little horn which rose up among the other horns of this wild beast and became greater than all of them. It was to be a spiritual as well as political power and become the oppressor and persecutor of the saints of God, and at last to be destroyed by the coming of the Son of Man.

While there are differences of opinion among prophetic interpreters, yet a great body of Bible teachers unite in identifying this with the Papal power, the Little Horn of the Roman Church, which for more than a thousand years fulfilled the first part of the description and is now fulfilling the last by its gradual decay, the breaking down of the temporal power fifty years ago, and the evident weakening of all the political States which stood behind it.

In the eighth chapter of Daniel we have another Little Horn which fills the Eastern world as the Roman horn filled the vision of the Western world. This Oriental Little Horn of the eighth chapter rose out of Alexander's empire, especially out of Syria, and is easily identified with the Mohammedan Antichrist, that awful system of iniquity that arose at the same time as the Papacy, that swept a circle of devastation as great as Rome and lasted for the same period, and is now being gradually destroyed by the same unseen hand of the Ancient of Days and the Son of Man.

We are told of that Little Horn that he waxed "exceeding great, toward the south and toward the east and toward the pleasant land" (Dan. 8: 9). The pleasant land is Palestine. Mohammedanism swept the south of Asia and a large part of Africa. It covers India to-day and the East. One of its first goals was Jerusalem, and within twelve years after the flight of Mohammed, Omar, his captain, had captured Jerusalem and turned the site of Solomon's temple into the site of the Mosque of Omar. "And it waxed great even to the host of heaven." That is the church of God. "And it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground." The stars are the ministers of Christ. Mohammedanism swept away in a few years thousands of Christian churches, and many of the mosques of the East to-day have the inscriptions of Christian temples under the plaster which covers their arches. "It cast . . . the stars down to the ground and stamped upon them. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice [worship] was taken away and the place of the sanctuary was cast down." Jerusalem was trodden down by the Moslems. "And a host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practiced and prospered." Idolatry and apostasy on the part of the Christian Church brought about these conditions. What a picture of the story of Mohammedan triumph and oppression!

The Seven Vials of Revelation

Now that is the fearful power that for twelve hundred years or more has been overshadowing the Oriental world. It finally swept into France, conquered the south of Spain, invaded Eastern Europe, and but for the victory of Charles Martel would have swept the whole of Europe and blotted out the last vestige of Christianity. This thing, Mohammedanism, specially identified with the Turk, is the incarnation of all that is devilish in Satanic power and fiendish in human ferocity. The pages of history are red with the stain of its fierce cruelty. The very gates of Paradise are opened to them by the murder and outrage of the followers of Christ. Within our lifetime the stories of Armenia and Bulgaria reek with nameless shame and horror, and have imprinted upon our memory the realization of the unspeakable Turk, which no language can fully express, and which no doubt to-day is inspiring an earnest prayer in the hearts of millions that the time may at last have come for his being driven out of Europe and even banished from the face of the earth.

But as we turn to the prophetic page we find that judgment is sure to fall upon this abominable system of Satanic power and human oppression. We have already referred to Daniel's prophecy that it should be "broken without hand." In Revelation 16: 12 we have a distinct vision of the judgment that is to fall upon it. "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the East might be prepared." This sixteenth chapter of Revelation is a very wonderful summary of God's last judgments upon the powers of evil before the coming of the Son of Man. These are represented by seven vials, seven great visitations of fierce judgment that are to be poured out from heaven by special avengers sent forth from the throne. The first four of these vials seem to indicate the wars of Napoleon in the beginning of the nineteenth century, that period of carnage and judgment that swept over all the Roman Catholic countries of Europe. And the allusions here are so distinct that there is no doubt in the minds of multitudes of interpreters that this is the beginning of those divine judgments that began to break the power of Papal Rome.

The fifth vial was poured upon the seat of the Beast. That was Rome itself. After all the papal lands had been devastated, then Rome became the target for the batteries of heavenly judgment. This covered a number of years, during which the Pope was twice taken prisoner. In 1870 in the hour of his blasphemous proclamation of infallibility, his temporal power was swept from him and he was made a prisoner in the Vatican. Italy became a free land and the last vestige of the throne that had oppressed the world for centuries was destroyed. Judgment to that extent at least was complete. God had poured out the vial of his judgment upon the seat of the wild beast.

The Passing of the Turk

Now we come to the sixth vial. The scene is changed from Rome, the Western Little Horn, the Antichrist that had overshadowed Europe, to the Eastern Little Horn, the Mohammedan Power, the Turk, represented by the River Euphrates. It was from this valley that the Turk had come and it was the peculiar type of his desolating power. Even historians of Oriental nations sometimes use the very figure of the Euphrates as describing Mohammedanism and the Turk.

The drying up of the Euphrates is an appropriate symbol of the gradual weakening of the Turkish power, which has now been in progress for more than one hundred and fifty years. From 1768-1774 there was almost constant war between Russia and Turkey, ending in the Peace of Kanardje, which sealed the first series of dismemberments of the Turkish Empire, and followed the practical annihilation of the Turkish navy. In 1806 the two provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia were separated from Turkey and afterwards became the kingdom of Roumania. In 1827 Greece secured her independence, and Servia in 1829. In 1832 Egypt, under Mehemet Ali, threw off the Turkish yoke and even threatened Constantinople itself. In 1844 the Powers compelled Turkey to issue a decree of toleration permitting religious liberty to all her Christian subjects. In 1876 Bulgaria became a free state. Since then further reductions have been made on Turkish territory in Asia and a firmer restraint has constantly been pressed upon her by the European Powers. A few years ago the revolt of the Young Turkish party overthrew the old régime and for a time promised radical reforms. But these have failed to materialize, so far, at least, as liberty for her Christian subjects has been concerned. Steadily her cup of iniquity has become filled until at last the overflow came in the recent Italo-Turkish war through which her African possessions have been wrested from her, her navy utterly humiliated, and her prestige greatly weakened. The Balkan States have been quick to take advantage of all this, and now at last have united in a great religious alliance, and already half a million men are pressing forward to Constantinople.

On to Armageddon

Whether this is to bring the final chapter in the fall of Turkey, God alone knows; but the most superficial observer cannot fail to see that the Eastern world is facing a momentous crisis and that prophetic fulfilment is moving on apace.

But the fall of Turkey is but the means to a greater end. The waters of the Euphrates are drying up in order that the way of the Kings of the East may be prepared. Who are these kings? What interpretation so simple and so obvious as the chosen people, the Jews, the elect nation, whom God has foreordained to be the sovereigns of the East and of the millennial age? Already they are the ngs of the financial world. Already eir influence in politics, literature ıd diplomacy is paramount. Al-ady through the powerful organi-tion of Zionism they are carefully ıd effectively planning for the reor-ınization of a Jewish state at no dis-nt day. But the great obstacle to eir national hopes and the great op-essor of their race has always been e Turk. By him Jerusalem has en trodden down for more than 'elve centuries, and the removal of ırkish misrule and oppression will en the way for Israel to come to its 'n, and every student of prophecy ıows that the restoration of Israel eans the return of the Lord.

And so the vision widens as we fol-w our text and come to the next age of prophetic fulfilment, Arma-ddon. Armageddon is the last bat-e of the ages with the Lord Jesus ırist and his few faithful followers ong with the Jewish nation on one le and the earth's ungodly myriads cretly led by Satan on the other.

We are permitted in this chapter to ive a glimpse behind the scenes. "I w three unclean spirits like frogs me out of the mouth of the dragon, ıd out of the mouth of the beast, ıd out of the mouth of the false ophet. For they are the spirits of evils, working miracles, which go rth unto the kings of the earth and the whole world, to gather them to e battle of that great day of God lmighty." These are the forces that e leading up to the Armageddon. ney are spiritual forces. They come om three sources. The first eman-es directly from Satan, and this we ay be sure is kept well in disguise. e is too skilful a leader to show mself and his immediate emissa-es. The second are the politicians. pirits that come from the mouth of e beast represent earthly power. his beast stands for the evil govern-ent of human history and these are last consolidated in the one final nfederation representing political ower, commercial corporations, hu-an culture and false religion.

And this leads us to the last of ese spirits of evil, which comes om the mouth of the false prophet. hat represents false teaching, false orship, fanaticism and all those piritual forces of irreligion which are oroad in the world to-day. These are l mutually approaching and heading o for the last great conflict, that day ' days which will bring the end of the resent age, the expulsion of Satan nd all his works from this sin-cursed orld, and the kingdom of our Lord nd Saviour Jesus Christ.

The forces of earth and heaven re rallying for Armageddon, but efore the storm shall burst upon is devoted world the whispered sig-al falls upon our ears, "Behold, I ome for you: be ready and robed to eet me." And then when we have en caught from the awful scene the sion of Armageddon sweeps on and ie tragedy of earth is complete. "He athered them together in a place illed Armageddon."

THE CHRISTMAS SPENDERS

THE army of holiday spenders is moving to the front three hundred million strong—more or less. In a few days the ranks, if there be any, will be broken by the last frantic assault upon the bargain counters, and the toy counters, and the fancy contraption sales everywhere, as the spenders cast themselves desperately into the final battle of Christmas Eve. Everybody must be remembered, and everybody must have a gift. Note books and pencils are busy. There are father and mother and sister and brother and all the close relatives and friends who come within the first list for real gifts. Then there is the second list of relatives not quite so near and friends not quite so dear, who can be remembered with post cards. But, oh! there are so many, when the lists are all made up. How can the money be made to go around!

You hear excited or nervous questionings on every hand. "What shall I get for Tom? I can't spend more than $— on him, and I'm sure I don't know what he wants that doesn't cost more.". . . "There, I've spent all but $— and my list isn't half finished! I'll have to cross off Kate, and make Jim and Harry get along with less than I intended." . . . "I suppose I must give Aunt Sue something. She sent me something last year. Do you know anything she wants that won't cost more than $—, but will look like $—?" . . . "Well, that's done at last. It's pretty, but you'd never imagine the amount of time and work I've spent on it. I hope Dorothy will appreciate it and not get the lace and ribbons all mussed the first day."

The cry of the spenders of money and labor and time is going up in an endless complexity of pleasure and discontent from multitudes at this season, until one is tempted to quote the protest of Isaiah, "Wherefore do ye spend your money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not?"

What! Am I uttering a note of discord at this season of joy? Am I causing a jangle, out of tune with the prevailing spirit of good will and Christmas cheer? No, not causing one, only recording one, and that for the purpose of suggesting how greater harmony and more perfect joy may be given to the celebration of Christmas.

SPENDING for others is the most natural and appropriate expression of the Christmas spirit. It is beautiful and God-like if done rightly. Christmas began with the most stupendous expenditure ever known. God gave the first Christmas gift. If we follow his example in giving we celebrate Christmas day most fittingly. Our giving, however, has, to a very large extent, degenerated into "shopping," and buying or making foolish things for the purpose of keeping up our part in the annual exchange of presents. We spend money lavishly "for that which is not bread," and we spend hours of labor "for that which satisfieth not."

Thousands of gifts are bought grudgingly and are received with profuse acknowledgments, but a concealed sniff of discontent. Thousands of other gifts are offered to balance accounts or to serve as substitutes for real affection. A year of indifference or unkindness has made a long record on the debit side. Never mind, a watch, or a bracelet, or a fur piece, or a pair of embroidered slippers will square the account, with a little credit over to apply on the next year. If there has been dissension or coldness in the home, anything that will bring peace and good will is to be welcomed, even if it be reserved for Christmas. If there be a long debt to pay, something on account is better than nothing; but to many a father, or mother, or husband, or wife, or son, or daughter, or brother, or sister, the gift at Christmas time is a mockery instead of a joy. They have been hungry and starving for love, and behold! in the glitter of candles, festooned in green and tinsel, bedecked with laces and ribbons, or gorgeous with gold and jewels—a stone.

THERE is just one thing in all the catalogue of gifts the giving of which is sure to satisfy. There is just one thing that every spender may put at the head of the Christmas list, and it will insure the best celebration of the beautiful birthday. No purse is too small, though the value of the gift is beyond price. Without it Christmas is a failure; but joy is sure for the one who receives and the one who gives, when the gift is—self.

Be very sure, you daughters who are preparing pretty things for father or mother, or for sister or brother, that they will care little for your gift unless they know you are giving yourself with it. Be very sure, you husbands who think to satisfy the hunger of a whole year by giving your wives some costly present, that the gift will not satisfy their hunger. They want you. Be very sure, you big sons who may be wondering what to give to "pop," that he is hungry for one thing only, and in the tense silence of his busy, hurried life, he is crying out with a voiceless echo of the man in Proverbs, "My son, give me thine heart!"

SPENDING for Christmas will glorify the day if it is a spending of self for the joy and blessing of others. Only by such spending will the matchless Gift of the first Christmas day be fittingly commemorated. Charity to the poor and needy is incomplete unless love goes with it. In all our busy preparations during these days before Christmas, isn't it possible to plan for a little self-giving to some who are neglected and cheerless? Send money, and clothing, and food and toys to the families whose address Santa Claus has forgotten. Yes, send them by all means. You will have to spend no more money for them than you can afford. But think it over first and see if you cannot take them instead. Take them, and go yourself. Spend some of your time and strength and sympathy in personal contact with those who are in sorrow and distress. Spend your money—that will help; but spend also yourself, for that will help more. A good Christmas dinner, a warm coat, and a pile of coal and wood will strengthen and warm a poor body; but a bright smile, a hearty word of cheer, a brotherly, sisterly clasp of the hand will strengthen and warm a poor heart. Remember the poor, homeless men and boys of the Bread Line. You can make Christmas a real festival for them, if you will.

Spend your money for Christmas as wisely and as unselfishly as you can; but think of the Maker of Christmas and join with him in spending your heart's love.

MY MISSION

I WAS longing for a mission
Fancy made it something grand—
Something that would win the praises
Of the world on every hand.
So I squandered time in waiting
For the chance that never came—
Quite forgot to think of others
In my longings after fame.

But one day I had a vision
Of the needy ones near by
Of the hearts that starve with hunger
Till they faint, and fall, and die.
Starve for little deeds of kindness,
Or a word of hope and cheer,
And the smiles that cost so little
But can make it heaven here.

Then it was I found my mission—
Knew what work God meant for me,
And I cried, "Forgive my blindness,
Now, at last, thank God, I see!"
And my heart, that had been selfish
In its longing to be great,
Saw great fields of labor waiting
For me just outside my gate.

So I seek to scatter sunshine
In a dark and cheerless place.
Loving words have given courage:
Smiles have cheered the tearful face.
In the joy of helping others
God's good time I waste no more
Since my life has found its mission
Waiting at the very door.

Jewish Colonists in Palestine

THERE are now over 100,000 colonizing Jews in Palestine, and according to a writer in the Osmanischer Lloyd they are rapidly redeeming the country. Of these 50,000 or 60,000 are in Jerusalem alone, and despite the "red passport" with which foreign Jews must provide themselves, and which limits their stay in Palestine to three months, their establishment of stores in the city and their purchase of farms in the surrounding country goes on. In other words, these foreign Jews furnish the capital and the executive ability in making the native Jews of Palestine self-supporting, and in many cases wealthy, while insuring to themselves the basis of comfortable fortunes.

What this influx of Jewish capital and brains has meant to Palestine may be gathered from the figures presented by the Osmanischer Lloyd. The colonists now own forty villages and about 40,000 hectares (100,000 acres) of land, 75 per cent. of which are under cultivation, viz., 8,600 hectares (21,000 acres) in Judea, (15 colonies); 6,000 (15,000 acres) in Samaria, (eight colonies); 16,200 (40,000 acres) in Galilee, (16 colonies); and 200 (500 acres) in the Trans-Jordan country, (one colony). The most important of these settlements, which were founded between 1878 and 1902, are Pethach-Tikweh (1,500 colonists), Rishon le Zion (1,000 colonists) in Judea, Zikhron-Jacob (1,000 colonists) in Samaria, and Rosh-Pinah (800 colonists) in Galilee.

Macedonian Children Awaiting Relief. The Figure in Black Uniform is the Servian Jeanne d'Arc

NOT on the firing-line at Adrianople or before the grim, disease-hiding wall at Chatalja, but in the chancellories of Europe, in the hospitals and in the homes of Bulgaria and Macedonia has the interest of the last week centered. Behind closed doors the statesmen of six great nations are working desperately to avert war between Austria and Servia and the general embroglio that would inevitably follow. From the hospitals and the homes come stories of privation and suffering that rival any the world has ever heard. The heroic fortitude of the wounded soldiers and of their needy families is inspiring. The blood of thousands of their own race—their own church—calls for vengeance on the Turk now that the weight of his iron heel is lifted. They are sacrificing everything, even life itself, in their devotion to their Christianity, their king and their country.

The feelings of the whole nation find expression in a few sentences of a letter from Rev. N. P. Mihailoff, one of the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee. He writes: "The Bulgarian king has characterized this war as the cross against the crescent. That it is, of course, but more. It is light against darkness, liberty against oppression, civilization against barbarism. Martyrs for the confession of Christ! Look not to Rome! The flowery fields of Macedonia have been impurpled with the blood of more than Nero slew." He concludes: "But, alas, how great the price of liberty! Thousands must fall before the cruel scythe of war while hundreds of thousands quail before the grim specter of starvation."

By cable from a professional correspondent at Philippopolis comes the following heartrending account of the sufferings of the wounded. Most of the wounded make the long journey from the front in ox-wagons, slow-moving and springless, jolting and reeling over roads that are unimaginable by English people. In wet weather they are seas of liquid mud, often axle-deep, which hide cruel hollows and hillocks in the track; in dry weather they are wide, dusty paths broken by innumerable gullies and hummocks and deep-worn wheel-tracks.

"Very many of the less badly hurt," says the correspondent, "those with cuts and shrapnel wounds about the hands and arms, trudge along beside the wagons in which their sorely wounded comrades lie on a bed of straw. One never hears a groan or a murmur. Those peasants have much of the stoicism of the East. But the long jolting journey to the hospitals is, alas! not the worst part of their sufferings. I saw in one hospital near the front—I wish I could forget the sight—a young Bulgarian officer whose body, head, arms, and legs were torn and gouged with thirteen separate wounds, shrapnel and bullet, and he was dying of exposure. He had lain thus wounded on the battlefield for three nights and two days, yet so strong was his physique that but for the exposure and the resulting gangrene and pneumonia, the doctors said he surely would have recovered. And his mother sat at the foot of the bed, motionless and dry-eyed, dumb with grief, watching the nurses tenderly dressing her son's awful wounds. They told me that she was a widow, and that she had two other sons at the front. I saw one great bearded Bulgarian, with a bullet in his head, lying on the floor between two beds in one of which was a Turk and in the other a Pomak. He beckoned to the doctor and muttered something. 'He wants to know when he will be able to go back,' said the doctor. 'He has a wounded son in the next ward, but he does not ask about him.'

"More than a third of the wounded men in this big hospital were Turks. They say that the Turks left most of their wounded on the field. They also say that they left few of the Bulgarian wounded. I heard horrid stories of mutilation and murder, but one hears so many tales of horror in a war that one should only tell of things seen. I saw a chubby little Bulgarian baby, scarcely three years of age, which the soldiers said they found in a village near Kirk-Kilisseh crying by the side of its murdered mother. One of the nurses, who lost a seventeen-year-old son at Kirk-Kilisseh, was going to adopt it.

"No praise can be too high for the foreign doctors and nurses and for the Bulgarian women of all degrees who are working night and day, often in circumstances that must be trying beyond description. What must be the emotions of mothers and wives and daughters and sisters tending the terrible wreckage of friend and foe while ignorant as to the welfare or even the whereabouts of their own loved ones! And as I write this I hear from the street below the lusty singing of several thousand more Macedonian and Armenian men and Bulgarian boys on their way to the front."

Mihailoff, Editor the Swetnik of the National Church; and Rev. S. Tomoff, Ph D. Standing, from the left: S. Polychroniadis, the Greek Vice-Consul; Mrs. V. Tsoneva, wife of former Rector of Sofia University; and M. Nenadich, the Servian Vice-Consul.

The generous treatment that has been accorded the Turkish captives and wounded by the Bulgarians recalls some of the early statements of the newspaper correspondents only to discredit them. In an account of the outbreak of hostilities in the Near East which appeared in our issue of October 23, a despatch which emanated from Olenitza, Roumania, and which was forwarded from Vienna to London, was quoted. This telegram described a massacre which was stated to have occurred at Turtukai. During the last few days we have learned not only from the authoritative statements of our own correspondents but from general news despatches that this and many similar statements were inspired by Turkish officials and never had the slightest foundation of fact.

Pastor D. N. Furnajieff, the president of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee, writes in forwarding the accompanying photograph, which was made in Sofia: "You will notice that some of the members of the committee are not shown. Rev. T. T. Holway, who lives in Samokov, could not attend the first meeting when this picture was made. Rev. Dr. E. E. Count, Methodist Episcopal missionary in Sofia, was absent from the city on official duties. The Turkish mufti, who is a splendid old gentleman, was present at the studio, but as the Koran forbids it, he could not be in the picture. He permitted his secretary to be photographed,

As it happens, however, this unique transportation line is not located t the surface but in a tunnel underneath the Capiol grounds, where it will not be seen by many visiors unless they specially seek it out. The new ad is an electric line of the monorail type, which as attracted so much attention in Germany and ther foreign countries. By means of this ystem, which is operated by uction, a heavy-laden mail sack may be whisked between the two buildings as easily as the pneumatic carrier in a department store brings the customer's change from the cashier's desk.

A problem to which the lawmakers and the officials at the Capitol must give attention at this present session is that of providing for the larger Congress that will assemble in response to the summons of President Wilson next spring. Perhaps the general public has overlooked the fact that this is the last session when a body of less than four hundred men makes up the House of Representatives, but the officials at our national law factory have not lost sight of the impending increase in the legislative family, and they are duly puzzled as to the best manner in which to take care of the larger assemblage.

The new Congress that will assemble in the spring will have 433 Representatives on its roster—an increase of 43 over the present strength—and it is imperative that an entirely new plan of seating the members shall be adopted. Although it may be a little early to predict, it seems certain that the solution will be found in removing all the desks that are now provided in the House, and substituting chairs, which would occupy little if any more room than the desk chairs now provided, and would thus enable a gain of all the space now occupied by desks. If the desks are removed, as is now planned, each of the new chairs will be provided with a broad arm or some such rest for books, memorandum pad, etc. The officials had expected that they would have all the time between March 4 next and December 1 in which to make the needed alterations, but now that an extra session is planned it means that only a few weeks will be available in which to refurnish the Hall, and this will necessitate very lively work.

OUR RELIEF WORK IN THE BALKANS

"Dr. Erenpreis, the Jewish rabbi, who is the last member of the committee, was prevented from attending by official duties. The committee is regarded here as a strong and representative one.

"The Red Cross Societies of various countries have already come on the field, but their special work is not along the line of relieving the needy outside the hospitals. This work must, to a great extent, be handled by our committee. I am glad we have the mufti with us, because the need among the Turks in Macedonia and the Adrianople district is simply appalling. They have, for years, subsisted on the labors of the other peoples and have never known need. Now all this is changed. They are simply starving.

"Our present plans are to continue giving assistance by providing necessary clothes, food and fuel. The pressure of the need has become so great that we are feeling more than ever the importance of the relief work and seeing more clearly how long it must continue. Wounded soldiers are rapidly arriving from the front, and though the hospitals take all the serious cases, there are many who return to their homes with minor wounds. Already the heads of many households have been killed. There will be widows and orphans in such numbers as our land has never known before, and they must be cared for, for the time being at least.

"Yesterday a number of wounded soldiers were brought to Sofia. As they were laid on stretchers one by one to be carried from the autos to the Red Cross Hospital, a throng of eager men and women were intently watching them. A woman, the wife of an officer, who had heard that her husband is wounded, was watching the soldiers, intently anxious to see her husband. He happened to be there; and as he was taken out of the auto she recognized him and gave a shriek, speaking his name, to which he raised his head a little only to say 'quite well,' but dropped down in the cot as if overpowered by his wound.

"The Turks have been told that any who fall into Christian hands will be butchered. A few days ago three Turks were brought to one of the hospitals in Sofia. The scare on their faces was touching. After a nurse had dressed the wound of one of them, the Turk turned and offered her a coin equal in value to two cents, as a token of appreciation. The attending physician said, 'You need not tip, you will need all the money you can get. We are not so badly off as you are,' and handed to him a franc, which the Turk took.

"The weather is getting to be cold. Our winters are far from mild, especially about Sofia. This morning the weather was cold and frosty. In front of a house the evening before they had been sawing wood. Pieces of bark had been left on a heap with the sawdust. A woman, perhaps about fifty years old, was picking up the small chips and pieces of bark, evidently to warm herself and family. There are families whose head has gone to the war without leaving a shovel of coal, or armful of wood, or a handful of flour, or any other provision for the winter. What do you imagine these families do for a living? God only knows! Here is a sample of the condition of hundreds of families. On the evening when the mobilization of the army was declared, a certain father, a laborer, whose dwelling I know, saw that he had nothing to leave for his family. He had only one kitchen vessel that could be sold. He had bought it at eight francs, and now he went, sold it for two francs, bought five loaves of bread, and came home. The oldest of his children, a boy of fourteen years, asked him: 'Papa, are you going to-morrow?' The father replied, 'Yes.' 'And what shall we do when these loaves are finished?' At this question the boy began to cry, realizing the utter poverty and hunger to which they would be reduced. The father went across the street to see a family of my own congregation. There he related the above incident, and when he told them how his oldest child cried, he himself broke down and wept.

"Dear CHRISTIAN HERALD reader, is it not you that God wants to use in his providence to feed these poor and hungry people?

"Any and every help will be gratefully received, and you may be sure it will be recorded in the books of the Judge of all the earth."

Pensioning Ex-Presidents

WHILE we cannot believe that Mr. Andrew Carnegie was moved by anything other than a generous impulse in proposing to provide, through the Carnegie Corporation, a liberal life-pension for our ex-Presidents, it has been made clear by the very emphatic expression of opinion on the subject that the offer is one that cannot be accepted by the American people. National self-respect forbids our acceptance as a gift from any citizen of a service which, if it is to be performed at all, should be done by the nation itself. If our ex-Presidents are to be pensioned, the provision must be made for them from the public treasury and not from the pocket of any individual, native or foreign-born.

Mr. Carnegie is a successful business man. His wealth came from the people and he has endeavored to do much good with it in the support of educational facilities and the erection of libraries. Without undervaluing the generous impulse, there are many who will conclude that Mr. Carnegie, being a shrewd business man, simply meant to bring up the whole question in an acute form, and if this was his purpose, he has succeeded. Two plans are now suggested: the first, to make our retiring Presidents life Senators, with adequate compensation; the second, to make every future ex-President a Representative-at-large, with all the rights of a member except the vote, and with an annual salary of $17,500. Each of these plans has features that commend it to consideration, not the least advantage being that the experience of the beneficiaries could occasionally be made of practical service to the country.

"Heroes" of the Faith

THAT irrepressible sheet, the Western Watchman of St. Louis, edited by Father D. S. Phelan, has fairly won for itself the doubtful distinction of being the chief swashbuckler of the Papal hierarchy. In its issue of November 21 it seizes the occasion of the German Emperor's visit to Wilhelmshaven as an opportunity for indulging its favorite rôle of historical misrepresentation. The emperor, in an address to the naval conscripts, referred to the life of Admiral Coligny in terms of heroic commendation as an ideal patriot and Christian soldier. "Coligny," says the Western Watchman, "was a hypocrite, a traitor who would sell his country to the highest bidder, . . . and paid with his death the price of his perfidy." Then the Watchman gives its version of the St. Bartholomew massacre in these words:

> Somehow we prefer the Protestant to the Catholic account. Catholics say only 30,000 were slain; Protestants put the number at 70,000. We prefer the latter figure. . . . If there were 70,000 Huguenots in Paris the night of the massacre so much the more justification for the slaughter. . . . We have heard ring out many a time the very bells that called the Catholics together on the fatal night. They always sounded sweetly in our ears.
> Catholics are always too slow to rise in their own defense. They have always too much confidence in the good will and honor of their non-Catholic neighbors. But this time they were alert and they caught their enemies napping. The Lutherans of Germany were hard-drinking fanatics. The Calvinists of Switzerland were canting cutthroats. The Huguenots of France were common thugs. In their inroads on the peaceful provinces of France they burned fifty cathedrals and five hundred parish churches. Our heroes are the Duke of Alva and Catherine de Medici. They knew the Huguenots and they drove them off the continent. You cannot excite any pity in our souls by whining recounts of Catholic atrocities in the seventeenth century. We have never written a line in extenuation or palliation of the Inquisition. We never thought it needed a defense.

It is instructive to know of what sort of stuff the men and women who are heroized by Catholic writers are really made. The Duke of Alva and Catherine de Medici are here put forward by Editor Phelan as exalted types, and we may naturally conclude that they are so regarded by other Catholics. Motley, in his famous history of The Rise of the Dutch Republic, says of Alva (vol. ii, page 231):

> A special messenger arrived from the Pope bringing as a present to Alva a jeweled hat and sword. The duke was requested, in the autograph letter from the Pope which accompanied the presents, to "remember when he put the hat upon his head that he was guarded with it as with the helmet of righteousness and with the shield of God's help, indicating the heavenly crown which was ready for all princes who supported the Holy Church and the Roman Catholic faith.

On page 407 Motley says: "So finished a picture of a perfect and absolute tyranny has rarely been presented to mankind by history, as in Alva's administration of the Netherlands." On his journey from the Netherlands (page 405) he is said to have boasted that he "had caused 18,600 inhabitants of the provinces to be executed during the period of his government. The number of those who had perished by battle, siege, starvation and massacre defied computation." He himself admitted that he had incurred "the universal hatred of every individual in the country." As his parting advice (page 407), he recommended that every city in the Netherlands should be burned to the ground except a few which could be occupied by the royal troops. Motley's description of the frightful tortures and terrible deaths to which the population were subjected by this fiendish commander has probably no parallel in literature. His crowning infamy was the massacre of Netherland Protestants on St. Bartholomew's Day. Motley estimates the number of victims at from 25,000 to 100,000, within the whole kingdom of France (page 318). "The heart of Protestant Europe stood still with horror." This was the man whom the Western Watchman, claiming to represent the attitude of the Roman Church, applauds as one of that church's greatest heroes.

One would imagine that the sort of journalism of which the Western Watchman is a type would be repudiated by the sane and sensible portion of the Catholic press; but we have yet to find a single journal which has attempted to put a stopper on this turbulent, strife-making, incendiary pen. Will they endorse this latest ebullition heroizing the murderous Alva and the infamous Catherine de Medici? We doubt it, especially in view of the fact that they have not yet seen fit to repudiate the Watchman's recent wild utterance which, assuming a choice by Catholics between their loyalty as Americans and as Romanists, boldly declared that they would stick by the church and consign the American Government to perdition. We note in the Catholic Universe of Cleveland, November 22, a lame and belated apology for that utterance, in which it asserts that the phraseology (of the anti-Catholic press) is not Dr. Phelan's, and adds:

> But the essence of that sermon is one that is so obviously the rule of conduct and the conviction of every Christian that we wonder that any one has had the effrontery to take issue with it.

Unfortunately, the editorial page of the Western Watchman, which we have before us, flatly disproves this specious apology, as it contains the exact phrase in cold type, thus placing the matter wholly beyond conjecture and dispute. The attempt of the Universe to smooth over an ugly situation is unavailing. There is but one course in the matter: either to accept the language as it appears in Phelan's sheet, or, in the name of all sensible and order-loving Roman Catholics, to repudiate it altogether. Having climbed the tree, the Universe must now come down as gracefully as possible or else stay on its perch and share the disgrace.

After all, Phelan is merely an incident. He is a person of no importance, and it is inconceivable that even the hierarchy can endorse his wild, irresponsible rant. If his periodical outbursts are approved by those in clerical authority, the American people must revise their opinion of the intelligence and acumen of the leaders in the campaign to "Make America Catholic."

Overtaken of Justice

JUSTICE has taken a firmer grip on the scales and sword. In the trial of the four gunmen for the murder of Rosenthal, the gambler, there were none of the familiar delays, and all subterfuges were swept aside. Within an hour after the case had been delivered to the jury, they rendered a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. Within a few days sentence was pronounced condemning the prisoners to death in the electric chair during the week beginning January 6. On November 26 they were taken to Sing Sing and placed in the dreary cells of "Death Row."

Following so closely the conviction of Police Lieutenant Becker, the case against "Gyp the Blood," "Lefty Louie," "Dago Frank" and "Whitey" Lewis has established a new record in dealing with crime in the metropolis. District Attorney Whitman expressed the belief that the verdict marks the beginning of the end of the rule of gangsters and gunmen from which New York has suffered so long. It should also mark the abolishing of every form of official "protection" of criminals, gamblers and keepers of evil resorts.

One of the saddest features of the situation is that a large proportion of the class of criminals who compose the gangs are young men; indeed, the convicted gunmen, as they stood in the dock, looked little older than boys. Lack of opportunity for moral training, together with evil associations, had made the criminal path easy and attractive and the downward pace was swift and terrible. Under the wing of their official protectors, politicians or police, the young desperadoes ran the whole gamut of crime. Now that they have been overtaken by justice, the class to which they belong will be broken up and scattered. New York will no longer be a safe or lucrative place for gangsters, and it must be made equally unwholesome for official grafters and protectors of crime and lawlessness. The moral victory will only be half won if justice does not sweep them out with the rest of the rubbish.

The Bread-Line

THIS winter promises to be a season of unusual activity at the old Bowery Mission. On Thanksgiving morning, the Bread-Line assembled shortly after midnight, and the long and seemingly endless file of unemployed and destitute men and lads were helped to a good, substantial meal. Every morning during the winter and until Easter, the same pitiful scene will be re-enacted. It is saddening to contemplate the condition of these poor "wanderers of the night"—homeless, shelterless, penniless and seemingly out of touch with all that makes life worth living. This silent array is a mute protest against conditions which seem hard to understand and still harder to improve. Fortunately, the Mission's Free Labor Bureau is able to help many to temporary employment; but while the winter lasts, the long, gaunt line must be fed and sheltered, temporarily at least. It is a Samaritan work in which we invite the co-operation of our sympathetic readers. A few pennies will provide a substantial midnight meal for a bread-liner; a dime will feed four and a dollar provides forty with steaming hot coffee and big roll sandwiches enough to stave off hunger for a time. Send in your gifts to the Bread-Line, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and have a share in this simple charity. It was Jesus himself who commanded us to seek out the wanderers from the highways and byways. "When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind; and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee." Surely this is the spirit of the Bread-Line.

Carnegie Educational Trustees Meet

THE seventh annual meeting of the trustees of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teachers met in New York City November 20. More than a score of the presidents of the leading universities of the country, including those of Harvard, Yale and Columbia, were present. All the trustees were present except David Starr Jordan, Jacob Gould Schurman, and Frank A. Vanderlip. The trustees announced that an important bulletin on medical education in Europe had been issued by the Foundation in the year, that the report of the president for 1912, containing a general discussion of educational problems, was in press, and that forty-eight retiring allowances and pensions had been granted in the year, making a total of 398 now in force, at an annual cost of $570,000. The endowment now amounts to $14,000,000, Mr. Carnegie having paid in $2,000,000 since the last meeting of the trustees. The care for the superannuated teachers and professors to which this pension fund is dedicated is one of the most beautiful of the benevolences. The teachers render a service which no arithmetic can calculate and no language can describe; and yet their pay is pitiably and shamefully small. The true minister renders the highest service to society and receives correspondingly small compensation. The various denominations of the country are, many of them, providing pensions for the veterans that drop out of the ranks, and for the widows that are left. It would not be surprising if some multi-millionaire should set aside a large endowment fund for the aged and disabled ministers, thus doing an unspeakable amount of good, and securing widespread gratitude and universal praise. This provision for the teachers and professors by the Carnegie Foundation Fund, and for the veteran ministers by the various denominations, is in imitation of the divine care for the aged, as voiced by the prophet:

And even to your old age I am he; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you. (Isa. 46: 4.)

Sight Restored

RECENTLY Rev. Dr. George R. Van de Water, who celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary as rector of St. Andrew's Episcopal Church, Fifth Avenue and One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Street, New York City, also celebrated his restoration to sight. Several years ago he went blind, but a surgical operation has restored his sight, and he and his people are unbounded in their enthusiastic gratitude. On Sunday, November 24, his parishioners held a special service to rejoice with him, and incidentally showed their gratitude by presenting a $10,000 organ to the church. At a service on Thanksgiving Day the rector publicly proclaimed his thanks for the restoration of his sight. He said he was in a condition to appreciate the feelings of those in olden times whose eyes Christ had opened. He said:

One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see. (John 9: 25.)

Prison for Light Weight

A JUDGE the other day sent a New York coal dealer to prison for giving short weight. The driver was given two tickets, one for 4,000 pounds for the customer, the other for 3,000 pounds for the city inspector. The cart had 1,000 pounds short of the two tons he claimed to deliver to the customer. One-half ton of theft in an order of two tons was a pretty deep cut. So the judge fined the dealer $250 and sent him to prison for twenty days. The high price of coal, almost out of the reach of the poor, makes its theft by light weight peculiarly reprehensible. Most men are honest, but the prisons would not be large enough for all who give light weight and short measure, a fraud which is offensive to good men and an abomination to God:

A false balance is abomination to the Lord: but a just weight is his delight. (Prov. 11: 1.)

Disgraceful College Hazing

HAMMOND SMITH, a freshman at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., was perhaps disfigured for life while being hazed the other night. He was seized by students, who painted his face with nitrate of silver, making several letters on his forehead and chin with the acid. The nitrate burned down deep, giving the young man great pain, and it is feared that some of the marks will remain as scars on his face. The faculty is busy trying to find out the names of the students who committed the deed. Smith himself has said little about the affair. It is not likely that the students intended to do their college mate any permanent injury. It is likely they had no idea of the danger there was in the powerful nitrate of silver. But they were responsible for their ignorance and their barbarism. Fun is one thing, and foolishness that is not at all funny, but dangerous, and which borders on criminality, is another thing. A number of students in our government academies and colleges throughout the country have been killed by hazing, and quite a number more have been injured for life. The brutal habit, which has been generally stopped by most educational institutions, should be made a crime by State laws, carrying heavy penalties on all perpetrators of such misdeeds. The words of John the Baptist are here applicable:

Do violence to no man. (Luke 3: 14.)

Earthquake Kills a Thousand

A TELEGRAM from Mexico City says that there was an earthquake in the State of Mexico which destroyed at least a thousand precious lives. The towns of Acambay and Timilpa are reported ruined. The church at Acambay fell while the people were at early mass, killing every one in the building. Other churches and large buildings fell in various towns, causing an appalling loss of life. There was also a great volcanic disturbance. The report indicated that hundreds of bodies were unburied and that pestilence was threatened. A wire from Vancouver, B. C., says two slight shocks of earthquake were felt there three days after the disastrous one in Mexico. Those who build their homes in earthquake zones do so with the knowledge of their peril, and yet circumstances compel many to live in such districts. The sympathy of the civilized world goes out to the stricken community of Mexico, and prayers ascend to the God of all comfort for his care; and the hand of charity cannot open too swiftly or generously to those thus afflicted. A number of the people fled from the building districts to the country, in imitation of the action of those mentioned by the prophet:

Ye shall flee, like as ye fled before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah the king of Judah. (Zech. 14: 5.)

Hogs, Cattle and Men

DR. HARVEY WILEY, the pure food specialist, remarked in a lecture to the Wellesley Women's Club in Boston the other day that it was better to be a steer than a man, and a fat hog than a woman. He said: "A man may have smallpox and travel in a Pullman car. No one ever thinks a Pullman should be fumigated. In the transfer of cattle every precaution is taken to prevent the spread of disease. In a Middle West town a woman with a child was stricken with tuberculosis. She applied to Washington and received no answer. In that same town a farmer had a fat hog with cholera. He wired to Washington, collect. In an hour he received a reply. The next day three men from the Department of Agriculture treated the hog and it recovered." Dr. Wiley has rendered an invaluable service to the country in the fearless manner in which he has exposed and condemned wrongs against the bodies and souls of the people. He is right in his criticism of the public neglect of the health and comfort of men and women, as compared with the care for the lower tribes. When we see the tired faces of the boys and girls and men and women who have worked hard all day hanging to the straps in the surface, subway and elevated cars; when we see them crowded into a car with more than twice as many as it will properly accommodate, shaken and thrown from side to side and often from their feet against others; when we see women at the point of fainting with the weariness of work and standing, subjected to immodesties that are simply outrageous in civilized society, we have said often: "If these people were cattle, horses, or hogs, the law would not allow them to be jammed in this cruel manner into a car, because it would reduce the weight of the creatures and might kill some, at the loss of hundreds of dollars." In parts of Europe they pay as much attention to the comfort and health of the transportation of people in the public conveyances as to that of cattle, horses, or swine. We do not protest against care for the lower tribes, which is beautiful and proper; we only plead for equally good care in the transportation of people by the public utilities commissions. Christ cared for the lower tribes, but he showed his estimate of the difference between them and a human life in these words:

Ye are of more value than many sparrows. (Matt 10: 31.)

POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Miss Polly Harrington, a wealthy spinster of Beldington, Vt., receives word from the Ladies' Aid Society of a small Western town that her niece Pollyanna has been left an orphan by the death of her father, the pastor of their poor home mission church. Her mother, Miss Harrington's sister, had died some years before, having never received the forgiveness of her family for marrying the poor young minister. Miss Polly consents to receive the little eleven-year-old girl into her home, and directs her servant Nancy to prepare a small attic room for her. She wished to put her at a distance from her own apartments and avoid the risk of her marring the valuable furnishings of any other room. Nancy is sent to the station to meet Pollyanna. From every fresh disappointment she rallies amazingly, always finding something to be glad about. She explains that this is a game which her father had taught her and played with her. Nancy agrees to try to play the game, too. Forbidden to open the window of her attic room because the fly screens had not arrived, Pollyanna takes some furs which had been wrapped up for the winter out on the porch roof and sleeps there, having carefully closed the window behind her. She is brought back by the alarmed household, but her aunt finds it difficult to punish her, for every punishment appears to Pollyanna to be a reward of merit.

CHAPTER VII

POLLYANNA PAYS A VISIT

IT WAS not long before life at the Harrington homestead settled into something like order, though not exactly the order that Miss Polly had at first prescribed. Pollyanna sewed, practiced, read aloud, and studied cooking in the kitchen, it is true; but she did not give to any of these things quite so much time as had at first been planned. She had more time, also, to "just live," as she expressed it, for almost all of every afternoon from two until six o'clock was hers to do with as she liked—provided she did not "like" to do certain things already prohibited by Aunt Polly.

It is a question, perhaps, whether all this leisure time was given to the child as a relief to Pollyanna from work, or as a relief to Aunt Polly from Pollyanna. Certainly, as those first July days passed, Miss Polly found occasion many times to ejaculate "What an extraordinary child!" and certainly the reading and sewing lessons found her at their conclusion each day somewhat dazed and wholly exhausted. Nancy, in the kitchen, fared better. She was not dazed nor exhausted. Wednesdays and Saturdays came to be, indeed, red-letter days to her.

There were no children in the immediate neighborhood of the Harrington homestead for Pollyanna to play with. The house itself was on the outskirts of the village, and though there were other houses not far away, they did not chance to contain any boys or girls near Pollyanna's age. This, however, did not seem to disturb Pollyanna in the least. "Oh, no, I don't mind it at all," she explained to Nancy. "I'm happy just to walk around and see the streets and the houses and watch the people. I just love people; don't you, Nancy?"

"Well, I can't say I do—all of 'em," retorted Nancy, tersely.

Almost every pleasant afternoon found Pollyanna begging for "an errand to run," so that she might be off for a walk in one direction or another; and it was on these walks that frequently she met the Man. To herself Pollyanna always called him "the Man," no matter if she met a dozen other men the same day.

The Man often wore a long black coat and a high silk hat, two things that the "just men" never wore. His face was clean shaven and rather pale, and his hair, showing below his hat, was somewhat gray. He walked erect, and rather rapidly, and he was always alone, which made Pollyanna vaguely sorry for him. Perhaps it was because of this that she one day spoke to him.

"How do you do, sir? Isn't this a nice day?" she called cheerily, as she approached him.

The man threw a hurried glance about him, then stopped uncertainly.

"Did you speak—to me?" he asked in a sharp voice.

"Yes, sir," beamed Pollyanna. "I say, it's a nice day, isn't it?"

"Eh? Oh! Humph!" he grunted, and strode on again.

Pollyanna laughed. He was such a funny man, she thought.

The next day she saw him again.

"'Tisn't quite so nice as yesterday, but it's pretty nice," she called out cheerfully.

"Eh? Oh! Humph!" grunted the man as before; and once again Pollyanna laughed happily.

When for the third time Pollyanna accosted him in much the same manner, the man stopped abruptly.

"See here, child, who are you, and why are you speaking to me every day?"

"I am Pollyanna Whittier, and I thought you looked lonesome. I'm so glad you stopped. Now we're introduced—only I don't know your name yet."

"Well, of all the—" The man did not finish his sentence, but strode on faster than ever.

Pollyanna looked after him with a disappointed droop to her usually smiling lips.

"Maybe he didn't understand—but that was only half an introduction. I don't know his name yet," she murmured, as she proceeded on her way.

"There! now I reckon we're ready to be looked at!"

Pollyanna was carrying calf's-foot jelly to Mrs. Snow to-day. Aunt Polly always sent something to Mrs. Snow once a week. She said she thought it was her duty, inasmuch as Mrs. Snow was poor, sick and a member of her church—it was the duty of all the church members to look out for her, of course. Miss Polly did her duty by Mrs. Snow usually on Thursday afternoons—not personally, but through Nancy. To-day Pollyanna had begged the privilege, and Nancy had promptly given it to her in accordance with Miss Polly's orders.

"And it's glad that I am ter get rid of it," Nancy had declared in private afterwards to Pollyanna; "though it's a shame ter be tuckin' the job off on you, poor lamb; so it is, it is!"

"But I'd love to do it, Nancy."

"Well, you won't—after you've done it once," predicted Nancy, sourly.

"Why not?"

"Because nobody does. If folks wan't sorry for her there wouldn't a soul go near her from mornin' till night, she's that cantankerous. All is, I pity her daughter what has ter take care of her."

"But why, Nancy?"

Nancy shrugged her shoulders.

"Well, in plain words, it's just that nothin' what ever has happened has happened right, in Mis' Snow's eyes. Even the days of the week ain't run ter her mind. If it's Monday she's bound ter say she wishes 'twas Sunday; and if you take her jell you're pretty sure ter hear she wanted chicken—bu if you did bring her chicken, she'd be jest hankerin for lamb broth!"

"Why, what a funny woman!" laughed Pollyanna. "I think I shall like to go to see her. She must be so surprising and—and different. I love different folks."

"Humph! Well, Mis' Snow's 'diff'rent,' all righ—I hope, for the sake of the rest of us," Nancy had finished grimly.

Pollyanna was thinking of these remarks to-day as she turned in at the gate of the shabby little cottage. Her eyes were quite sparkling, indeed, at the prospect of meeting this "different" Mrs. Snow.

A pale-faced, tired-looking young girl answered her knock at the door.

"How do you do?" began Pollyanna, politely. "I'm from Miss Polly Harrington, and I'd like to see Mrs. Snow, please."

"Well, if you would, you're the first one that ever 'liked' to see her," muttered the girl under her breath, but Pollyanna did not hear this. The girl had turned and was leading the way through the hall to a door at the end of it.

In the sick-room, after the girl had ushered her in and closed the door, Pollyanna blinked a little before she could accustom her eyes to the gloom. Then she saw dimly outlined, a woman half sitting up in the bed across the room. She advanced at once.

"How do you do, Mrs. Snow? Aunt Polly says she hopes you are comfortable to-day, and she's sent you some calf's-foot jelly."

"Dear me! jelly?" murmured a fretful voice. "Of course I'm very much obliged, but I was hoping 'twould be lamb broth to-day."

Pollyanna frowned a little.

"Why, I thought it was chicken you wanted when folks brought you jelly," she said.

"What?" The sick woman turned sharply.

"Why, nothing much," apologized Pollyanna, hurriedly; "and of course it doesn't really make any difference. It's only that Nancy said it was chicken you wanted when we brought jelly, and lamb broth when we brought chicken—but maybe 'twas the other way, and Nancy forgot."

The sick woman pulled herself up till she sat erect in the bed—a most unusual thing for her to do, though Pollyanna did not know this.

"Well, Miss Impertinence, who are you?" she demanded.

Pollyanna laughed gleefully.

"Oh, that isn't my name, Mrs. Snow—and I'm so glad 'tisn't, too! That would be worse than 'Hephzibah'; wouldn't it? I'm Pollyanna Whittier, Miss Polly Harrington's niece, and I've come to live with her. That's why I'm here with the jelly this morning."

All through the first part of this sentence, the sick woman had sat interestedly erect; but at the reference to the jelly she fell back on her pillow listlessly.

"Very well; thank you. Your aunt is very kind, of course, but my appetite isn't very good this morning, and I was wanting lamb—" She stopped suddenly, then went on with an abrupt change of subject. "I never slept a wink last night—not a wink."

"Oh dear, I wish I hadn't," sighed Pollyanna, placing the jelly on the little stand and seating herself comfortably on the nearest chair. "You lose such a lot of time just sleeping! Don't you think so?"

"Lose time—sleeping!" exclaimed the sick woman.

"Yes, when you might be just living, you know. It seems such a pity we can't live nights, too."

Once again the woman pulled herself erect in her bed.

"Well, if you ain't the amazing young one!" she cried. "Here! do you go to that window and pull up the curtain," she directed. "I should like to know what you look like!"

A CHRISTMAS DECISION

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

IN THE Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, there gleams a silver star set in the pavement of a recess, and around it is this inscription: "Hic de Virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est"—"Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary." No one can deny that it marks the very center of the universe. Before Jesus came to earth from heaven the "Aureum Milliarium" (the Golden Milestone) set up in Rome by the Emperor Augustus was boasted of as marking the center and crowning point of the world; from it radiated the great military roads throughout the Roman Empire, under whose imperious and resistless authority the then known world was held. But this is now classed among "the remains" of Rome, the fragments of which would not attract the attention of the traveler unless pointed out by a guide. How different the star at Bethlehem! Increasing throngs go there at Christmas time, and numerous travelers seek the place at all seasons of the year Bethlehem is the center of Christendom, and the influence of Jesus radiates from there into all the world.

Still there are those who are against him as well as for him. This was known to Jesus when he was here upon earth, and not infrequently he spoke of it. The lesson assigned for our study to-day describes one of those occasions. Jesus, with his twelve apostles, was on his way to attend the Feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem. That was the great harvest home festival of the Jews, eminently a religious festival, but mingled with social joys, which lasted through a week. The favorite pilgrim-way laid through Perea, on the other side of Jordan, but Jesus chose to pass through Samaria. When the Samaritans discovered that Jesus was on his way to attend the feast in Jerusalem, they would not receive him, for it was their policy to have no dealings with Jews. The bitter hatred of the Samaritans for the Jews caused them to ignore the memory of those two memorable days that Jesus had spent in their city, by their earnest invitation, when many believed in him because of his own word (John 4: 1-42). When the apostles saw the opposition of the Samaritans to Jesus, they were angry, and James and John wanted Jesus to exterminate them by calling down fire from heaven—perhaps they had in mind the prophets of Baal upon whom Elijah called down the vengeance of heaven. James and John thus won from Jesus the bestowal of the title, "Sons of Thunder." But that was not Jesus' way of treating those who were against him; he quietly turned aside and crossed the borders of Samaria, and passed into Jewish territory, for he had come to save, not to destroy. The apostles were on the alert for those who were against Jesus; even before the incident just noted, they had sprung to his defense when they saw a man who was casting out demons in the name of Jesus, but was not allied with the apostolic band. They thought, therefore, that he had no right to be doing that sort of work. They had appealed to Jesus and he had replied in substance, "He is doing a good work; let him alone." Jesus' actual words were: "He that is not against you is for you."

We come now to the stories of three would-be followers of Jesus, those who were out-and-out for him, but one with more enthusiasm than the other. The first man said, "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." Did he think that the path of Jesus led to an earthly throne, as did the Jews? The man probably was a Jew, or he might have been a Samaritan who felt the injustice of his people toward Jesus. We are inclined to think that this latter was the case. But Jesus plainly told him that he had nothing to expect of worldly honor, and he described himself as being more destitute of bodily comforts than even the birds and the foxes, for they had nests and holes, but he had not where to lay his head. Tender charity, however, provided for his wants, as in the home of Peter in Capernaum, and in the home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus at Bethany. We are not told if the would-be follower was turned aside by the dreary prospect; if he really was "for" Jesus, he cast his lot with the other friends of Jesus. Discomforts do not count when the soul abides with its King.

The Silver Star in the Church of the Nativity that Marks the Spot Where It Is Believed the Manger Stood

As Jesus and his apostles passed along on their way, they met a man who either looked or spoke his desire to go with Jesus, and Jesus, seeing him, said: "Follow me." It was a gracious invitation from Jesus. But the man hesitated, and by so doing he placed himself in the company of those who were against Jesus. There is no middle ground, for Jesus has said: "He that is not with me is against me" (Matt. 12: 30). He offered as an excuse that he wanted to wait until he should bury his father. According to the Oriental way of speaking, the man meant to have Jesus understand that he had an aged or infirm father to care for, and therefore he was not free to follow him. But Jesus perfectly understood that he could do both, and so he urged the man to follow him. We are not told that he did.

Farther along the way, a man joined himself to the company of Jesus and his apostles, and said: "I will follow thee, Lord," but he was really not so much "for Jesus" as he seemed to be, for he added, "but let me first go and say farewell to my friends." And when he proposed thus to delay, Jesus counted him with those who are against him, saying, "No man having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God."

There is no better time than just now at this Christmas season, on this the last Sabbath before Christmas, for all grown-ups and children to join themselves with the followers of Jesus, and tell it out, "We are for Jesus and not against him."

We can talk to the children about it in this manner: I want to tell you about a Prince, who lived up on a high mountain, whose home was more beautiful than the finest house you have ever seen. It was built of gold and silver and bright shining stones of all colors. But the Prince was more beautiful than his home, because he had such a loving heart, with never a bit of hate in it for anybody. The Prince had a great company of servants, ready at any moment to go anywhere, or do anything for him. The good Prince heard of some people living down in the valley who were very sorrowful, and he wanted to make them happy, and bring them to his house to live. He saw little children down there too, and he loved them, and wanted to have them come to his home to live, but he knew they could not climb the steep mountain without his help. So one day the Prince told his servants that he was going down into the valley. He took off his beautiful clothes and his crown, and dressed himself in such clothes as the people in the valley wore, so that they would not be afraid of him. How his servants wondered when they saw him doing that! While I have been telling you this story, have you not been thinking who the Prince was? If you have not, I will tell you that he was Jesus and his servants are the angels. You are some of the little children he saw when he looked down from his home in heaven. He knew that you could never live in heaven with him unless he should first come down to this world, and make a way for you. It was Christmas when he came. And we are so glad he came, we keep Christmas every year.

> Around the throne of God in heaven
> Thousands of children stand,
> Children whose sins are all forgiven—
> A holy, happy band,
> Singing, "Glory, glory, be to God on high."

And there are thousands of little children in this world, like yourselves, who have not yet gone to heaven, but Jesus is their loving friend and yours. Will you not say to him, "I give my love to you, dear Jesus, for a Christmas gift. It is the best that I can give." And here is your teacher's Christmas wish for you:

> A bright and blessed Christmas day,
> With echoes of the angels' song,
> And peace that cannot pass away,
> And holy gladness, calm and strong,
> And sweet heart carols, flowing free—
> This is my Christmas wish to thee.

Let us repeat to the older ones the solemn words of warning uttered by Dr. Maclaren: "Your heart is only a tiny room after all, and if you cram it full of the world, you relegate your Master to the stable outside."

A story is told about how a big package from the South Sea Islands was received in England a short time before Christmas. When the outer cover was removed, a label with large letters was seen with the words: "Dead Gods." Twenty years before a band of devoted Christians had left England for the benighted Pacific isles. During long years, amid privations and persecutions, they had

—IN COMPLIANCE WITH your request in the Superintendents' Round Table, I am sending a brief story of the work of the Little Builders' Presbyterian Sunday School. The proportion of this work of so small a beginning is simply marvelous, and would make an interesting story. Hundreds of children have been brought into a better knowledge of the Lord Jesus, and many have accepted him as their Saviour. Scores of homeless ones have found homes in this and other States. A pretty little chapel is always a scene of lively interest with its wide-awake Sunday school, active young people's and church organizations, mother's club and other activities. A Children's Home with a family averaging twenty children coming and going as Christian homes are found for them is a part of the work of the Little Builders.

—USE THE CHILDREN to interest and bring the children. Mrs. E. N. Jones, of Iola, Kan., saw her opportunity in a work for children, and accomplished it through their co-operation. A group of four motherless little ones were idling along a creek and playing upon the bridge that spanned it one Sunday afternoon. They were invited to the house, told the story of Jesus and his love, given cards and papers, and left with an invitation to return the next Sunday, bringing others of their playmates with them. In happy anticipation of the event the days quickly passed, and before the appointed hour, three o'clock, eight or ten eager little people were waiting outside. Again the story was told, and the children sent on their mission. Again and again they came, until the home was full to overflowing with children who attended no other Sunday school. A barn was secured and as quickly they swarmed into the alley. Now a pretty little chapel (auxiliary to the First Presbyterian Church) is the center of interest every Sunday afternoon, and many times a week for the "Busy Builders." The Children's Home, presided over by two faithful women, is a safe retreat for the homeless little ones.

—AGAIN WE INVITE NOT only superintendents but teachers to send us questions and suggestions for the Round Table by which the new year at hand may be made happier because we have done our work in Sunday school better than ever before. "Warmed-over" Dishes Made Tasty

Your family will never again grumble about the "warmed-over" dishes if you use just a little Liebig—pure extract of beef, for flavoring.

There's nothing more delicious than hash or stew enriched with a little Liebig, which replaces the flavor lost in double cooking. Warmed-over meats, croquettes and soups, too, are made more appetizing and vastly more digestible and nourishing by adding a little Liebig.

There is true economy in Liebig—it helps you make all the "left-overs" into tasty dishes which your people will eat with zest and relish. Try a jar to-day—see how good it is.

Pollyanna rose to her feet, but she laughed a little ruefully.

"Oh dear! then you'll see my freckles; won't you?" she sighed, as she went to the window; "and just when I was being glad it was dark and you couldn't see 'em. There! Now you can—oh," she broke off excitedly, as she turned back toward the bed; "I'm so glad you wanted to see me, because now I can see you! They didn't tell me you were so pretty!"

"Me!—pretty!" scoffed the woman, bitterly.

"Why, yes. Didn't you know it?" cried Pollyanna.

"Well, no, I didn't," retorted Mrs. Snow, dryly. Mrs. Snow had lived forty years, and for fifteen of those years she had been too busy wishing things were different to find much time to enjoy things as they were.

"Oh, but your eyes are so big and dark, and your hair's all dark, too, and curly," cooed Pollyanna. "I love black curls. (That's one of the things I'm going to have when I get to heaven.) And you've got two little red spots in your cheeks. Why, Mrs. Snow, you are pretty! I should think you'd know it when you looked at yourself in the glass."

"The glass!" snapped the sick woman, falling back on her pillow. "Yes, well, I hain't done much prinkin' before the mirror these days—and you wouldn't, if you was flat on your back as I am!"

"Why, no, of course not," agreed Pollyanna, sympathetically. "But wait; just let me show you," she exclaimed, skipping over to the bureau and picking up a small hand-glass.

On the way back to the bed she stopped, eyeing the sick woman with a critical gaze.

"I reckon, maybe, if you don't mind, I'd like to fix your hair just a little before I let you see it,' she proposed. "May I fix your hair, please?"

"Why, I—suppose so, if you want to," permitted Mrs. Snow, grudgingly; "but 'twon't stay, you know."

"Oh, thank you. I love to fix people's hair," exulted Pollyanna.

For five minutes she worked swiftly, deftly, combing a refractory curl into fluffiness, perking up a drooping ruffle at the neck, or shaking a pillow into plumpness so that the head might have a better pose. Meanwhile the sick woman, frowning prodigiously, and openly scoffing at the whole procedure, was, in spite of herself, beginning to tingle with a feeling perilously near to excitement.

"There!" panted Pollyanna, hastily plucking a pink from a vase near by, and tucking it into the dark hair where it would give the best effect; "now I reckon we're ready to be looked at!" And she held out the mirror in triumph.

"Humph!" grunted the sick woman, eyeing her reflection severely. "I like red pinks better than pink ones; but then, it'll fade, anyhow, before night, so what's the difference?"

"But I should think you'd be glad they did fade," laughed Pollyanna, "'cause then you can have the fun of getting some more. I just love your hair fluffed out like that," she finished with a satisfied gaze. "Don't you?"

"Hm-m; maybe. Still—'twon't last, with me tossing back and forth on the pillow as I do."

"Of course not—and I'm glad, too," nodded Pollyanna cheerfully, "because then I can fix it again. Anyhow, I should think you'd be glad it's black—black shows up so much nicer on a pillow than yellow hair like mine does."

"Maybe; but I never did set much store by black hair—shows gray too soon," retorted Mrs. Snow. She spoke fretfully, but she still held the mirror before her face.

"Oh, I love black hair! I should be so glad if only I had it," sighed Pollyanna.

Mrs. Snow dropped the mirror and turned irritably.

"Well, you wouldn't!—not if you were me. You wouldn't be glad for black hair nor anything else—if you had to lie here all day as I do!"

Pollyanna bent her brows in a thoughtful frown.

"Why, 'twould be kind of hard—to do it then; wouldn't it?" she mused aloud.

"Do what?"

"Be glad about things."

"Be glad about things—when you're sick in bed all your days? Well, I should say it would!" retorted Mrs. Snow. "If you don't think so, just tell me something to be glad about; that's all."

To Mrs. Snow's unbounded amazement, Pollyanna sprang to her feet and clapped her hands.

"Oh, goody! That'll be a hard one—won't it? I've got to go, now, but I'll think and think all the way home; and maybe the next time I come I can tell it to you. Good-by. I've had a lovely time! Good-by," she called again as she tripped through the doorway.

"Well, I never! Now what does she mean by that?" ejaculated Mrs. Snow, staring after her visitor. By and by she turned her head and picked up the mirror, eyeing her reflection critically.

"That little thing has got a knack with hair, and no mistake," she muttered under her breath. "I declare, I didn't know it could look so pretty. But, then, what's the use?" she sighed, dropping the glass into the bedclothes, and rolling her head on the pillow fretfully.

A little later, Milly, Mrs. Snow's daughter, came in.

"Why, mother! the curtain is up!" she cried.

"Well, what if it is up?" snapped the sick woman. "I needn't stay in the dark all my life, if I am sick; need I?"

"Why, n-no, of course not," rejoined Milly, in hasty conciliation, as she reached for the medicine bottle. "It's only—well, you know very well that I've tried to get you to have a lighter room for ages—and you wouldn't."

There was no reply to this. Mrs. Snow was picking at the lace on her nightgown. At last she spoke, fretfully.

"I should think somebody might give me a new nightdress—instead of lamb broth, for a change!"

"Why—mother!"

No wonder Milly quite gasped aloud with bewilderment. In the drawer behind her at that moment lay two new nightdresses that Milly for months past had been vainly urging her mother to wear.

CHAPTER VIII

WHICH TELLS OF THE MAN

IT RAINED the next time Pollyanna saw the Man. She greeted him, however, with a bright smile.

"It isn't so nice to-day, is it?" she called blithesomely. "I'm glad it doesn't always rain, anyhow!"

The Man did not even grunt this time, nor turn his head. Pollyanna decided that of course he did not hear her. The next time, therefore (which happened to be the following day), she spoke up louder. She thought it particularly necessary to do this, anyway, for the Man was striding along, his hands behind his back, and his eyes on the ground, which seemed, to Pollyanna, preposterous in the face of the glorious sunshine and the freshly-washed morning air. Pollyanna, as a special treat, was on a morning errand to-day.

"How do you do?" she chirped. "I'm so glad it isn't yesterday; aren't you? It's so nice to-day!"

The man stopped abruptly. There was an angry scowl on his face.

"See here, little girl, we might just s well settle this thing right now, nce for all," he began irritably. "I've ot something besides the weather to hink of. I don't know whether the un shines or not."

Pollyanna beamed joyously.

"No, sir; I thought you didn't! 'hat's why I told you."

"Yes; well—eh? What?" he broke ff sharply, in sudden understanding f her words.

"I say, that's why I told you—so you ould notice it, you know—that the un shines, and all that. I knew you'd e glad it did if you only stopped to hink of it—and you didn't look a bit s if you were thinking of it!"

"Well, of all the—" ejaculated the Ian, with an oddly helpless gesture. le started forward again, but after ie second step he turned back, still rowning. "See here, why don't you nd some one of your own age to talk)?"

"I'd like to, sir, but there aren't any ound here, Nancy says. Still, I don't iind so very much. I like old folks ist as well, maybe better, sometimes -being used to the Ladies' Aid, so."

"Humph! the Ladies' Aid, indeed! s that what you took me for?" The ian's lips were threatening to smile, ut the scowl above them was still try- ig to hold them grimly stern.

Pollyanna laughed gleefully.

"Oh, no, sir. You don't look a mite ke a Ladies' Aider—not but that ou're just as good, of course, maybe etter," she added in hurried polite- ess. "You see, I'm sure you're much icer than you look!"

The Man made a queer noise in his nroat.

"Well, of all the—" he ejaculated gain, as he turned and strode on as efore.

The next time Pollyanna met the Ian, his eyes were gazing straight nto hers, with a quizzical directness nat made his face look really pleas- nt, Pollyanna thought.

"Good afternoon," he greeted her a ttle stiffly. "Perhaps I'd better say ight away that I know the sun is shin- ig to-day."

"But you don't have to tell me," odded Pollyanna, brightly. "I knew ou knew it just as soon as I saw you."

"Oh, you did; did you?"

"Yes, sir; I saw it in your eyes, you now, and in your smile."

"Humph!" grunted the Man as he assed on.

The Man always spoke to Pollyanna fter this, and frequently he spoke rst, though usually he said little but good afternoon." Even the "good fternoon," however, was a great sur- rise to Nancy, who chanced to be ith Pollyanna one day when the reeting was given.

"Sakes alive, Miss Pollyanna!" she asped. "Did that man speak to you?"

"Why, yes; he always does—now," miled Pollyanna.

Nancy's eyes widened.

"But he never speaks ter anybody, hild—he hain't for years, I guess, ex- ept when he just has to, for business, nd all that. He's John Pendleton. He ves all by himself in the big house on 'endleton Hill. He won't even have ny one round ter cook for him— omes down ter the hotel for his meals hree times a day. I know Sally Miner 'ho waits on him, and she says he ardly opens his head enough to tell 'hat he wants ter eat. She has ter uess it more'n half the time—only 'll be somethin' cheap! She knows nat without no tellin'."

Pollyanna nodded sympathetically.

"I know. You have to look for cheap hings when you're poor. Father and took meals out a lot. We had beans nd fish-balls most generally. We sed to say how glad we were we liked eans—that is, we said it specially 'hen we were looking at the roast irkey place, you know, that was sixty cents. Does Mr. Pendleton like beans?"

"Like 'em! What if he does—or don't? Why, Miss Pollyanna, he ain't poor. He's got loads of money—John Pendleton has—from his father. There ain't anybody in town as rich as he is. He could eat dollar bills—if he wanted to—and not know it."

Pollyanna giggled.

"As if anybody could eat dollar bills and not know it, Nancy, when they come to try to chew 'em! They'd be worse than hairs; and hairs are awful. I got one in my mouth once—and I know."

"I mean, he's rich enough ter do it," shrugged Nancy. "He ain't spendin' his money, that's all. He's a-savin' it."

"Oh, for the heathen," guessed Pollyanna. "How perfectly splendid! That's denying yourself and taking up your cross. I know; father told me."

Nancy's lips parted abruptly, as if there were angry words all ready to come; but her eyes, resting on Pollyanna's jubilantly trustful face, saw something that prevented the words being spoken.

"Humph!" she vouchsafed. Then, showing her old-time interest, she went on: "But say, it is queer, his speakin' ter you, honestly, Miss Pollyanna. He don't speak ter no one; and he lives all alone in a great big lovely house all full of jest grand things, they say. Some says he's crazy, and some just cross; and some says he's got a skeleton in his closet."

"Oh, Nancy!" shuddered Pollyanna. "How can he keep such a dreadful thing? I should think he'd throw it away!"

Nancy chuckled. That Pollyanna had taken the skeleton literally instead of figuratively, she knew very well; but, perversely, she refrained from correcting the mistake.

"And everybody says he's mysterious," she went on. "Some years he just travels, week in an' week out, and it's always in heathen countries—Egypt and Asia and the Desert of Sahara, you know."

"Oh, a missionary," nodded Pollyanna.

Nancy laughed oddly.

"Well, I didn't say that, Miss Pollyanna. When he comes back he writes books—queer old books, they say, about some gimcrack he's found in them heathen countries. But he don't never seem ter want ter spend no money here—leastways, not for jest livin'."

"Of course not—if he's saving it for the heathen," declared Pollyanna. "But he is a funny man, and he's 'different,' too, just like Mrs. Snow, only he's a different 'different.'"

"Well, I guess he is—rather," chuckled Nancy.

"I'm glader'n ever now, anyhow, that he speaks to me," sighed Pollyanna contentedly.

THE VOICE OF THE NATION ON ROME

ROME'S WANING POWER AT HOME AND HER EFFORTS TO ESTABLISH IT HERE

Temporal Power a Vanishing Dream

A NEW YORK Tribune correspondent in Rome cables under date of November 13: "It is again stated on high authority that the king of Italy is about to assume the title of Emperor of Rome. If this be true, it will be symbolical of the last step in the union of the kingdom of Italy, for the Papal States, or the "Holy Roman Empire," were the last part of the present kingdom to accept the new régime. Supported by France, Rome resisted all the attempts of Garibaldi to capture it, and the House of Savoy had to be content with a kingdom without its capital. It was not until the overthrow of the French Empire in 1871 that the Italian Government was able to deal an effective blow and Rome was taken by force. The Pope, Pius IX, then withdrew to the Vatican in enforced confinement.

"The Popes have always been opposed to the kingdom, and even up to 1905 forbade Roman Catholics to take any part in the political life of the country. Temporal power is now, however, little more than a dream, as the present king's popularity has done much to consolidate the position of the House of Savoy."

The Catholics and the Election

THE Romanist Church papers are jubilant over the results of the recent election. They claim they have one-eighth of the voting strength of the country, though in reality they have but about one-twelfth. They did, however, elect five governors, or about one-tenth of the whole number chosen, and three lieutenant-governors.

The Western Watchman of November 21 says: "The late election brought into prominent public position a larger number of Catholics than heretofore in the history of the country—yet no more than their just proportion. Four and perhaps five Catholics are put in the governor's chair, and at least two on the road to United States Senators."

The following list of Catholics elected is abbreviated from the Western Watchman and the East Orange, N. J., Citizen:

Governors: Dunne, Illinois; Monaghan, Delaware; Dunn, Iowa; Karel, Wisconsin; Pothier, Rhode Island.

Lieutenant Governors: Glynn, New York; Walsh, Massachusetts; O'Neill, Indiana.

Secretaries of State: Donahue, Massachusetts; Kelly, Nebraska; Roach, Missouri; McGarry, Rhode Island; Ryan, Oregon.

Attorneys General: Carmody, New York; Lucey, Illinois; Kelly, Montana; Morrisey, Nebraska; Cahill, Rhode Island; Hogan, Ohio.

State Treasurers: Ryan, Illinois; Brennan, Ohio; Brennan, West Virginia.

State Auditors: Brady, Illinois; O'Brien, Indiana.

State Comptroller: Dunn, Connecticut.

Associate Justices: Prindiville, Mahoney, Rafferty, J. Sullivan, D. Sullivan, Illinois; Prendergast, Texas; McCarren, Nevada.

Judges of Appeals: Hogan, New York; Shea, Indiana.

Senators: Walsh, Montana.

Congressmen: Reilly and Donovan, Connecticut; McDermott (re-elected), Gallagher (re-elected), O'Hair, Graham (re-elected), Illinois; Connolly, Iowa; Connelly, Kansas; Johnson (re-elected), Kentucky; Broussard (re-elected), Louisiana; McGillicuddy (re-elected), Maine; Murray and Curley (re-elected), Massachusetts; Manahan, Minnesota; Igoe, Missouri; Maguire (re-elected), Nebraska; Scully and Eagan, New Jersey; Leary, Maher (re-elected), Fitzgerald (re-elected), Griffin, O'Brien, Riordan, Sullivan, Conroy, Dowling, Driscoll (re-elected), New York; Ansberry (re-elected), Ohio; Murray, Oklahoma; Donohue, Logue, Burke, Pennsylvania; O'Shaughnessy, Kennedy, Rhode Island; Byrnes, South Carolina; Burke, South Dakota; Burke, Cary (re-elected), Wisconsin.

A PERUSAL of the list of Catholic Congressmen elected last week must give the "Guardians of Liberty" the shivers. About four-fifths of them were elected on the Democratic ticket, too. And now there is a rumor that Charles P. Neill, a Catholic, is to enter Wilson's Cabinet as Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Perhaps, after all, Tom Watson knew what he was about when he opposed Wilson. At any rate, Tom and his crew fell out the breastworks. Will the "Guardians of Liberty" be able to console him?—True Voice, Catholic Citizen.

Another Papal Throne

THE great ball-room of the Copley-Plaza Hotel was a scene of magnificence, brilliant in color and light, and graced and vivified by a splendid gathering of representative Catholic men and women Monday evening at the reception to His Eminence, the cardinal, by the Catholic Union of Boston. It was the first anniversary of the elevation of the archbishop to the great dignity of the cardinalate, and was the first social function of the season by the Catholic people of the diocese. The reception was confined to members of the Union and their families, and at least one thousand persons were present during the evening.

The ball-room was artistically decorated with myrtle and English ivy, and draperies of cardinal red and gold, with the Stars and Stripes and the Papal flag surmounting the throne which had been erected for His Eminence. An orchestra furnished music. The cardinal arrived at eight o'clock, and headed by bearers of Roman torches, and escorted by Rt. Rev. Mgr. M. J. Splaine, D.D., spiritual director of the Union, a committee of the Union, the officers and Henry V. Cunningham and James M. Prendergast, in the regalia of Knights of St. Gregory, the cardinal with his gentleman of honor, William J. Dooley, and Rev. Joseph F. Coppinger, pastor of St. Aidan's Church, Brookline, marched from the presidential suite to the grand ball-room. The cardinal was greeted with round after round of enthusiastic applause. —From the Boston Pilot, November 23, 1912.

Molding the American Mind

A CORRESPONDENT in Colorado tells us that he was present in Denver on the occasion of Cardinal Farley's visit to that city recently. The ovation was very great indeed. The cardinal was taken over the city in a private car, and dined and fêted like a great potentate. At the dedication of the new cathedral in Denver, at which our informant was present, seated only about ten steps from the balcony on which "his eminence" was seated, the cardinal was surrounded by a distinguished company, which included the governor of Colorado. Fifteen thousand persons marched in the parade, accompanied by nearly all the bands in the city, each band of music preceded by the United States flag, which in nearly every instance was dipped as it passed "his eminence," who was seated with his hat on. In the new cathedral, before the high altar, the cardinal conducted mass; and at the elevation of the "host," thousands knelt in the dust, and a large majority in the crowd removed their hats. The writer, who has witnessed many celebrated pageants in honor of European royalty, is free to confess that as far as reverent subserviency was shown, this one stands unique. But these very impressive pageants are what are molding the American mind toward Catholicism. —From Signs of the Times, Mountain View, Calif., November 19.

Valiant Service

VALIANT service is being rendered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York in the work of awakening the American people to the Roman peril which is impending. In its issue of October 23 it began the publication of a series of letters from leading clergymen, analyzing the present situation and stating their personal attitude toward the campaign "to make America Catholic." A strong editorial upon this question was printed in the same issue. As was to be expected, some Roman Catholic papers are now abusing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for telling the truth about Rome's plans.—Protestant Magazine, December, 1912.

A Needed Agitation

THE question "Shall Rome make America Catholic?" is now agitating the Protestant religious press of our country, and it is well that such is the case, for publicity is the first important step toward a right understanding of the deep significance of Rome's aggressive policy in American politics. The Biblical doctrine and also the fundamental principle guaranteed in the constitution—the complete separation of church and state—has not as yet been fully understood by many people in the Protestant churches. We believe that right here is the place where a wide campaign of education must be made if our people are to be aroused to defend our nation's priceless heritage—religious liberty.

The Church of Rome—as a church—should not be opposed by any loyal citizen of our country, for we must grant it the same rights that we grant to any other church. But when the Roman hierarchy unites church and politics, and through political influence seeks to "make America Catholic," it is quite a different matter. In this connection, when I as a citizen contend against the machinations and political influence of the Roman hierarchy, I am not contending against the Church of Rome as a church, but I am contending against a foreign power that is insidiously seeking and planning to rob me of my religious liberty guaranteed unto me by the first amendment of our constitution.

Let wide publicity, therefore, be given this important matter, for such publicity is the first important step toward a right understanding of the deep significance of Rome's aggressive policy in American politics.

Turn the Searchlight on Rome

I AM exceedingly gratified to see the stand your noble paper has taken on the Roman question. It is time the nations of earth knew the truth and facts of her intrigues; and you are the people who can give both. In doing this you are offering to the world the greatest service you have ever given to mankind—a service that is intended to benefit Protestant and Catholic as well. It is high time our deluded brothers were set free from bondage; and no one rejoices more than one of them who has been "converted from the error of his ways." I stand with you, a willing worker.

HOW I FILLED MY CHURCH

MORE LETTERS FROM BUSY PASTORS TELLING OF SUCCESSFUL METHODS

Dr. Eaton's Experience

MY FIRST pastorate was in a Massachusetts town where a fight against corruption, largely due to the prevalence of drinking, attracted attention to the newcomer. This wide publicity, supplemented by patient and persistent effort in winning individuals to Christ, resulted in a large increase in the membership and attendance of our church. In my second pastorate, Toronto, the increase was helped by my connection with the editorial staff of a newspaper and by keeping in close and intimate touch with the students of the university. In Cleveland, my third pastorate, the editor of the Cleveland Press printed excerpts from one of my books as editorials in his paper, and ended his campaign of education by advising his readers to go and hear the author preach. This was a great help. Then, after a careful study of all the conditions, I went down on the public square one day, mounted a soap box, and told the noonday crowd that, since they would not come to my church, I was coming to them. That week, and for several years afterward, it was my custom to preach on the public square at noon on Friday and Saturday the two sermons I had preached the preceding Sunday in my pulpit. Almost immediately my church was filled, and remained so during my pastorate.

I have had one fundamental principle to which I adhere without reservation. I believe that the business of the church is to win men to a personal faith in and surrender to our divine Lord as their Saviour and Master. A congregation which is simply a crowd, gathered for the purpose of listening to a lecture or music, constitutes a failure from the point of view of the Gospel minister.

I have been down town in New York City as pastor of Madison Avenue Church for nearly four years. In this instance I cannot discuss the question, "How I Filled My Church," because I have not yet completely filled it; but it has been steadily filling from the first day. My first sermon, on the first Sunday morning, resulted in the conversion of a business man who had been sinking down under heavy trials and temptations. This I accepted as God's token of his blessing upon my ministry here.

There are three agencies by which, under the blessing of God's Spirit, a church in New York can reach real success. First, the preacher must preach and live a permanent, universal, spiritual Gospel in language which every one can understand, and in such form as to make it easily applicable to the everyday experience of everyday men. It will take him much longer to gather a congregation in this way; but when he has his congregation, it will stay. We make much of the ushering. Our very best personal workers, old and young, attend to this, and see that all strangers are welcomed with Christian warmth and courtesy. After each service I personally meet as many of the congregation as care to speak with me. By my side there is always a representative of the Young Men's League, the Young Women's Social Union, the Women's Society, the Sunday school and the Board of Deacons. To these I present strangers who live in the city and later they are followed up by personal calls and letters.

The second element of success is personal work on the part of the church membership. Without this no church can succeed, although it may linger on at a poor, dying rate under an impulse inherited from more heroic days. By personal work I do not mean professional utterances of the technical phrases of Christianity, in season and out of season, but a warm, simple and wholesome interest in folks on the part of church members, coupled with the belief that their church has something which these folks need, and that these folks ought to be connected in some way with the church.

In the third place, I look upon the newspapers as the chief, if not the sole, medium of social exchange in our city. If we resort to sensationalism there will be instant notice in the papers; but such notice ends in forgetfulness, or contempt, or both. If, on the other hand, the minister has something to say concerning religion in its wide relations to life, he will gradually find room for himself and his message in the newspapers, and ultimately will become known to the city at large.

CHARLES A. EATON.
Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York.

The Church Must Save Souls

"The audiences are held by useful and clear sermons. . . . But our adversaries preach their people out of the churches, for they teach nothing of the necessary parts of the Christian doctrine; they narrate the legends of saints and other fables. The true adornment of the churches is godly, useful, and clear doctrine, the devout use of the sacraments, ardent prayer, and the like." These words of the XXIV Art. of "The Apology of the Augsburg Confession," written in the sixteenth century, give, as I am firmly convinced, the real reason why, also in this twentieth century, some churches hold their audiences and others do not. The alarming falling-off in church attendance, together with the spiritual indifference, the "go-as-you-please Christianity," and the unbelief of our day as a necessary result, is due to a lack of good, sound, old-fashioned, simple, Biblical Gospel preaching, "useful and clear sermons."

The mission of the Church of Jesus Christ in this world and its only purpose of existence is to save souls. The Gospel is the only means which the Lord has given for the accomplishment of this sublime purpose. "Preach the Gospel," the good news of salvation by faith in Jesus through grace, is the Lord's command. By preaching this Gospel I have by the grace of God (to him alone be all glory) been successful in building up my congregation and have enjoyed and still enjoy the pleasure of preaching to a comparatively large audience of men and women every time the church is open for services.

To persuade strangers to come to the services, as also to bring back the erring, I have made frequent and repeated visits to the homes of the people and have had a heart-to-heart talk with them as the occasion demanded; the daily press, especially the neighborhood paper, has been pressed regularly into service; my congregation has made me a fair allowance of funds to get our printed matter, which was distributed at the church doors, through the mails, and in other ways; the members have also themselves, aware of their Christian duty, asked the stranger to come in. When the stranger came, we tried to make him feel that he was welcome; after the services I meet the people as they pass out of the church door and very few have left our church without having been given at least the "glad hand."

The one and only thing, though, which has held the members and persuaded the stranger to return and bring his friends has been the preaching of the good old Gospel of Jesus Christ, which I have endeavored to preach in plain, simple English, so as not to preach "over the heads" of the people, and which I have applied in accordance with the general and special needs of the people and the times in which we are living.

Let it be remembered that after all, as experience has also amply proved, people will soon grow tired of going to church when there is withheld from them that spiritual food which the Lord has provided for them. They soon realize that to hear a discourse on politics, science, philosophy, and the like, they need not the church; in fact, they can very often get these things better elsewhere. Neither do people care to go to church and hear a preacher tear the Bible to pieces, for they soon realize that if he cannot speak to them with divine authority, then he cannot give them what their souls need. Such a preacher may draw crowds for a time and get into the newspapers, but he will utterly fail in building up a Christian congregation and will fail in holding his audiences.

The Word of God will fill the churches and keep them filled to the greatest possible extent in which this can be at all done. Because the Word of the Lord has largely been kept out of the pulpit, many people have been kept out of the churches. The Gospel has not lost its power, but the pulpit has lost its power in the very measure in which it has failed to preach the Gospel.

JOHN H. C. FRITZ,
Pastor English Lutheran Church of Our Saviour, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Church of the Strangers

In reply to your inquiry of the 24th, as to "How I Fill My Church," I am at a loss just what to say. In the first place I would state that the very uniqueness of the Church of the Strangers is attractive. There is never a Sunday that we do not have strangers from distant places and distant lands worshiping in the church which, in a peculiar way, they can call "theirs." In the second place we seek not to "attract the people" by the unusual features nor by unusual subjects. We seek to portray the love of God and the winsomeness of the Gospel of Jesus in as simple and as direct a manner as it is possible to do, and this directness of appeal with hearty congregational singing, along with an atmosphere of welcome to the stranger, has always assured the pastor or the one preaching from the pulpit of the Church of the Strangers a congregation of which he might feel pleased and from which he might receive encouragement and inspiration. As our motto is "All for Jesus," we seek never to enter the services of the church without feeling that what is all for him is also always with him, and this consciousness of his presence instils into the heart of the speaker and the hearer alike a deep spiritual atmosphere which makes every service of profit and help. We do not feel that the problem is one of numbers, but rather one of spiritual uplift and power, and as we try to forget the one and seek the other, we find that with the latter realized, the first comes as a natural sequence. We are far from solving the problem as fully as we would like, but we see evidences in every service that the plan thus followed is increasing and widening the circle of influence day by day.

Church of the Strangers, New York.

a whole complaining of, a "serious falling off in church attendance." Rather, if we view the disproportionately large growth of the Lutheran Church the reverse may be said. Unprecedented number of calls for ministers and unprecedented attendance at colleges of the church are symptoms. Over three hundred students are taking the three-year seminary course at one institution, Concordia Theological Seminary, St. Louis, which number perhaps exceeds that of any divinity school in the whole country.

This is happening in that synod, which of all Lutheran synods is most conservative and holds most uncompromisingly to the old confessions. But from earliest days it laid stress on the thorough Bible training of its youth (prolonged instruction before confirmation and preparation for an intelligent Christian life through the Christian Day School), and has emphasized the all-sufficiency of the Word of God, its ministers preaching the old Gospel without any sensationalism. Politics, astronomy, geology, newspaper gossip, is all left to the six week days and left out of the Sunday sermon. The fruits of this policy ripen slowly but, it seems, surely. Bible training and Bible preaching, therefore, are to my mind the reasons of the hold my church has on the people. And these reasons fit in well with the old God-given promises.

How I Am Trying to Fill My Church

In a recent letter from the editor of The Christian Herald, I was requested to tell how I fill my church. In answer to this request I wish to state that I do not fill my church. That is to say, there is always room for many who are not there. And because there is room in evidence at every preaching service I have somewhat changed the title of this article. This request, coming as it did, is personal; so I trust that my readers will pardon the repeated use of the personal pronoun.

In the first place, I believe that a church should advertise. The world advertises. Why not the church? Let me say in passing, that the public will soon learn whether a man is trying to fill collection plates, attract attention to himself, or whether he is trying and striving to win men with an immortal message that shall do them good.

It will perhaps sound strange when I say that I always preach the Gospel. My themes are always closely related to the Bible if not taken directly therefrom; realizing that the old verities from the old book are still good for this age and the only balm for sin-sick souls and the only comfort for erring, mistaken lives. We have at the most but "thirty minutes to raise the dead in." Therefore, let us use that time in helping the world to see God and live.

I am often asked to give the source of my sermon material, in the nature of illustrations. I get it from the people. To be sure a minister must read books and study them, for he is to be also leader of thought. This is only part of his preparation. I have often held and still hold to my theory, that a minister can preach better sermons after visiting the sick and shut-ins, the bereaved, discouraged and sorrowing members of his flock. How can we expect to touch the wellsprings of humanity's heart, if we do not know of the doubts, the perplexities, sorrows and disturbing elements that are lurking in its depth?

I am always ready and willing to enter the community life and the social activities of my neighbors. I want them to feel that I am one of them; that I believe in wholesome, clean, vigorous sport. I want them to feel that I like to go to picnics and reunions, institutes, and chautauquas, and do all I can to make such affairs a success. Very often I am requested to speak at these gatherings and never refuse, realizing that it is but another opportunity to get in touch with many whom otherwise I should not meet. Many people who have heard me speak on these occasions have afterward come to hear me preach.

Some of my brethren in the church have often told me that they do not find time to do all the things I am doing. This makes me sometimes wonder what they really do. A minister's life is a busy one, and it is just doing the "work of an evangelist" that makes his life busy—or at least that is my impression. I believe that a minister should be like Paul, all things to all people, that at least some might be saved.

I have always found it a good plan to give people something to do in the church, especially the young people. Every Sunday I have a committee for furnishing flowers for the pulpit. These flowers after the services of the day are taken to the sick and shut-ins. I appoint committees for the gathering of materials for missionary boxes; other committees to pack the same; another committee to send it on its way of cheer and evangel of comfort. Of course, one committee can do all this, but it is good to enlist as many as possible in such good work. It is the joy of service that holds the people.

Another plan I have used with much success is a "personal worker's league." I request young men and women to bring their friends to the church and prayer-meeting services. This they do; the young man or woman who has been brought last is in turn requested to bring some one else. I have seen a prayer-meeting grow immeasurably in this way.

It is well to talk live church. Sometimes the laymen who are carrying the burden of our churches become discouraged. It will never do for the pastor to lose heart. The promises upon which he has built his faith are too large for that. Talk dead church and you will kill a society in one year. Much better to have the large optimistic spirit, believing that the kingdom will come in due time if we faint not. God will not see the labors of his servants go to naught. To have this spirit will put new life in the activities of the church and a new impetus to every department. The church life will throb with a new strength and inspiration that will not down. We are doing God's work. He is with us. To be able to say "The best of all, God is with us" and believe it, will do much toward filling our pews. In the past we have relied too much upon our own efforts. Let us invoke in the future the witness of the Spirit.

Although there will be many problems in the future to confront us in this sweet fight of faith, if we strive earnestly, prayerfully, to preach Jesus Christ and live our Gospel, and hold Jesus up to the masses in all his matchless beauty as a Saviour of immortal souls and a Divine Cure for sick souls; if we really are in earnest in this business of saving men, and sincere in our efforts to be good pastors, real shepherds of the sheep, going down life's dusty highways in search of sin-sick weary souls, with a message of brotherly love and a true friendship akin to that of God for erring humanity, I am sure our problem will not be that of an empty church.

THE OLDEST PROTESTANT MISSION

DR. GIOVANNI LUZZI of Florence, Italy, is visiting the United States in the interest of the Waldensian Order—the oldest Protestant mission in the world. The Waldensian Church has always laid claim to great antiquity; indeed, it is believed by many scholars to have originated with the apostles themselves. The road from Rome into Gaul and Spain led through these valleys, and it is highly probable that earliest disciples of Christianity planted the Gospel there while on their journeys.

One of their most noted leaders, Henry Armaud, who, when they had been banished for their evangelical faith, led their return in 1689, says of them in his book, Glorious Recovery by the Waldenses of Their Valley: "Their church has never been reformed, whence arises its title of Evangelic. The Waldenses are descended from those refugees from Italy who, after St. Paul had there preached the Gospel, abandoned their beautiful country and fled to these wild mountains, where they have to this day handed down the Gospel from father to son in the same purity and simplicity as it was preached by St. Paul."

"Italy needs the Gospel pure and simple" is the burden of Dr. Luzzi's message to this country. "She is gradually cutting off the dominion of the Church of Rome, and has as yet made no decided choice as to what she will have in its place. Shall it be the true and living Gospel of Christ, or infidelity?" The Waldensian Church, Dr. Luzzi declares, is already rich in triumphs, and its messengers are making their way slowly and surely making converts and asking funds with which to carry on their work, and for sympathy and prayers for the success of the true Church of Christ in the land of the Papacy. There have recently been established fifty new Waldensian churches and two hundred and fifty mission stations, and many new members and enthusiastic workers have been added to the Order of Waldensians, who, under new leaders, are looking into the future with hopeful hearts. Brave-hearted, earnest men preach and pray and write pamphlets and spread the true teachings of the Bible, in direct contradiction to the brigandage and piracy which is practiced to-day in the name of the Romish Church.

The Waldesians believe in "Modernism," which stands in Italy for the undermining and rooting out of the hideous superstitions and beliefs with which the Church of Rome is choked and stifled. The home church is seeking to meet her great opportunity. It has already established colonies in Uruguay and Argentina, France, Spain, and the United States. Here the prosperity and education of the immigrant Italian Waldensians is adding strength to the church at home.

Before Dr. Luzzi left Italy, he received many fervent, earnest letters, commending his purpose. "Lift up your voices in our behalf," writes a distinguished missionary in Milan, whose following is so great that even the Vatican dare not dictate nor criticize his methods, "and tell them that Modernism is aiming to put clearly before a superstition-ridden nation the undisputable truths of God. Do your best to persuade them that we are neither hypocrites nor destroyers of Christianity nor rebels in the church. We are Christians believing in the revelations God has made of himself through Christ. We want the inspired document of that revelation, the Bible, to become again the unshaken basis of our belief and of our morals. Tell our Christian brothers beyond the sea that we need their earnest prayers and brotherly sympathy."

Such a greeting will bring me closer to him in a few minutes than a sighted person could possibly get. In the course of our conversation I try to work upon the pride of the man who is to be helped. For instance, I talked the other day to a man who made reference to his desire to peddle shoe-strings. I said, 'My gracious, man! you don't want to do that sort of thing. You're too good. You're too sturdy for that.' 'Yes,' he replied, 'I am, sir. I don't really want to do it.' We soon had him pleasantly placed where he can do work of a more ennobling character.

"Some time ago we had correspondence with a man living up above Albany. The man was very anxious to get something to do, but could not seem to locate. I went there [Mr. Scandlin makes such trips unaccompanied] to see him. I found him living with his brother-in-law, who manufactured a certain kind of goods. I asked the brother-in-law to describe every operation employed in the manufacture of these goods. I wondered if there were not some part that could be done by a blind man. It finally developed that several parts could be done by a person without sight, and he promised me that he would instal in his house a machine especially for his blind brother.

"Sometimes, however, we find problems, the solution of which seems obvious enough until we come to investigate. For instance, I called the other day on a man who lived with his wife and five children on the West Side. He had become blind five years ago. He had been in the coal and ice business before he lost his sight. Now, it seemed obvious that we should instal him in a small retail coal and ice business. I thought we might get him a cellar, buy a small supply of coal and ice and start him off. But he convinced me quickly and logically that it was not a profitable undertaking in his section, owing to the fact that a great many Italians are in the business, that ice and coal are so very high in price, and that gas ranges are now being used where coal was formerly used. The result of that call will probably be that he will go into an institutional shop and learn to cane chairs and make brooms. He will certainly be able to earn $7 a week before the end of the year.

"In the early years of my investigation I came across a blind ash-cart man. He had been sightless for fourteen years when I met him, and had supported his family, his wife and two children in comfortable circumstances. A boy drove the cart but he took care of the horses himself. He had two, but one died, and soon after the other became ill and had to be killed. We got hold of him and raised money enough to buy him another horse. Now he is doing as well as ever, a splendid specimen of a manly, strong, blind man.

"He is the man who gave such a good definition of the word optimist. I asked him if he understood what the word meant. 'No,' he said. 'Well,' said I, 'do you know what a pessimist is?' 'No.' 'Well, a pessimist is one who looks on the dark side of things.' 'Sure then I know what an optimist is,' he replied. 'He would be the man who would be looking for the sunshine on both sides of the street at the same time.'"

If ever a definition suited a man this definition of an optimist suits W. I. Scandlin, for surely he is looking for sunshine not only on both sides of the street, but in all dark places as well.

CHARMING CHRISTMAS GIFTS, AND EASY ONES FOR EVERYBODY

BOYS can gather the evergreens and make them up into Christmas wreaths and garlands. A basket of pine cones, gilded or silvered, is a wonderful gift for boys to gather and sort and give away. String the popcorn, the cranberries and raisins. Make a neat doll's house of a cardboard box or a tiny set of box furniture delicately decorated with stripes of water color or gilding for little sister; an Indian village of colored paper tepees and penny china dolls for little brother or turkey feather Indian war-bonnet. I have seen homely gifties such as these bring more joy on account of the time and trouble it took to make them than many a rich gift which has cost the giver only money.

FOR A GUEST ROOM

LEEP sweetly in this quiet room,
O thou, whoe'er thou art,
And let no mournful yesterdays
Disturb thy peaceful heart.
Nor let to-morrow scare thy rest
With thoughts of coming ill;
Thy Maker is thy changeless friend,
His love surrounds thee still.
Forget thyself and all the world;
Put out each feverish light;
The stars are watching overhead;
Sleep sweetly then. Good-night.

Gifts and Gifts

There is almost no end to the variety of Christmasy things girls can make; from the Christmas cookies in circles, stars, crescents and triangles with holes in the middle, all iced and ready to hang on the tree, to all sorts of pretty personal things, a jabot, a nice flannel bag for the thermos bottle, sleeping slippers of angora wool, an embroidered slip for grandmama's "nap pillow," a crinkly paper lampshade for the library, a nightgown case for mother when she goes traveling, made of huckaback, like an envelope, and just the size to hold a neatly folded nightgown; burlap tablecloths, tastefully scalloped and cross-stitched, are always pretty; embroidery bags made over two embroidery rings with the cover neatly made on the inside ring, are up-to-date and pretty; a new dress for sister's old and favorite doll; a skate bag; mittens, long ones that reach above the elbow, where winter cold runs up the sleeve; a collar bag for father made of a round box over which a bright bag with a drawstring has been securely fastened; jingle bell reins with many tiny bells for playing horse with the baby; a cloth picture book, full of colored advertisements; a ball, made of the odds and ends of worsted; some bright beanbags; a velvet cat; a pair of prancing gingerbread ponies.

A ribbon wreath with tiny rosebuds in it would be a lovely gift for your schoolgirl sister, and nothing could be more stylish than one of these up-to-date fillets for the hair, a pretty slipper-bag, a box of Christmas goodies, a jar of sweet pickle or jelly for your other sister at boarding-school.

A collar and cuff set for the parlor maid, a nice "all-over" gingham apron for the cook; a box of Christmas home-made goodies with the recipe inside; or a guest-room verse neatly lettered on a fancy card.

Next week we shall have something to say about Christmas books and other Christmasy things.

TOODLEKINS AND FLIP

A Pussy Pantomime

Flip (wakens up, stretches and yawns):
"Mieu, mieu, mieu, mieu,
Our coats are clean, and our paws are too;
And Mammy's gone around the house
To see if she can find a mouse.
Mieu, mieu, mieu, mieu,
Toodlekins sleeps the whole day through;
This world is so dull, there's nothing to do—
Except to doze again—mieu, mieu!"
(Yawns and curls up.)

Toodlekins (wakens up):
"Mieu, mieu, mieu, mieu,
Flip's sound asleep, and there's nothing to do.
I wish I could catch a great big mouse,
Life is so dull in this old house!
Mieu, mieu, mieu, mieu,
There's nothing at all for a kitten to do—
Except to doze again—mieu, mieu."
(Yawns and curls up.)

Flip—"Toodlekins!"
Toodlekins—"Flip!"
Flip—"Toodlekins! Mieu!"
Toodlekins—"I hear a nibble!"
Flip—"I do too!"
Toodlekins—"Must be a rat! Such a great big noise!"
Flip—"Maybe it's one of those horrid boys!"
Toodlekins—"No, it's a mouse! I see its tail!"
Flip—"No, it's a rat as big as a pail!"
Toodlekins—"I see its eyes! Its tail! It's mine!"
Flip—"No, no! It is mine! Take that! and that!" (Cuffs her.)
Toodlekins—"It's mine, you horrid robber cat!"
Flip—"I saw it first! Take that and that!"
(Slapping and scratching.)

Mother Cat enters:
"Meow, meow! Why, children dear!
Is this what happens when I'm not here?
For shame! For shame! There's a baby mouse—
The tiniest thing in all the house—
Has just slipped away.
Kittens must be quick and quiet
If they would have fat mice for diet."

ACQUAINTANCE WITH GOD

BY OSCAR NEWFANG

HOW shall we become acquainted with God, who is beyond the scope of our physical senses, whose intelligence and plans are far beyond the grasp of our mental capacity? While we may not hope in this life to understand perfectly the wisdom and benevolence of God, we may obtain a sufficiently clear perception of his good-will toward us, from our present limited knowledge of his creation, to kindle within us a love for him and a trust in him that will ever urge us toward a closer acquaintance with him and will afford us an increasing happiness.

To point out all the evidence of good will toward man in the universe, would be to outline practically all of the natural sciences known to man, and would be beyond the present purpose. We will therefore merely note a few salient facts to illustrate the method by which we may perceive the goodness of God in the phenomena and laws of nature, rather than to demonstrate that all of those phenomena and laws prove the love of God toward us.

How admirably adapted to the preservation of life are the phenomena of the earth's axial inclination, its diurnal rotation, and its annual revolution! It is doubtful whether man could exist upon the larger part of the earth's surface, if at all, were any of these phenomena omitted. Geology reveals the far-seeing goodness of God in laying aside vast beds of coal for the use of man, when the internal heat of the earth should have disappeared and artificial heat should be required. Physics and chemistry show us how the process of preserving and improving the earth's soil is being continued at the present time by the action of flowing water, of thawing and freezing, of glacier and avalanche; and how this soil is watered and rendered fruitful by the action of evaporation, winds and rainfall. Botany reveals the beneficence of an arrangement by which the mineral substances are prepared in a form of food which the human body can assimilate. Biology reveals benevolence in the arrangement for the increased propagation of the more perfect and the decreased propagation of the less perfect, in the inherent tendencies toward healing, toward acclimatization, toward reversion to type. Sociology most clearly reveals the goodness of God in the indissoluble connection between brotherly love and happiness, thus prompting all to work together for the common good.

But can we hold communication with the invisible God? Does God have a personal interest in his creatures as a father has in his offspring; or does he leave the human race, like the inanimate world, entirely to the play of natural law? If it be granted that all nature indicates an active, intelligent good-will toward man on the part of God, it follows that, with his inscrutable wisdom, he must be able and must be inclined to take a personal interest in the welfare of each individual human being, however humble. And if man is able to converse across a continent by telephone, or even without wires to convey his thoughts across the vast ocean, it is very reasonable to suppose that God understands every prayer to him formed in our minds, and can interpret our longings for a better life more perfectly than we can express them.

And if it is granted that this life must of necessity be but a preparation for the real, eternal life to come, and that, therefore, God's love must frequently deny our prayers for material things, we can be sure that our prayers are received by God in precisely the same way in which we are sure that our wire or wireless message has reached its destination—by the answer received. It is safe to say that no man ever prayed sincerely to God to be made a better man, who was not made a better man by the very prayer. Looking at life in the light of eternity, and realizing that the object of this brief earthly preparation is the development of a character that will be a source of eternal happiness to us in our future relations with intelligent beings and with God himself, it is evident that the burden of our prayers should be directed to the cultivation of love toward man and toward God. And if our prayers are thus directed, the answer to them is never wanting. No man can sincerely pray the Supreme Being for kindness toward a fellow man without finding his mind inclined to such kindness by the very effort of making the petition.

Any one can test the truth of the foregoing remarks for himself, and to those who have thus tested God's hearing and answering a prayer for righteousness, nothing more need be said. But, as an explanation of a natural phenomenon greatly strengthens the evidence of its reality, so we may note, regarding prayer, that God has so constituted the human mind that a sincere desire or longing for a better life, expressed in prayer, inclines the mind itself strongly toward such better life, and so the prayer insures its own answer; and if the prayer is persistently and repeatedly formed in the mind, the fixed inclination which we call habit is formed, and thus the character is permanently molded into the forms of righteousness for which we pray. So, likewise, a sincere and hearty prayer against a temptation or inclination to do wrong itself so strengthens the aversion to the wrong within us, and so clearly keeps before our minds the real relative importance of the immediate pleasure from the wrong-doing, and the far greater, though more distant, pain which would result, that such a petition also insures its own answer. Let no one say that such results are the less answers from God to our prayers, because his provident wisdom and love have made the answer to a good prayer inseparable from the sincere asking itself. It is rather but another evidence of his goodness.

In what manner communion with God increases our perception of his goodness and increases our love to him and trust in him, thus giving us the beginning of a happiness greater than any other of which we are capable, is not easy to explain. It may be that the molding of our own characters by prayer more into harmony with the character of God enables us to perceive more clearly his love as displayed in nature and in his providence; or it may be that God, in imparting his spirit of universal love to us in answer to our sincere and constant prayers, reveals his love directly to our minds and gradually enlightens our intellects so that we can begin to grasp it. Though we may be unable to grasp the manner of God's revelation of himself to us in prayer, it is very reasonable to suppose, and, indeed, very probable, that he would do so, if he is a being of wisdom and love infinitely beyond our present conception. And that he does thus reveal himself to those who sincerely seek to live according to the law of universal love, and who earnestly pray God for guidance and help in attaining such a character, may be tested by any man in his own experience.

Habitual prayer produces in us a calmness and peace superior to the fluctuations of earthly prosperity or adversity, and a trust in God's guidance that robs earthly sorrows and trials of their bitterness and removes fear, anxiety and worry from our lives. Prayer is the fountainhead of true contentment, or humility, and of patience. If we are persuaded of God's power and love, of his immediate presence and his interest in us and in our prayers, the cares of life disappear and the preponderance of joy in life becomes immeasurably greater.

CHOOSE a present that you know is the best thing of its kind and you never feel apologetic about it, however modest its price. Select a Moore's fountain pen. Thought's inexpensive, you will take a justifiable pride in having given something that will be used daily with a constantly increasing appreciation of your thoughtfulness. Moore's is so simply constructed and has so few parts that there is no chance for it to get out of order or leak. When the cap is screwed on it is perfectly tight and can be carried in any position without risk of leaking. It always writes freely at the first stroke as the pen point is submerged in ink when not in use. No other pen is so easily filled. Just remove the cap and drop in the ink.

Department of Investment Counsel

THE Department of Investment Counsel is a service for our readers embodying financial advice and constructive criticism. We aim to render genuine service, and the scope of this department will embrace a wide range of usefulness: opinion will be expressed and advice given upon every form of Wall Street investment security regarding which we are enabled to secure information based upon authority and accuracy.

The term "investment" is made, by common usage, to cover a very wide field and is all too often applied to highly speculative issues that are by their very nature in no sense entitled to be designated as investments. The line of demarcation between investment and speculation may be quite accurately drawn. The word investment is rightly applied to only non-speculative securities, to those considered absolutely safe, preferably the bonds of railways; the bonds of cities, counties, States; the bonds of public utility and public service corporations, and so on; in other words, to securities about the safety of which there is practically no question. The terms "speculation" or "speculative issue" may cover all securities not included in the first classification and may be applied to any form of security, ranging from mining, oil or plantation stocks up to the shares of prosperous railway corporations.

But for our own and for our readers' convenience, we shall claim considerable latitude in the use of the word "investment" in our correspondence; in extending the scope and usefulness of this department to cover the entire field of investment—the good and the not good—it will become necessary to discuss quite often the merits or demerits of highly speculative issues, but in employing this latitude, we want our readers to bear in mind that investment is one thing and that speculation is quite another thing and one that all too often ends in loss. We shall always, when asked, advise against mere speculation.

Every CHRISTIAN HERALD reader is entitled to free use of the service of this department. If you have accumulated money and desire to obtain a maximum rate of interest return thereon, or if you desire to accumulate money through systematic saving, the Financial Editor is always ready to offer suggestions that should be profitable. If, perchance, you have made investments that have not proved satisfactory, we will, on request, offer opinion as to the probable market value of your holdings. This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter-postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

B. W., Canada.

The first mortgage bonds of the Canadian Michigan and Chicago Railway Company have no value. The road was never built.

P. M. deL., Georgia.

This department cannot offer market tips, nor does it encourage marginal trading. Far better to keep your margin money in the savings bank, or else buy a good bond.

F. J. E., Arkansas.

Keep out of the scheme of the banana company. Either keep your money in the bank, or else buy a good bond, preferably a $1,000 bond issued by your own city, paying 4½ per cent.

D. M. D., Ohio.

(1) This department cannot furnish commercial ratings of firms. Hence I cannot be of service in matter of P. G. Stamm & Co., of St. Joseph, Mo. (2) Cheap oil stocks are poor gambles.

C. I. N., Idaho.

I cannot pass on the values of the tract at Fort Fraser, B. C. Land values are quite often a matter of opinion only and subject to quick and radical change. Do not buy land of which you have no personal knowledge.

D., Nebraska.

(1) Stay out of the reorganization; take your loss and try to forget it. (2) Same advice; don't send good money after bad. (3) Evidently a get-rich-quick swindle. Leave the stock severely alone.

D., Virginia.

The Copper Range Company, the 100,000 shares of which are practically all owned by Copper Range Consolidated, has declared two dividends of $1.50 each, payable November 2. The last previous dividend was $1.50 paid in May.

M., New York, and D. E. P., Kentucky.

American Can, common, cannot be said to present dividend prospects that are brilliant. Its stock-market activities are controlled by prominent operators who have the power to move it up or down at will, and it is not a safe speculation.

W. P. C., Maryland.

The "Cotton Belt" is known officially as the St. Louis Southwestern and is sometimes erroneously classed as a "Gould road." The road's record year of 1911-1912 is being eclipsed by the earnings of 1912-1913. The common stock can pay dividends, and may.

C. W. H., Manitoba.

Virginia Carolina common has not maintained a perfect dividend record by any means, but there are large equities behind it and the earnings are of a nature to inspire confidence in the future, although not sufficient to put it in a high dividend-paying class.

Rev. E. D., Illinois.

Reading, C. & O., Atchison and Pennsylvania are standard "rails" that possess attractive investment features as well as speculative possibilities. Perhaps both C. & O. and Atchison will show a better return to an investor than either of the others named.

N., Michigan.

Underlying railway bonds secured by underlying liens on parts of a railway system are exceedingly sound investment securities. Pennsylvania, Union Pacific, New York Central all issue bonds of this class. Any stock exchange firm will send you particulars upon request.

Small Investor, Maine.

(1) Your Wabash first 5s are, I believe, perfectly safe. True, the bonds are of a company in present financial difficulties, but the assets back of the bonds are far in excess of the bond issue in which you have invested. (2) Wabash preferred, with a heavy assessment pending, is not attractive; I should sell.

S. H. H., Pennsylvania.

Your $500 may be invested as follows: One Virginia Railway first 5 per cent. bond at 99. One Mobile & Birmingham first 4 per cent. bond at 81. One Norfolk & Western first Con's. 4 per cent. bond at 98. One Colorado & Southern Ref. & Ext. 4½ per cent. bond at 95. One Central Vermont first 4 per cent. bond at 93.

O. F., Colorado.

It is a common practice for mining companies to levy assessments, i. e., I presume the Doyle Consolidated has merely followed custom; but whether the company had a legal right to levy, after selling you a "non-assessable" stock, as you say, is not for this department to determine. In the future don't put money into mining schemes.

C. B., Michigan.

Pennsylvania and Reading are both "half" stocks; that is, the par value of each is $50. For convenience, the New York Stock Exchange lists stocks in the $100 unit. Both Pennsylvania and Reading pay 6 per cent. each per annum. Many predict that Pennsylvania will be returned to a 7 per cent. rate in 1913. Earnings seem to justify this prediction.

B. C. L., New York.

I do not favor instalment or deferred-payment plan of buying stocks or bonds. It possesses too great an element of risk even when the firm is a Stock Exchange house. Better establish an account in the best savings bank in your city and regularly deposit $50, which, you say, you can save each month from your salary. When you have $500 buy five $100 New York Stock Exchange bonds that will net you 5 per cent. return. Send for the lists issued by the firm advertising $100 bonds and study up on these issues.

NOTE.—The Christian Herald does not in any way guarantee investment advertisements. It is impossible to do so because our subscribers have far more money to invest than our total capital would permit us to refund. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns.

AS WERE THE DAYS OF NOE

IN Holy Writ the story true we read
Of God forgotten by his creature, man;
How Satan came, and sin's dark work began;
How like fierce flame it spread till riot ran
And God the Lord was mocked by wicked man,
Who scoffed His Word, nor would the warning heed.

God's hour comes swift and sure. The day was dark;
The clouded sky the coming storm portended;
The floodgates opened wide, the rain descended;
And 'neath the wrath divine all nature bended;
While terror-stricken man in vain contended
For entrance, now too late, within the Ark.

Then further in the Book inspired we read:
"As were the days of Noe, again 'twill be.
No thought of God or of eternity;
No warning voice he'll heed or danger see;
Ensnared by worldly pleasure, man will be Lured on to doom by selfishness and greed.

No thought of God, or Father's tender care,
Man rushes to and fro on business bent;
In quest of fame; on getting gold intent;
His days and years in Mammon's service spent;
No time to hear the message God hath sent
No time for holy things; no time to spare.

Ah, yes, the same to-day! The Word is true
No fear of God; no time to watch and pray
His Word unread; unkept his holy day.
Absorbed in self, the time speeds fast away
Nor will the coming judgment long delay.
Our Lord in glory comes! His Word is true labored without a single token of good, but at length numbers of the poor savages were led to Jesus, and the native king joyfully embraced the new faith. The natives gave up their idol gods, and the missionaries packed them in a box like a coffin, and sent them to England, labeled, "dead gods," so that the English Christians might know that the people in Tahiti were now for the true and living God.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

It is said that once an artist painted a picture of a wintry twilight, the trees heavily laden with snow. There was a dreary dark house in the middle of the picture. Then the artist painted a bright yellow light in one of the windows of the house; the whole picture was illumined, and everything that had looked gray and sad before grew bright and happy. To open the windows of our soul to let the Lord Christ in will not only make us glad on Christmas day but will make us joyful on every day.

The great Martin Luther once said: "Whoever preaches Christ rightly, preaches the Gospel of pure joy. Of what benefit would it be to me if Christ had been born a thousand times, and it were daily sung into my ears in a most lovely manner, if I were never to hear that he was born for me, and was to be my very own?"

Some years ago there appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a picture of "The Christ of the Andes." Many HERALD readers will remember it. Let us describe it again. For generations the South American republics of Argentina and Chile had quarreled over a boundary line, and at times had fought about it. It was finally agreed that they should fight no more, and both sides yielded their cannon to be melted into a statue of Christ to be placed on a peak of the Andes Mountains as a boundary. The figure is twenty-six feet high and stands upon a granite hemisphere. Upon the pedestal has been cut this inscription (in Spanish): "The mountains will crumble to dust ere Argentines and Chileans break the peace which at the feet of Christ the Redeemer they have sworn to keep." That bronze statue is magnificent, but it has not the power of the ever-living Christ to bind men to be his followers.

It may not be on the mountain's height,
Or over the stormy sea;
It may not be at the battle's front,
My Lord will have need of me.
But if, by a still small voice, he calls me
In paths that I do not know,
I'll answer, dear Lord, with my hand in thine—
I'll go where you want me to go.

MARY BROWN.

Among the Workers

—REV. MATTHIAS KLEIN, of Awaji, Japan, has returned to the United States on account of Mrs. Klein's health.

—IF ANY READER of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is desirous of doing a worthy work of charity, quietly and without ostentation, on receiving the name of such reader THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will forward full particulars of the case.

—W. A. EASTMAN writes from Los Angeles, Calif., saying: "I received the sixty Testaments to-day that have been at Y. M. C. A. in Sacramento some days. They are just what I wanted. I have used all the others you sent and bought fifty more of the American Bible Society in San Francisco, and used them. I also received the little second-hand Testament, and appreciate it more than the rest, if possible, on account of the spirit in which it must have been sent."

—OUR OLD AND WELL-KNOWN friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Rev. Z. C. Beals, who returned home five months ago because of sickness in the family, has just been elected secretary and treasurer of the American Advent Christian Mission of Boston, Mass. He surely has had the needed experience in foreign mission work, and is in every way well qualified for his new position. He has been in China twenty years and has had a wide experience in all phases of missionary work. He has served on three different occasions on our famine committee work and aided in distributing CHRISTIAN HERALD relief supplies. This past year he was appointed buyer of food supplies for the flood sufferers in China, buying in one month supplies to the value of $150,000 (Mexican).

NEVER TIRES

Of the Food That Restored Her to Health.

"Something was making me ill and I didn't know the cause," writes a Colo. young lady. "For two years I was thin and sickly, suffering from indigestion and inflammatory rheumatism.

"I had tried different kinds of diet, and many of the remedies recommended, but got no better.

"Finally, Mother suggested that I try Grape-Nuts, and I began at once, eating it with a little cream or milk. A change for the better began at once.

"To-day I am well and am gaining weight and strength all the time. I've gained 10 lbs. in the last five weeks and do not suffer any more indigestion, and the rheumatism is all gone.

"I know it is to Grape-Nuts alone that I owe my restored health. I still eat the food twice a day and never tire of it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The flavour of Grape-Nuts is peculiar to itself. It is neutral, not too sweet and has an agreeable, healthful quality that never grows tiresome.

One of the sources of rheumatism is from overloading the system with acid material, the result of imperfect digestion and assimilation.

As soon as improper food is abandoned and Grape-Nuts is taken regularly, digestion is made strong, the organs do their work of building up good red blood cells and of carrying away the excess of disease-making material from the system.

The result is a certain and steady return to normal health and mental activity. "There's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

I. M. P., Sussex, Del. Of how many kinds of distinct substances is matter composed?

There are thousands of substances, but all can be resolved into about eighty distinct elements, that is to say, substances whose molecules contain only one kind of atom and so cannot be further analyzed. A molecule is the smallest particle of a substance which exhibits the individuality of that substance. The atom, however, as we explained in THE MAIL-BAG some time ago, is not the smallest particle of matter of which we have cognizance. The most recent advances in radio-activity indicate that the atom in itself is a complex system consisting of a positively charged nucleus around which are grouped numerous negatively charged particles of infinitesimal dimensions called electrons. The electron is now described as the unit of the material universe, the basal ingredient underlying all forms of matter.

B. C., Columbus, Ohio. Can a married woman, who owned property previous to her marriage, dispose of it without her husband's consent, or appropriate to her own use any emoluments accruing from it, such as rent, etc.?

Under the laws of Ohio a married woman can own and dispose of her property the same as though unmarried.

Enquirer, Reading, Pa. What is the precise meaning of the term "in Christ," which we hear so frequently in sermons? I know what confession means; but has the phrase quoted any further significance?

Its reference is exclusively to the relation of the believer to the risen Lord, and expresses a peculiar spiritual connection. Rev. David Smith, the distinguished theologian, defines it as a spiritual way of four connecting links, viz.: (1) Christ for us (see II. Cor. 5: 21) which is substitution; (2) We in Christ (II. Cor. 5: 7; Rom. 6: 11), which is justification; (3) Christ in us (Rom. 8: 11; II. Cor. 13: 5; Gal. 2: 20), which is sanctification, and (4) We for Christ (II. Cor. 5: 10), which is consecration. This is the condition of Christ's true disciple. He stands in the world as representative and witness-bearer for Christ. It is not merely a question of his own salvation; he must be a shining light to guide others, and must live the Christ-life, under whatever circumstances he may be placed. One who lives the Christ-life and all of whose thoughts, acts, influences and hopes are centered on carrying on the work of Christ, and who is guided by his will, can be said to be truly "in Christ."

C. H., Garden City, Cuba. Kindly explain Matt. 10: 23.

This passage, like many other predictions by Jesus, has a twofold meaning: it applies in the first place to the brief opportunities Israel was to have of "knowing the time of his visitation," and in a wider meaning it relates to the Second Coming. See parallel in Matt. 24: 14.

A. H. R., Peekskill, N. Y. The William Wheelwright you mention was a lineal descendant in the fifth generation from the great Puritan minister, John Wheelwright (brother of the celebrated Anne Hutchinson), who came to Massachusetts in 1636, and who was a theological controversialist. With his followers he founded Exeter, N. H. William Wheelwright was born in 1798, and as a young man became interested in South America. He devoted himself to developing that country and on benevolent purposes spent over $700,000. He assisted in establishing many churches. He died in 1873.

Interested Subscriber, Waverly, N. Y. I believe there are many people all over this country who would like to know Christ as a personal Saviour if they knew how to find him. In some cases they do not get the help they need from the pulpit, and are too timid to speak to Christian friends. Through the columns of your estimable paper could you not tell them in a very simple way just how to find him? Perhaps many who are now walking in darkness might thus be led into the light.

It is strange that though salvation by faith is such a simple thing so many souls stumble at it. It seems too simple to be true, so they go about trying to find a harder way to be saved, and of course they do not find it because there is no other way. This is what we should say to every seeking soul: The first step toward Christ is to realize what it is that keeps you away from him, that is, your sin. Christ is very near you, nearer than your closest friend; but your sin separates your soul from him. You must confess your sin, acknowledge that you have sinned; you must repent of your sin, making restitution if you have wronged any one; you must determine to forsake your sin. But these things are not faith; they are only the necessary steps to faith. Faith is the definite belief that Christ died for your sins and that he actually forgives them now. "He tasted death for every man." If that is so, then he really, literally died for you. It is very easy to believe Jesus if you will just let yourself do it. Faith is an extremely simple thing; doubt is difficult. In your brain you know that he died "for every man." How can you doubt, then, that he died for you? You know that he died for the sins of the whole world; this must include you. Nothing in the history of the world is a surer, steadier fact than that Christ was crucified to save you from sin. The moment any one will stop doubting that fact and begin to believe it he will find peace, and find Christ. "Be not afraid—only believe." "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Have you not proved that the way of doubt is hard and sad? Will you not try now the way of trust, and find how sweet and light and glad it is?

R. J., Pueblo, O. Please state the most fatal disease in the United States and also give the world's death-rate.

Consumption is the most fatal disease; it is claimed that it carries off 200 out of every 100,000 of our population annually. Next comes pneumonia with 195 out of that number; heart disease claims 135; diarrhœal diseases 90; kidney diseases 88; apoplexy 68; cancer 62; old age 55; bronchitis 50; cholera infantum 48; general debility 45; inflammation of the brain and meninge 42; diphtheria 36, and typhoid 35. The world's mortality is said to be 70 a minute, or 100,800 a day, or 36,792,000 a year.

S. M., Melrose, Mass. What is the cause of earthquakes?

Earthquakes are a sudden vibration or breaking out of the earth's crust caused by an internal commotion which arises from the great heat inside our globe. The crust of the earth comparatively speaking is very thin, while the heated interior is immense, but the mass is gradually cooling, and as it cools it contracts. The outer shell or crust must contract too, but being solid it cannot do so without breaking and shifting over in folds, consequently we have earthquakes. There is never a moment in which some part of the earth's crust is not in disturbance; the seismograph shows a constant tremor, for the internal heat is always at work.

A. T. A., Chambersburg, Pa. 1. See page 43 of The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, for an outline of the creed of the Seventh-Day Adventists. 2. The six days of Creation are interpreted to mean six periods of time. "A thousand years is as a day in his sight." 3. Rev. 8: 10, 11 has been variously interpreted, some holding that the fall of the star Wormwood presaged the fall of a great leader or some future false teacher, whose doctrines would be fatal to multitudes of souls. 4. Your other question is one that cannot be decided satisfactorily, and would simply involve needless discussion.

J. H. McL., Lindsay, Calif. The passage in John 14: 2, 3, while it has reference to Christ's second coming, refers also, in a secondary and comforting sense, to each believer individually when "he puts off this tabernacle, sleeping in Jesus, but his spirit being present with the Lord." The Saviour does not enter into details, but thinks it quite enough to reassure them to say that where he is they shall be also. There are many things concerning which we have no means of arriving at any definite conclusion in this life, and we should be willing to leave such problems to be solved in God's own good time and in his own way.

W. M. W., Winona, Miss. Mohammedanism has unquestionably been an enemy to human progress and an obstacle in the path of civilization. This is abundantly proved by the record of history. Were the Turk driven out of Europe, Christendom would rejoice. But even while we may look with satisfaction on the downfall of the Moslem power, we should not forget that the Turk, however mistaken his religion, is entitled to our sympathy and help in his time of trouble and even to our prayers. Jesus taught us that we should pray even for our enemies.

W. I., Penns Park, Pa. Where, in the Bible, is found the quotation: "As a man thinketh so is he"?

See Prov. 23: 7; also Matt. 5: 8-28; Matt. 15: 19; Mark 7: 21; Luke 6: 45, and other passages bearing on the same subject.

R. S. M., Lincoln, Miss. Mercury is nearest the sun, its mean distance being 36,000,000 miles, but it has a very eccentric orbit and sometimes approaches to within 28,000,000 miles and at others recedes to 43,000,000. Only at odd times during the year is it visible to the naked eye, because it lies so close to the sun and so near to the horizon that it is obscured by the denser layers of the earth's atmosphere. The bulk of the planet is about one-nineteenth that of the earth, but its weight is only one-thirtieth, therefore its mass is proportionately less dense than that of our globe.

A Great Wesleyan Methodist Church House

THE erection of the great Central Hall and Connexional Buildings at Westminster, London, has been the chief subject of talk in Wesleyan Methodist circles in England. It is claimed that it is the finest evangelical church building in the world. It has cost something like £250,000 ($1,200,000) to build, and the whole scheme and its carrying out are acclaimed everywhere as triumphs of organization and financial skill. A fourth of the million guinea fund, which the Methodists raised some years ago, was set aside for this building, but, taking into account the site, the cost greatly exceeded that sum. Methodists are not unnaturally extremely proud of the fact that the great building has been erected in a neighborhood that has always been dedicated to things ecclesiastical, for it stands close to the ancient Westminster Abbey and the famous St. Margaret's Church. In such a neighborhood, close to the Houses of Parliament, and practically in the heart of London, land is extremely valuable, and it is undoubtedly a tribute to the organizing skill and business capacity of the leaders of the Wesleyan Church that they have been able to build such a place in such a spot. Sir Robert Perks, the great civil engineer and business magnate, has been the guiding spirit of the whole scheme. The big dome is the third highest in London, being only exceeded by the dome of the British Museum and that of St. Paul's Cathedral. It is over two hundred feet from the pavement to the top. Inside there is a grand staircase which is said to be the finest example of the elliptical staircase in the metropolis, and there is a great hall which is one of the best in London.

Miscellaneous

A. L., Minn. No such passage in the Bible.

Reader, Hallettsville, Texas. Address Woman's Exchange, 334 Madison Avenue, New York City.

E. L. J., Mohawk, N. Y. Ahasuerus was a king of Persia, and is mentioned many times throughout the Book of Esther. He lived and reigned about B.C. 450, and was the third of that name on the Persian throne.

R. E. K., Reardan, Wash. "Rev. John Smith, D.D.," is correct form. D.D. means Doctor of Divinity, and one may be an ordained preacher without being a D.D. "Reverend" is a title of courtesy applicable to any regular minister.

A. O. T., Hinsdale, N. Y. There is no prophecy concerning steam cars or horseless vehicles, or flying machines in the Bible, although some have construed such passages as Nahum 2: 4 as referring to these things. Such a construction is not justifiable.

J. S. A., Plevna, Kan. 1. Christian burial in what is known as consecrated ground in former times was refused to suicides and noted criminals. 2. God alone is the judge of men's hearts, and we should not attempt to set limits to his mercy and forgiveness.

S. P. K., Rancocas, N. J. There are many uses to which churches are put nowadays besides preaching, and some of them are rather doubtful. Lectures and literary entertainments of a suitable character could not reasonably be objected to; but care should always be taken to exclude anything that would be derogatory to the character of the Lord's house.

S. M. H., Hillsboro, Vt. The largest guns in the world have been provided for the latest super-dreadnaughts of the United States Navy. These are fourteen-inch guns; each weighs about sixty tons and costs some $70,000 with $55,000 additional to mount. They have a range of 25,000 yards, and at 10,000 yards a shot will penetrate sixteen inches of hardest steel. A single round of ammunition costs about $500. Each of the new battleships will carry ten of these guns.

Mrs. O. W. H., McKenzie, Tenn. 1. The bright star in the southwestern sky in early evening is the planet Jupiter. 2. Yes. Arcturus always appears first at the horizon in the northeast.

A CORRECTION

In the account of the recent gubernatorial elections which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 27 it was stated that John C. Karel was elected in Wisconsin and Arthur Capper in Kansas. These statements were founded on the latest telegraphic reports available when that issue of the magazine went to press. Since that date certificates of election have been issued to Francis E. McGovern in Wisconsin and George H. Hodges in Kansas.

The Bread Line in the Bowery Mission Basement

Filling the Dinner Baskets

FEEDING THE FRIENDLESS

THE STORY OF THE BOWERY MISSION'S THANKSGIVING AND THE OPENING OF THE BREAD LINE

NE by one, two by two, in places three by three, a line of hungry men etches both ways along e street. Northward it aches clear to the cor- r and extends down the le street. These men, se hundreds of men, are homeless and hungry on anksgiving Day. In some cases it is their fault; many cases it is not. But in all of the cases it ould not and does not make any difference at the wery Mission. If a man is hungry the first ighborly duty is most obvious—feed him. Other nsiderations can be taken in hand after that. But more men are hungry in this single section of w York than are standing in this pathetic line. e man at the Mission door will let you in if you going to sit on the platform or in the gallery. e auditorium is already full, filled with men who mostly in slightly better circumstances than se waiting on the street; that is, they find jobs re frequently, have acquired some better clothes, d haven't been so many nights recently without ging. But these men, too, are glad to come to e Mission's Thanksgiv- g Day dinner.

It is eight o'clock Thanks- ring evening. The doors e opened to the base- nt of the Mission. A liceman guides the long ne on the street and one one the men go down, proach the kitchen unter and receive a box ntaining a hearty meal d, at the coffee urns, a eaming cup of coffee. out eight hundred men t their Thanksgiving pper thus, and later me three hundred come wn from the meeting ing held in the audito- im and take their turn th supper box and cof- . It is a good square al they get, too, a tur- y sandwich, a ham ndwich, half a pie, ree apples and three llers, beside the coffee. This Thanksgiving din- r to nearly twelve ndred homeless men s the last number of the day's program at e Bowery Mission. It had been a busy day, lowing a busy night, and many busy days d nights had gone before. If you had stepped off the Bowery a few minutes before mid- ht Wednesday, made your way through the audi- ium, where men were gathering for a midnight eting, stepped across the platform to the kitchen beyond, your nostrils would have been assailed with pleasant odors and your ears with pleasant sounds. The air seemed full of the fragrances of cooked turkey and chicken. Piles of roasted chicken lay about, and platters of sliced turkey-meat were on the tables. Mingling with the odors of the savory meat were whiffs of fragrant steam from the coffee urns. And in the midst of these sights and smells of delicious plenty a small group of men, workers who were to dispense the Thanksgiving bounties, were standing and singing:

"What a friend we have in Jesus."

The music floated through to the auditorium, and some of the men waiting there joined in.

Then:

"There's not a friend like the lowly Jesus."

The Women and Girls Waiting to Receive Their Baskets

Then:

"He will hold my hand."

The superintendent of the Mission, Dr. J. G. Hallimond, then led the little group of workers in prayer, a special prayer for God's special blessing upon them during the busy hours of the night and day to follow, a prayer that they might be kept strong and sweet and patient and glad as they tried to bring Thanksgiving Day cheer to the needy.

At the midnight meeting Mr. C. D. Usinger, a convert of the Bowery Mission, now the superintendent of Faith Mission, in New York, gave an earnest evangelistic address from Acts 3: 19, 20, "Repent ye therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that so there may come seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send the Christ who hath been appointed for you, even Jesus."

The meeting closed at one o'clock, and at this hour the famous "Bread Line" opened for the winter. The men from the auditorium filed downstairs and at the counter received a big roll and a cup of coffee. After the first roll and first cup were gone they could take their place in the line again and receive a second supply. Meanwhile the men who had been waiting on the sidewalk came down and took their places in the line. While the men ate and drank, Mr. Usinger and workers from the Mission's own staff went among them talking with them about their spiritual and physical needs. Many lodging house tickets were given out and the men invited to get into touch with the Mission's Brotherhood and Labor Bureau.

Think of the homes they come from! Think of the fields and the lanes, the kitchens and the halls and the barns where their footsteps are missed! Think of the preparations for the Thanksgiving home feast in which they will not share! Think of the mothers and fathers waiting; the wives and children watching! See the flashing fires and the bright lamps, the cozy tables and the warm beds. Then see them standing shivering here, unkempt, forlorn, forsaken. Chilled and tired feet, chilled and aching fingers, forms crouched forward in the instinctive effort to huddle flesh together against the sharp midnight air, stomachs empty, and hearts how weary! Some of them to blame for their plight; many of them not to blame. Some of them detained by sin or pride from the homes waiting to welcome them; some of them away so long that the home has disappeared and the dear ones are dead.

FEEDING THE FRIENDLESS

The Contents of a Thanksgiving or Christmas Dinner Basket

Food for the Dinner for the Men Who Ate at the Mission

Yet they are hungry, right down hungry. So they stand in the line and move down the stairway and seize the bread and coffee and are glad for an hour's respite from the cold, for the savor and warmth of the coffee, for the nourishment of the mission bread. It is a fine thing to shelter and feed them thus; but it is still finer that many of them are led, through the "Bread Line," to work, to helpful fellowship, to salvation, and, in many, many cases, to their homes again.

The "Bread Line" dispersed between two and three o'clock, but workers were busy all the rest of the night in the kitchen, packing the boxes for the men's dinner and putting the finishing touches on the baskets which were to go out at nine o'clock. In the early hours of the morning a light snow had begun to fall. It gladdened the heart of many a boy and girl in the country who loves a "white Thanksgiving." It was fine to look out upon it even from the window of a warm, cozy room in the city. For those who could not start home for Thanksgiving dinner till that morning, the snow gave a peculiar zest and joy to the journey through the fields and villages between the city and home. But to the wanderers who had had no shelter, to the homes where there was no fire and no coal and no food, the snow was an unwelcome feature of Thanksgiving Day. It made the pavements damper and colder for ill-shod feet; it sent a chill through the thin coats and meager shawls; it made warmth and plenty seem still more unattainable things.

Through the snow they came to the Mission doors, women, girls, and boys, each armed with a postal card which was to be their guarantee of a big basket containing a Thanksgiving dinner for ten people; 150 baskets were waiting for them. Dr. Hallimond led in prayer again—a simple, earnest prayer. Then the distribution began. As the names were called the representative of the family came forward, a big basket was brought out and the superintendent or one of the other workers carried it to the door where it was turned over to the happy recipient. A basket contained a whole roast chicken (it had been found from the experience of other years that it was unsatisfactory to give uncooked chickens for the extremely simple reason that many of the families who took them had no fire or coal to cook them with), potatoes, turnips, a pound package of coffee, one of sugar, one of prunes, a half pound of tea, a half pound of butter, a loaf of bread, a can of milk, a bag of salt, a bag of onions, and a cake. Mr. Hunt, business manager and assistant superintendent, who shoulders the intricate details of these big events—was particularly tickled about that cake. He had figured it out that you can't have a really satisfactory feast without a cake, a real cake, a complete cake. So he had those delicious and complete snug, brown, round loaves of cake made, and one was tucked away in every basket.

Our story comes round again to Thanksgiving night, the waiting line of men outside, the packed mission room where the Thanksgiving service is about to begin, while the men from the street eat their Thanksgiving dinner in the room below. There is no space to describe that meeting, the songs, the testimonies, the good cheer. Space must be made, however, to mention the beautiful song which Mrs. Hallimond rendered exquisite "The Song That Reached My Heart," and the s Mr. Hunt sang, though he had had no sleep night before and had caught only an hour's during the busy day when he was responsible the filling of so many empty stomachs. This ti it was hearts that he was reaching—and he reach them as he sang "Sweet Dreamland Face One never knew that so much real religion could put into a ballad usually thought of as secul But hunt up your old song-book that contains and try to imagine yourself homeless and hung on Thanksgiving night, and ask how that sc would make you feel sung by a man who knew h to sing and who was, you were aware, directing feeding, within twenty-four hours, of well on five thousand hungry folks.

Other special features of the meeting, which c not be overlooked, were the poem by "Brothe Moran, good enough to be printed in full in T CHRISTIAN HERALD, though it would demand nea two pages of space, and the testimony of "Brothe Cluever, the genial cook, who praises and serv God at the big mission range where he prepa the food to nourish the great sad family of Go poor.

Nearly a thousand men in the first bread li Thanksgiving dinners in baskets for fifteen hu dred more; Thanksgiving dinner at night nearly twelve hundred; a thousand more in bread line at one o'clock Friday morning. But, as it was, one's heart aches to think of the need untouched, the bodies yet unnourished, the hon unwarmed, the outcasts homeless still.

THANKSGIVING MASS AT WASHINGTON

THE fourth annual celebration of what is called the Pan-American Thanksgiving Mass was held in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Washington, D. C., at ten A.M. on Thanksgiving Day. This was the occasion on which the Roman Catholic Church at the center of the American Government calls together the official representatives of all the republics of the two Americas to join with her in the services of her house, while she throws the cloak of the "mass" over this ancient American institution. The President proclaims the day and calls upon the people to offer thanksgiving. Then the Roman Church calls upon the President to lead the representatives of the American nations into her sanctuary. Thus does the Catholic Church use the influence of the great American Republic to strengthen her hold upon the other republics of the Western hemisphere who have been looking toward liberty and longing for enlightenment and prosperity.

The first "Thanksgiving Mass" was celebrated in the first year of Mr. Taft's administration, and called forth considerable protest and much criticism from Protestant America. He may have regretted the precedent thus established, and there was unmistakable evidence that he would have been glad to have eliminated it this year from his Thanksgiving Day program. As a matter of fact, the program at St. Patrick's was placed at ten o'clock instead of eleven as heretofore, in order that the President might attend the services at All Souls' Unitarian Church at eleven o'clock.

The President departed from St. Patrick's at eleven o'clock sharp, with the services but half over. There is no question but that the President has at last become convinced of what many have known for months—that the many favors bestowed by him upon adherents of the Catholic Church have made him unpopular with the majority of the people.

The absence of the Pope's envoy, Archbishop Bonzano, when it was expected that he would be in attendance seated upon a purple throne opposite the cardinal throne occupied by Cardinal Gibbons; the absence of the papal flags that have on former occasions decked the front of the rectory and church; the absence of conspicuous papal colors within the church itself; and the change of the hour of the service that the President might attend his own church—these can only be interpreted as a result of the popular protest against the course of the President in past years in such matters.

Promptly at a quarter before ten, the cathedral orchestra opened the program with musical selections faultlessly rendered, and the large cathedral was filled in a few moments. At the center of the church almost directly in front of the high altar two beautifully upholstered chairs were placed for the President and Mrs. Taft. The center of the church was reserved for the representatives of the various American republics, each pew bearing t flag of the country whose representative was occupy it. The high altar was most beautifu decorated with flickering candles and yellow chr santhemums, the lights and the flowers showing t colors of the papacy.

At ten o'clock the strains of the hymn "Americ burst forth from the orchestra gallery, and wh the audience arose to its feet, the President a Mrs. Taft, with the President's military ai marched down the center aisle to the places pr vided for them. Then came the procession of alt boys, acolytes, priests and prelates, led by alt boys carrying the crucifix and lighted candl Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Keene broug up the rear of the procession with pages carryi the long trains of their scarlet-colored silken rob The chasubles of the priests who were to officia at the service of the mass were resplendent wi gold and stiff with embroidery. The members the procession stood within the sanctuary un Cardinal Gibbons had been seated upon his scar throne at the right of the high altar. Then beg the service of ritual and ceremony, coverings a uncoverings, kneelings and risings, chantings, bo ings, incensings and ring-kissing, so characteris of such occasions in a Catholic Church, and whi it would be folly for a non-Catholic to attempt describe.

The Riverside, Where Prayer Was Wont to Be Made

All That Is Left of Ancient Philippi

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

PHILIPPI, THE CITY OF THE DEAD

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

EVERY man of European extraction may well pause in reverent gratitude for a moment as he remembers the first landing of Christian missionaries on European soil, so pregnant is that arrival with the mighty events of the future.

With that quartette of brave and unselfish adventurers, Paul and Silas and ...othy and Luke, came that which was to make Europe famous as the center ...ivilization for centuries to come. Her laws, her morals, her manners, her ... and architecture, her poetry, her prose literature, all landed with the ...ent of those four men upon her soil.

We do not know how Neapolis looked in Paul's time, though it must have ...n a place of some considerable importance, since the great Egnatian Way, ...plendid road paved with marble, and which stretched all the way from ...ne to this outermost boundary of Macedonia, ended here. This road, tra...sing the whole southern part of Italy, from the Mediterranean to Brindisi ...the Adriatic, began again after the interruption of the Adriatic at Dyrrha...um; then it went across the breadth of Macedonia to Thessalonica, Appolo..., Amphipolis, Philippi and Neapolis.

With all our modern pride in road building, since time began there has per...s never been constructed such a magnificent highway as this. Paul fol...ed it for many weary days in the journeys we are about ...describe, and the modern traveler in that land does not ... far away from it.

...n our journey following St. Paul, we arose early one ...ruary morning and left our fairly clean hotel in Ne...olis for four hours of travel over the modern road near ... Via Egnatia, which should take us to ancient Philippi. ...r vehicle was a somewhat dilapidated hack, such as ...ericans are familiar with at almost every considerable ...lway station, but a surprisingly comfortable convey...e for this part of the world. Rattling down some ...ep, roughly paved streets, we came to the center of the ... Neapolis, passed near the great Roman aqueduct, ...ich must have stood there in Paul's time, and ascended ...other steep street on the other side of the market place. ...Early as it was we found that the people of Kavalla ...re up and doing. The stalls of the fruit men were at...ctive with oranges, pomegranates, lemons and dates. ...e vegetable dealers displayed a tempting array of cauli...wers, cabbages, onions, okra, leeks and potatoes. As in ... Eastern cities, there was no privacy. The cook was ...paring his breakfast on the sidewalk; the shoemaker ... plying his awl; the tailor his needle; and the black...ith was shoeing his horses almost in the very street.

After passing some large modern tobacco warehouses ...d some fine homes belonging to the tobacco magnates, we ...me to the edge of the city and faced a tremendous rocky ...ll, seemingly composed of solid granite, on which not a ...de of grass or the smallest shrub could find lodgment. ...ack and forbidding is this great mass of rock, like the ...ack hills" of Montenegro. Beside the modern road, and not more than fifty ...rds away in many places, the old Roman road which St. Paul trod was ...inly visible. It is now so out of repair as to be impassable, and yet in some ...all stretches it is as smooth and as well paved as in the ancient days, though ...aw none of the marble slabs with which it is said to have been covered. To ...l that I was actually walking in the footsteps of St. Paul I descended from ...r ancient chariot and walked upon some of these stones of the old road.

Up, up, up, our horses toiled, until we reached the summit, and at the same ...he one of the most beautiful views which all Europe can furnish. Looking ...k we saw the busy city of Kavalla, made more enchanting by the distance. ...yond the city rippled the waters of the Ægean. To the east is Samothrace, ...ofty island, which for thousands of years has been a landmark for Greek ...riners. Thasos we could see to the southeast, an island famous in song ...d story and in actual history. Still further off we could see towering Athos ...ing more than six thousand feet above the sea, on whose precipitous sides ...less than 180 monasteries existed at one time, and where were preserved in ...ir famous libraries some of the most valuable Greek manuscripts. Even now the mountain shelters scores of monasteries and thousands of monks. When we turn about and look toward the west a scene of still greater historic interest is spread out before us. There is the wide, low, marshy plain of Philippi, where one of the most momentous battles in all history was fought. Here the Republicans of Rome, under Cassius and Brutus, met the Imperialists, marshaled by Octavius Cæsar and Mark Antony. Here the Republicans lost the battle. A glorious page of Roman history was turned and the monarchy with all its strength and might, but also with all its corruption, lust and cruelty, was established.

With the field of Philippi in plain sight we could read our Shakespeare with new interest. There on that field, according to the immortal bard of Stratford, Brutus soliloquized:

> Oh that a man might know
> The end of this day's business ere it come.
> But it sufficeth that the day will end,
> And then the end is known. Come, ho! away!

There on that field Cassius was killed with his own sword, and at his own command, by his slave Pindarus, while he exclaims: "Cæsar, thou art revenged, even with the sword that killed thee."

A Macedonian Turkish Woman Wearing the Yashmak

In order that the army might not be overwhelmed by the news of the death of their great leader, his body was secretly sent off to the island of Thasos while the battle was still raging. On that same field of Philippi Brutus killed himself by running upon his sword. "Brutus, the noblest Roman of them all!" as Antony said of him.

When the news of the disastrous battle of Philippi reached Portia, the wife of Brutus, in her island home at Nisida, near Pozzuoli, where afterwards Paul landed on his way to Rome, she killed herself by the most horrible of all suicidal methods, swallowing live coals of fire. Such were some of the tragedies connected with the bloody field of Philippi, a battle fought nearly a hundred years before St. Paul's arrival at the same historic city, which had then become a Roman colony.

We descended the steep slope of this spur of Mt. Pangaeus by zigzags, until we came to the marshy plain at its foot.

A few miles of a very tolerable road and we found ourselves on the site of ancient Philippi, a city which every student of St. Paul's life and letters must ever remember as conspicuous in the story of the great apostle. Here he preached with power and persuasive eloquence. Here he was arrested and cruelly beaten and imprisoned in a filthy dungeon. Here, through a direct interposition of providence, he was released, and there took place the wonderful conversion of his jailer, which has stood as a type of instantaneous conversion in all the ages since. To the church of Philippi he wrote one of his most inspiring epistles by which Christians for nearly two thousand years have been warned, encouraged and strengthened. But it must be acknowledged that Philippi in its present condition is one of the most dismal and dispiriting places in all Bible geography. It may well be called a City of the Dead.

At first sight, it seems as if there was absolutely no habitation of human beings within sight of ancient Philippi. On approaching nearer, however, one sees a little cluster of rude Turkish houses to the east of the ancient acropolis. Aside from this little hamlet, the only sign of a dwelling-place for man is a dirty khan. On the doorstep of the khan sits a dirty Greek in baggy Turkish trousers. Within is a smoky fireplace which sends more smoke out into the dingy room than goes up the chimney. Into the fireplace is built an ancient marble containing an inscription, which can still be read, if one brushes away the soot and dirt. Here the traveler may obtain a tiny cup of thick Turkish coffee for an extravagant price, and here our horses rest before we take up our journey again for Drama, the railway station some ten miles farther on. There is one redeeming feature about the site of ancient Philippi, and that is

A NOBLE NOBLEMAN

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Richard W. Jungfer*

TEXT: "Go thy way; thy son liveth." John 4: 50

JESUS was very practical. He not only instructed his disciples in his doctrines concerning the everlasting truths of the kingdom of God, but he also sent them among the people to preach, to teach, and to work miracles. This they did, and they had splendid success. They returned with enthusiastic words: "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us." But this power was not always theirs. On one occasion a man brought his lunatic son to the Master, saying (Matt. 17: 16): "I brought him to thy disciples and they could not cure him." Jesus said to the father (Mark 9: 23): "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief." Jesus healed him and everybody marveled. Then his disciples came to him and said: "Why could not we cast him out?" And Jesus said: "Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible to you." In John 14: 12, Christ says: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do," i.e., heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils.

The Promises for Us

Now we believe that these promises were not only to the disciples of his time but also to those of the present day. We believe that the words of Christ to his disciples at the institution of the communion are also to us, when he says, "This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." If we believe this one, then we can believe that all other promises are for us also. If we cannot do the works his disciples did, it is only because we do not fulfil the conditions. Since this nobleman's son was cured, as narrated in our text, he must have had all that was required. Let us therefore look at the man very closely to find out what he had and what we are wanting.

We see, first of all, that he humbled himself before the Lord. The nobleman's son was sick. Possibly it was his only son, and like Abraham of old he loved him with all his heart. He looked upon him as his heir and as the preserver of his family. Sickness and death, however, make no distinction between rich and poor, between high-born and lowborn, between young and old. The best physicians were called, everything that human science knew was tried. But instead of getting better the boy became worse. It was plainly to be seen that he would die. It was a terrible blow to the father; he could not realize it. In tearless grief he spent hours. What should he do? What could he do? Suddenly he aroused himself. Like a flash the thought of the Master had come to him. If any help could be had at all, he would be the only one to give it. Possibly he had seen the Master at work, maybe he had heard him preach, but like Nicodemus was afraid to confess him in public, or had been too proud to do so. The news of Jesus' whereabouts always spread over the surrounding country; therefore the news soon reached Capernaum that he had arrived in Cana. No sooner had the nobleman heard this than he decided to go there.

The Humbling of Pride

He sets forth; he arrives. The drift of the people guides him to the Master. He pushes himself through the crowd until he is before the Lord. He falls upon his knees; he raises his arms; he pleads with imploring look: "Lord, come down and heal my son, for he is at the point of death." What does he care if he belittles himself in the eyes of the multitude, or if he is ridiculed by his friends? What does it matter to him if he should become the laughing-stock of the entire country? What is it to him if he is despised henceforth by those of his rank and by his superiors? To many it would be worse than death. Now he is nothing but an anxious father, pleading with the Master for the life of his boy.

Aristocratic people are very proud. Only recently a young bride of the imperial house of Austria had to renounce her rank before she was allowed to marry her lover, himself a nobleman, but not of royal blood. It is the boast of the German emperor that his house has not been defiled by just such marriages. Many a child has been disowned because he married beneath his rank; many a parent has said to his child: "I would rather see you dead than to have you dishonor the family with such a disgraceful marriage." Such sentiments have been uttered in cases where the persons born outside of royal circles were of spotless character, finished education, great refinement and beauty. Herod the king was very proud; this nobleman was one of his household. But he put all that pride away when he came to Jesus. We must humble ourselves before God. If we come proud, like the Pharisee, boasting of the good works we have done, we will not be heard. If we come like the rich young ruler, conceited as he, stating, "All these things have I kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?" or if we come to Jesus in the haughty spirit of Pilate and Herod, we shall plead in vain; the Lord will surely work no sign. But if we come in the spirit of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner"; if we come in the spirit of Paul, who said, "I am not worthy to be called an apostle, I am sold under sin"; if we are as humble as John the Baptist, who did not think himself worthy to loosen the strings of the Master's shoes; if we are like Peter, who said, when he beheld the miraculous catch of fish, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord," then and only then will Christ hear us. God spoke to Moses only after he had removed his shoes. God answered Samuel's prayers because he was humble. When Solomon styled himself God's servant and said of himself that he was but a little child, then God was pleased. Those who boast of their good works and are proud of them will ask in vain. Pride is foolish. God scorns the proud. Pride was the cause of the fall of man. How can such expect to be heard of God? Every one that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. It is only the humble whose prayers God answers.

Continuing in Prayer

We see also of the nobleman that he kept on in prayer. There he knelt in the dust before the Lord, with his hands lifted up, begging, with tears in his eyes: "O Master, come down and heal my son, for he is at the point of death." Jesus knew that the father was speaking the truth, but he did not go according to his wish. He tarried and said, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." This must have been a terrible experience for the poor father. It seemed as if the Lord did not want to help, and as if he were angry at the request. But the father did not give up; he did not run away; he was not sorry that he had humbled himself in the presence of all the people. No, he would continue to pray. And he did. He said, "Sir, come down ere my child die." Ah, there it is. We must not get tired and discouraged. If those Jews in Elijah's time who prayed to Baal from morning until evening in vain were not discouraged, then certainly we should not be, but should keep on in our petitions. The Jews in Egypt cried to God for deliverance year after year. Instead of being delivered, matters grew worse, but they continued, believing God's promise. The Canaanite woman kept on right along, although Christ paid no attention to her and discouraged her. God is able to do all; and the promise is to us that he will hear us. Therefore, keep on in prayer as long as you dare. But let us not be obstinate. If Christ prayed, "Father, not my will but thine be done," then it certainly behooves us to pray in that same spirit. Paul prayed to be delivered of the thorn in the flesh. But when the Lord said, "My grace is sufficient for thee," then he stopped. Some one has said that we shall thank God more for the things he did not grant than for those he gave us. Beloved, continue to pray as long as you dare. But never forget to follow Christ, who put his Father's will above his own.

Then, the nobleman had faith. The man had humbled himself: he had not been discouraged; he was indeed worthy to receive the grace of Jesus. Jesus said unto him, "Go thy way; thy son liveth!" The man believed his statement, and without a word he turned about. All his anxiety had gc he was in no special hurry to get back home. needed rest from his trip, and now was the tim get it. I believe he did this, as the word "yes day" is used in one of the following verses. son is well.

"Because of Your Unbelief"

His wife knows of her husband's anxiety. must get the news to him as soon as possible t the fever has left the boy and that he is well. sends the servants to Cana to bring the good n to her husband. They hurry on. The father them in the distance. What news do they bri As soon as they get sight of him they gesticul What can it mean? But he is not afraid. Ch had said, "Thy son liveth." As soon as the vants were within speaking distance they cr "Thy son liveth." They were astonished at tl master's passiveness. Can it be possible that does not believe them? Were his feelings chill But they would soon find out their mistake. inquired of them, "At what hour did he begir amend?" And they said unto him, "Yesterday the seventh hour the fever left him." Yes, t was the very hour the Lord had said to him, thy way; thy son liveth." He believed, theref he was helped. Unless we believe, Christ will help. All those that Jesus ever helped, believ "Thy faith has saved thee," is a phrase one reac number of times. Without faith it is impossi to please God. Surely God will help no one whom he is not well pleased.

A woman lived on the farther side of a hill on road to town. To get to town she had to fol the road around the hill or climb a pathway o it. It would have been much nicer if the hill w out of the way. She had heard that the Bible sa "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to y der place, and it shall remove." She thought would try it. If it wouldn't do any good, certai it wouldn't do any harm. So before she retir she asked the Lord to remove the hill. The f thing she did the next morning was to peep out the window to see how things were, and lo! the was at the same old place. Then she turned said, "I knew it would be there yet." Anybo who prays with such a spirit as this need ne expect any answer. Pray with the spirit of t little girl who came to prayer-meeting with a la umbrella; when she was asked what she wan with it since the sun was pouring down his ra she answered: "Why, are we not going to pray good Lord to send us rain?" Noah believed G that a flood would come. Abraham believed G that a son would be born to him. Let us also lieve that God is not only willing but also able help, and that with him nothing is impossible.

One of the Ten

Then we see that this nobleman glorified G When he came home he found his wife, his boy, servants waiting for him. His wife said: "Th of it, dear husband; our boy was delirious, thre ing himself around; his face was flushed. S denly he changed color and called for me. It around the seventh hour. I sent the servants bring you the news." Then the husband sa "Yes, my beloved; it was just at that hour wh the blessed Lord said to me, 'Go thy way; thy liveth!' The Lord be praised, the Lord be praise And he praised God; then his wife began, and boy and the servants all joined in. Jesus is w pleased when we thank him. Notice how kindly spoke to the healed leper, who returned to offer h thanks, and how sorry he was that he was the o one of the ten. Many are like these nine; they to him in time of need but forget him when h has come. In case of sickness people pay the d tor's bill, the druggist and the nurse; that is go But we should on no account forget the Lord. the people would do more of this, praising God word and deed, I believe that they would profit. our prayers are not granted, if the works are done to-day as they were in the time of Christ the apostles, it is we who are at fault. As to Lord, let us remember, "He is the same yesterd to-day and forever." His promises are for us j as much as they were for those who lived on ea when they were spoken.

The "Handful Offering"

A PRETTY custom is the "handful thank-offering" initiated in the Girls' High School, Atlanta, Ga., some rs ago by the then principal, Miss geant, now Mrs. Fountain Rice. went to each class-room, suggest- that any girl wishing to express reciation of her own blessings of past year might bring to the ol a "handful" of something for very poor. This limitation was le so that the offering might not den any giver or her parents. The cipal also wished to teach the e of co-operation; to have her lars see how much good could be mplished by many working to- her, each doing a little. The girls d tables in the hallway of the ol on which to place packages, no e to be attached. Any girl find- it inconvenient to bring an article od might contribute a penny or

Thus, the offering meant ble duty on the part of the girl and own self-giving. Their "handful" ring made them very happy. If same plan were adopted by the ol children of New York at Christ- time and their gifts distributed ugh the Bowery Mission, what a sing it would mean to many poor ilies!

THE UNKINDNESS OF IDOLS

PEOPLE are constantly getting the wrong angle and emphasis in considering the commands of God. We forget that the real point of every command is, not that God shall gratify himself, but that his creatures shall get what they need. God warns us from evil because it will hurt us, and woos us to good because it will make us eternally glad. "God is love." That is the real explanation of every law.

Take the commands about idolatry, voiced from Sinai in the words, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," and echoed constantly through the Scriptures until John the Beloved Disciple wrote pleadingly, with age-stricken hand, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols." Why does not God want us to worship any other than himself? The reason given chiefly in the Old Testament was that he is a jealous God, and this is true. Intense jealousy is the companion of intense love. God loves us so much that he cannot bear to have us forsake him. And, dealing with the childish, primitive tribes of his chosen people, he must make them understand, first of all, that they must not forsake him because it is dangerous to do so. Yet even that is love. He wants his people now, as he wanted his people then, to keep themselves from other gods because the other gods will use them badly.

HEAR the thunders of the prophets against the worship of Moloch. Why did not God want his people to put their children in the fire in accordance with this grim ritual? Why? In the Old Testament we might have to search for the real reason. We can find it there; but in the New Testament we find it without searching. Was it not because he loved the little children? He did not want them to be burned up; he wanted them to live and laugh. He did not want the mother-arms emptied, the mother heart broken. "Don't put your children in the fire," he was pleading. "Keep them in your arms and teach them that I am kind."

Why did not John the Beloved Disciple want his younger companions in Christ to divide their affections between the Saviour and the world? Because he knew the world would disappoint them in the end. Riches? Poor solace at death. Honor? Pleasant enough, but a transient thing. "Keep yourselves from idols," he was saying, "because they will fail you. They cannot really comfort or protect you; God can."

We must not love any one more than we love God; we must not love any one so much as we love him. Why? Because when he is second or third all life is topsy-turvy. Because when he is second or third we do not get the most out of our very love for the others, and they do not get the most from us. No man ever loved his child or his wife less by making God first in his affections. To put him first makes us love every one, the near and the distant, more than we ever loved them before. Their love blesses and enriches our life then as it never could before we made him our heart's closest and fondest companion. And our love blesses them as it never could if we did not love him most of all.

ONE time a Christian woman was seeking a deeper religious experience. The evangelist conducting the altar service tried to tell her about consecration. She must give up all, he said, to God. But she told him of a little child at home. She loved that child more than she loved God. She could not bring herself to say that she was willing to give the baby to God if he should ask her to. The evangelist, in perplexity, asked his wife to come and try to guide the seeker. With womanly tact she got her to tell again the puzzle that was keeping her from a perfect surrender.

"But," said the evangelist's wife, "God doesn't want to kill your baby. He knows all about babies. He knows how to take care of them. He loves your child more than you can possibly love her. Won't you trust her to him?"

And the mother said yes. Of course the trouble vanished then, and there came a deep, strange, new peace into the woman's heart. Some time after that her baby became very ill. For days and nights its life hung in the balance. One night, after long watching, the doctor came from the child's bedside and took the mother into another room.

"Your baby will get well," he said. "This was the crisis night, and the crisis is passed. And now I want to tell you why it has passed safely."

She listened eagerly.

"You know," the doctor went on, "that the atmosphere of a home and of a sick-room has a great deal to do with a patient's recovery. Now, there has been a strange serenity about you all these days and nights while I have been fighting for your baby's life. You weren't nervous, or restless, or frightened. Some way there seemed to be peace all through the house. It was around the baby's bed all the time. And it saved her life."

God knew best. To put him first makes everything come right.

WE DO not often think of doubt as a form of idolatry, but in reality it is that. What is doubt? It is trusting or worshiping something else more than we trust and worship God. Doubt is not merely a negative thing; it is positive. The man who doubts is fixing his attention on some argument, or some object, some book, some person, some undefined mental misgiving, any one of a hundred wretched substitutes for God. "O Lord of hosts," cried the Psalmist, "happy is the man that trusteth in THEE." And only as we turn our eyes off from the things and the thoughts that produce doubt and fix them on the eternal God are we really worshiping him. To stop short of that is idolatry. And God longs that we shall not do so, because to stop short of him is to stop short of happiness. "Thou hast made us for thyself, O God," said Augustine, "and our hearts are restless till they rest in thee."

Often in our very efforts to be good we get into a sort of idolatrous bondage. We have vague and stern ideas about duty; troublesome convictions about self-abnegation; queer, mysterious, difficult fancies about guidance. We must beware. Through such gloom and under such bondage walk those who worship the wraiths of pagan deities. Not that kind of a God is ours; not such is the pathway trod by those whose fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. He asks us to give up nothing that is good. He "giveth us richly all things to enjoy." But he knows we can enjoy them to the full only as we are worshiping him loyally and loving him ardently. It is for our safety, our comfort, our strength, our success, our joy that he urges: "Keep yourselves from idols."

THE DEVIL'S MIRTH

WHEN the lights are shaded and glowing,
And the gold and diamonds shine;
When the dancing feet are slowing
'Neath the weight of the foaming wine,
Then the people toil in the dark and cold
(For they have no time to grieve):
'Tis the same sad story, never old;
And the devil laughs in his sleeve.

When the snow is drifting in crystals gay,
That fall on velvet and fur;
In the light of lamps that mark the way
Through the night's dark, gloomy blur,
There are other streets where people sigh,
That are dusky and round about;
Where the women faint and the children die,
While the devil's laugh rings out.

For the devil laughs at sorrow,
And the devil smiles at woe;
When there can be no to-morrow,
And there is no place to go.
Ah, if there is heaven o'er us
(And we know that it is on high),
Will the good Lord look down for us,
And hark to his children's cry?

Bring Out Your Best

IT IS said that when Longfellow was at Harvard, he gave as a motto to his pupils, "Live up to the best there is in you." The counsel was worthy of the man, and enforced by his own noble life. The best in us is not the physical; the highest to which we can attain is not material good. Though these be so perfected as to leave nothing of the sort to be desired, yet if the spiritual functions be undeveloped, the spiritual potencies unenthroned, the real man, after all, does not come to the surface.

In the memorial chapel in Florence commemorating the family of the Medici are two sitting statues, and beneath each of them an allegorical group by Michael Angelo. The statues are of two of the later members of the family, Lorenzo and William. In one of the groups, representing Day and Night, is the recumbent figure of a man in which Angelo's art as a sculptor is seen at its best. The perfection of this figure in grace and strength and beauty of proportion is the admiration of all beholders. But it is strangely unfinished. Where the head should be, one sees only a rough, cubical block of marble with no semblance of a human countenance. Referring to "that ugly, shapeless mass, which should have been the crown and glory of the sculptured form, otherwise faultless in every line," a famous speaker said that he read in the figure an allegory other than the artist intended. It seemed to tell the story of many a human life in which the beautiful design of the Creator has been forever marred by the subjection of the higher to the lower nature. On every side we may see splendid animals called men, who appear to have in them now no more of the image of God than if their origin dated from the morning of the sixth day of creation, instead of the evening thereof. They seem to have divorced the "living soul" which God breathed into the human form when he made it a little lower than himself, crowning it with glory and honor and setting it over all the works of his hands. They live for the flesh and for the day. They eat and drink, labor and play, compete with one another and devour one another in the struggle for wealth or place; they seek to gratify all appetites and all ambitions, and when all is done, even when the highest success has been attained, what is the result but a mockery of manhood? To attain the full stature of man as the Creator meant we should, we must strive to bring out the best there is in us. Set yourself no lower standard. Be satisfied with nothing less.

The Long Line of Turkish Refugees from Mustapha Pasha

WITH the deepening of winter throughout the Balkan Mountains the conditions against which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee is striving are becoming more and more aggravated. The continuation of the armistice has given the armies a chance for readjustment and to ship homeward all of the sick and wounded. This has relieved the stress at the front, but has increased the burden in the home towns and villages. Mr. Furnajieff, the chairman of the Relief Committee at Sofia, writes as follows:

"The wounded soldiers are filling the hospitals. Scores and hundreds are coming almost daily. As the interested public flocks to the railroad station to get a look at them one can hear sympathetic people give loud expression of their pity, not alone for the wounded, but for the loved ones at home, who are called upon to endure sore privations and sufferings as a direct result of the war.

"This afternoon I made a visit to one of the families in my parish. Their situation as a family is deplorable. The two sons upon whom rests the responsibility for the support of the family have both gone to war. The mother is so delicate that she can hardly help around the house; the father has been for months laid off because of a badly crippled foot; the two younger children, like all other children, are out of school, and the whole family eagerly looks for the scant earnings of one daughter, a private dressmaker, who is not sought after at this time because of the general depression of business. The situation is deplorable; but worst of all is that one of the sons has returned from the battlefield with a serious wound. God only knows what the end will be!

"On that same street, within a stone's throw, there is more suffering than I can express. An old woman, paralyzed, living alone in the room where her only son lived with her, passed day after day without food, or light, or fire. Her son has gone to the war, and she passes her days imagining his safe return, while night after night she dreams that he is numbered with the slain. Can THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers imagine the amount of joy a dollar would bring to her in supplying at least in part her bread and fuel?

"Next door to this house lives a widow with her mother of ninety-five years, and five small children. When I asked what this old mother of ninety-five needed most they told me a pair of stockings and shoes. She goes to the neighbors these cold and slushy days to warm her feet a little at their fire. This tells a sad story of privation. The income for the family was the rent of a room, but now that income has stopped, for the lodger, too, has gone to the war.

"Individual cases cannot do more than serve to illustrate the widespread poverty and misery that the war is creating. To-day I received from the commandant of the city a pass to all the hospitals. I am going to visit the poor homesick soldiers and write letters to their loved ones at home for them. They will want something to read, so I'll give them a tract or a part of the Gospels or a New Testament. But if they tell me, as I am sure they will, of children and wife left without provision, wood and clothes for the winter, what shall I say and do for them? Dear reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, can you instruct me what to do for them? This is not a case of 'tell,' but a case of 'give.' If I cannot give, I cannot benefit. With those contributions that have already come to us, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee is doing its best to purchase flour and wood and coal for the most needy as well as to furnish cheap, but warm, clothing."

Rev. Theo T. Holway, the American Board Missionary at Samokov, who is serving on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee, writing about the middle of November from his Bulgarian station, says:

"We rejoice that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has again, as so often in the past, come to the relief of the needy and the suffering. As to the need of this part of Europe now, and for some time to come, there can be no question. Even here in Bulgaria, where the foot of the invader has not trodden, there is already very much privation. Winter is at hand, and it is certain that the distress will continue long after the cessation of hostilities. The order for mobilization, issued September 30, met with an immediate and enthusiastic response. Within forty-eight hours all men subject to call, throughout the whole kingdom, left their work, and started to join the colors. The country was put under martial law. Banks and all other public institutions closed. Schools were shut up. Shops were abandoned. Salaries of government officials and employees (including those in telephone, telegraph and railroad services, schools and banks) ceased. Goods and provisions were requisitioned. Horses, buffaloes, oxen, carts and even donkeys were pressed into army service. Payments on debts were legally postponed for three months. Naturally all regular business came to a standstill. It is no light matter for nearly the whole male population between nineteen and forty-five to be taken suddenly out of their daily vocations. I myself know of several families where four, five and even six sons and the father have gone to the war. With wages cut off one can easily see the condition of those left at home.

"In the towns and cities official aid is being given. It is, however, far from sufficient; hence municipal help is given first to those whose wage-earners are in the army. But there are many more who are now deprived of the income they would ordinar get from work for their neighbors. This city, f instance, has about two thousand families; fo hundred of these families, whose wage-earners a at the front, are being helped by the city. It estimated, however, that such help will amount only about $7.50 each. There are still about t hundred families who have no bread-winners in t army, but who are still in great need owing to la of work, sickness, etc.

"So far no statistics have been allowed to be pu lished as to Bulgarian losses. But it is quite certa that our loss in killed and wounded must be ve great. Hundreds of Bulgarian homes have be bereaved; to thousands more the bread-winners w return crippled or ill.

"If there is much need here, Macedonia a Thrace—all of European Turkey—will have vast greater need. The action of the allied forces h been admirable so far as we can learn. No pilla ing has been allowed. But an army must be fe Often it tramples over fields, ruining the crops. consumes the stores on hand. It requisitions f future needs whatever it can obtain. Sometimes sweeps the country clean of stock, etc., etc. Ar unfortunately, there have been many men ma sacred by the Turks, many villages burned, ma places devastated. Many more have fled from the villages, disbelieving the sincere Bulgarian sta ments that they will be guaranteed security of li and property under Christian rule. Many more a sick and weak through exposure and hunger.

"One of our friends has just returned from t Djumáa Balá district, where he saw two Christi villages absolutely deserted—no living thing them except two kittens. The houses had be stripped. Another village had been burned to t ground. He also saw a Turkish village which h been deserted by its owners, in which, however, t 'furniture' remained. To the latter Servian v lagers had come from their own plundered home and also some Bulgarians from the above burn village. Hundreds of refugees, who fled to t mountains or who crossed the frontier into Serv and Bulgaria, are now returning to their devastat homes, and are in great need of help."

Mr. M. N. Popoff, whose accounts of the progre of evangelical work in Bulgaria have often a peared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sends us the f lowing incidents of the war:

"It is well known that in many places the Turk fled at the approach of the Bulgarian army. Suc was the case at Mustapha Pasha. There was suc a panic among the Turks that in their flight mothe left their children. Our soldiers along with th dead and wounded had to gather the crying babie any a Bulgarian soldier considered it his duty to nd home a Turkish baby to be taken care of when discovered that its mother had abandoned it d could not be found. A cavalry lieutenant from fia added the other day to his family of six chil- en a seventh one—a Turkish baby girl. His horse ddenly shied, and the rider saw on the ground e baby, and jumped off to take it. Just at that oment a shell fell on the saddle of the horse. The aby saved the man's life. He left it in the care of Bulgarian woman in the city, and when after the ttle he could not discover its mother, he sent it to a wife to care for as one of her own.

"When King Ferdinand met the first wounded om the battlefield and decorated them, one turned him and said: 'As soon as I am well I will be back gain in the fight.' An elderly man was insisting being permitted to go as a soldier, but was re- sed on account of his age. Asked why he insisted much to enlist, he said: 'I want a cross either on y breast [a decoration] or on my grave.' With st such spirit all the allied armies have under- ken this war for the liberation of the oppressed."

The remittances which have gone during the last w weeks to the Relief Committee in Sofia have ached their destination safely and promptly rough the kindly agencies of Messrs. Cook & on, the world-famed travel experts. The trans- tlantic cable companies have an established rule at all messages authorizing the transfer of oney shall be sent in the words of a special code.

Under ordinary circumstances this works splendidly, but the Bulgarian Government, to safeguard its military secrets, has forbidden the despatch or receipt of any code messages. It looked for a time as if the remittances of our Relief Fund would have to go by the much slower method of the mails. Then it was learned that through the tourist agency the money could be sent by cable without running counter to the Bulgarian Government's ruling.

One thousand dollars more were sent this week, through the Cook agencies, for the relief of the sufferers.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

ie river side, which is beautiful now as in the days hen Paul met Lydia of Thyatira and the other omen beside its banks, in "the place where prayer as wont to be made."

Beyond this river, the Zygactes, to the south tretches a great level plain often flooded in the inter time and only partially capable of cultiva- ion on this account. Beyond the plain rises a triking mountain which the proprietor of the khan old us was called Bounar Dagh or the Mountain f Fountains. Indeed, this whole region might be alled the Plain of the Springs.

So long has Philippi been used as a quarry by he villagers and the tombstone seekers in all that egion that little is left to mark the site of the once amous Roman colony. The one exception to this tatement is a striking ruin, supposed to be the alace of the governor of Philippi, near which it is hought by some was the prison of St. Paul. All his, however, is mere conjecture. Yet this must ave been some building of marked importance, as shown by the enormous stones used in its construction; so huge that the iconoclasts who have arried off the rest of Philippi were evidently aunted at the thought of their removal.

Some of these stones that I measured were welve feet in length and four feet thick. Here, oo, are several great springing arches with fine rnamentation visible in many places. This one uin gives the traveler some faint idea of what the ity of Philippi must have been in Paul's time. It as the "first city of the province," as the Bible ells us. After the great battle to which we have lluded, Octavius made it a Roman colony, and any of his veterans were established there. Streets and houses crowded up the slope from the lain to the top of the hill," we are told, "which as crowned by a huge dark castle. Stone walls f great thickness went all around to protect the ity from attack."

We need not dwell long upon the familiar story f St. Paul in Philippi. There was no Jewish synagogue in the city, and so he went to the Proseucha, the Jewish place of prayer by the river bank. Here he found Lydia, who had come from far-away Thyatira, a long journey in those days. She was probably a widow of business ability, and doubtless of some considerable property, since she dealt in the finest of wares, and to carry her stock in trade must have required some capital. The madder root from which the so-called purple Thyatira dye was made still grows abundantly in the neighborhood of Lydia's own city, and I was able, after leaving Philippi, when visiting Thyatira, to obtain some of the dye root such as colored Lydia's cloths.

But Lydia was not the only godly woman who lived in Philippi. Euodia and Syntyche were also in that little group. It is worth while to note the exceedingly quiet, simple beginning of Gospel work in Europe. Four men from Asia and a few open-hearted women apparently made up the whole of that first congregation of believers. Thus begins every great reform; every far-reaching movement in the religious world.

But the Gospel was not to have free course in Philippi. A poor slave girl, who had the powers of a ventriloquist, and, because of that, impressed the people with the belief that she had miraculous gifts of divination, heard Paul and cried out, "These men are the servants of the most high God!" Thus she continued to cry day after day until rebuked by Paul.

It is thought by some that she then lost her power as a ventriloquist, or else failed to use them to impose upon the people, and thus was no longer of value to her masters. They raised a riot. The Christians were accused of disturbing the peace of the city and teaching unpatriotic truths. They were beaten and thrown into prison, but their undaunted spirits could not be quelled. In the long, weary night, when perhaps their bruised bodies prevented them from sleeping, they prayed and sang the hymns of Zion. We do not know what they sang, but very likely this Psalm of David's: "O let the sorrowful sighing of the prisoners come before thee; according to the greatness of thy power preserve those that are appointed to die." "The Lord helpeth them to right that suffer wrong; the Lord looseth men out of prison; the Lord careth for the righteous."

If this was the Psalm it was a prophecy as well as a song, for very soon the Lord did loose the prisoners, and, through the great earthquake that shock the prison walls and opened the prison doors, Paul and Silas were released. Through the same marvelous circumstance the jailer and his family were led to accept the apostles' teaching and be baptized, and the prætors of the city, learning now that their prisoners were Roman citizens, and that in beating them without a trial they had laid themselves liable to severe punishment, came to the prison and humbly begged Paul and Silas to leave the city. This they could not or would not do at once, but going to the house of the faithful Lydia they abode for some days longer, before pursuing their journey to Thessalonica.

During these days was laid the foundation of the most beloved of all Paul's churches, the one to which he wrote his most affectionate epistle; the church of which he could say: "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you, always, in every prayer of mine for you all, making request with joy, for your fellowship in the Gospel from the first day until now." He tells them that they "shine as lights in the world in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation." He praises them for their liberality, as the only church that had "communicated with him as concerning giving and receiving"; the church that had "sent once and again to his necessities."

We can imagine that the aged prisoner in the Roman dungeon, as he wrote to the beloved Christians of this church, with unusual emphasis and joy closed his letter with the gracious words: "My God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus. . . . The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."

Responsibility of Wealth

LORD BACON called wealth "the baggage of virtue," the impedimenta which, though the owner would not willingly spare it, he can leave behind when it hinders his progress. Great riches have little real use except in the distribution. A wiser than Bacon asked concerning riches: "What hath the owner thereof save the beholding of it with his eyes?" Wealth to-day is the goal of a very large part of the human race; the making of money is the objective point of their existence. A few days ago, a young man in New York attained his majority and became the possessor of $100,000,000 inherited from his father. With one of the vastest of fortunes at command, he also has a correspondingly vast responsibility. He can buy and sell, speculate and invest, and with such resources at hand he can in a few years possibly double his inheritance. On the other hand, if he regard his wealth as a sacred trust, he may be the means of doing infinite good with it even if he does not increase it. In the hands of a man or woman of enlightened and noble mind, wealth becomes a public benefaction. There is misery in the world to be relieved, education to be promoted and many good causes that call for material encouragement. If the possessor of wealth have in him the spirit of Christ, he can make his life a blessing. He can become a benefactor to multitudes, a strong helper in all worthy enterprises, and the world will be the better for his having lived.

Great wealth has its perils and not the least among them is that, in shallow minds, possession breeds selfishness and incapacity, takes away the desire for worthy achievement and makes the owner the servant instead of the master of his fortune. To many it is simply a means of gratification and indulgence, instead of being the key to a career of usefulness. Not money itself, but the love of it, is "the root of all evil," and the relation between wealth and the mind and character of its possessor determines whether in his case it is an evil or the reverse. The young man whose "great possessions" drew him away from Christ was a type of the selfish rich, who cannot distinguish between affluence and character. Let us so use the means at our disposal that when we come to give an account of our stewardship we may be found worthy of commendation instead of condemnation.

A Defender of Lynch Law

GOVERNOR BLEASE of South Carolina is an outspoken executive. He served notice on the Governor's Congress at Richmond, Va., a few days ago that there would be no punishment of lynchers of negro assailants of white women in his State, with his approval at least; in other words, that lynching under such conditions would be considered no crime in South Carolina. This is a bad precedent and one which fortunately is not shared by the executive of any other State as far as heard from. Law should be supreme, and for a governor to contend that lynching, even for a heinous offense, is not a crime is an open encouragement of lawlessness. Such sentiments from the lips of an executive are equivalent to a surrender of the judicial functions to the hands of any mob that might be gathered in a time of excitement, and which might wreak its vengeance upon the innocent as well as the guilty. It is putting into the hands of the mob the power which belongs exclusively to the courts, and for the exercise of which they are created. From the standpoint of the sentimentalist the governor may be right; but as the legal executive of a sovereign State, he is altogether wrong in encouraging the people to ignore the regularly constituted channels by which alone the guilt or innocence of any accused may safely be decided.

Privileged Criminals

THAT the possession of wealth and influential friends can often be depended upon to save a criminal from many of the discomforts attaching to his crime, is again illustrated in the case of Charles F. Hyde, former Chamberlain of the City of New York, who was lately convicted of bribery while in office and committed to the Tombs awaiting sentence. Hyde was lodged in comparative luxury in the warden's quarters of the prison, surrounded by comforts which the ordinary inmate of a cell could not hope to enjoy. His case will probably lead to a searching investigation of the management of the city prison. This is not the first occasion in which the Tombs authorities have been persuaded to make imprisonment less of a hardship for a favored class of criminals than the law directs. Even rich convicts should be made to know that the Tombs is a prison, and not a fashionable hotel. It is the old story, which makes jail mean one thing for the poor and another thing for the rich. An enormous amount of money is said to have been expended in the effort to save Hyde, and attempts will be made to delay as long as possible his ultimate sentence and commitment to State prison. Meanwhile, his brief enjoyment of the "suite de luxe" in the Tombs will probably bring about an official shake-up, with the introduction of rules that will compel wardens to deal with law-breakers on an equal basis.

Our Balkan Relief Fund at Work

LETTERS from our relief committee in the Balkans, written from Sofia and Samokov, give pathetic accounts of the suffering caused by the war. Many thousands are starving and destitute. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week cabled a fourth remittance ($1,000) to the Committee, which is doing excellent work. Our contributors have the satisfaction of knowing that their gifts, undiminished, are already being converted into the necessaries of life for many poor families, and are also being applied to the comfort of the wounded. There is no distinction of race or creed in this Christlike benevolence. We are glad that the generosity of our people is so deeply stirred in behalf of these poor sufferers, a great proportion of whom are innocent victims of the war. We trust that the responses to our appeal will be so prompt and generous that we can send a good-sized weekly remittance to Pastor Furnajieff and his associates, to speed the good work with all haste. A gift now may save a life; a few weeks hence it may be too late. Remember, "He that gives quickly gives twice." Every contribution will be acknowledged.

The Rise of the Farmer

IN THE annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture, just issued, there are many points from which the farmer as well as the great body of consumers may draw encouragement. This has been the most productive agricultural year in the history of the country. "The men behind the plow," writes the secretary, "have filled the nation's larder and crammed the storehouses, and will send liberal supplies to foreign countries. Farm prices generally are more profitable than before; during the last sixteen years the wealth production of farms has increased 141 per cent. Increased production of crops is the greatest aid toward the reduced cost of living." To the training afforded by agricultural colleges and experiment stations and the wider publicity given in agricultural literature these improved conditions are largely attributable, and the output will continue to increase as practical ways and means become better understood by the farmer. Only a few years ago, intensive agriculture was a novelty. Dry land problems are now being solved in a practical way. Disease in the fields is more successfully combated than before. "Taking care of the soil," the secretary declares, "is the first consideration in the conservation of our resources." In the work of the department over 130,000 farmer correspondents have contributed much enlightening information concerning conditions of production. Three thousand country bankers have also materially aided in showing the financial status of the average farmer. Seventy-seven per cent. of the farm owners and 46 per cent. of the tenants are reported as men of substantial means. That the tiller of the soil has kept pace with the progress in all lines of industry is made clear from the record which Secretary Wilson sums up as follows: Sixteen years ago there was an annual farm production worth $4.000,000,000, which has now grown to $9,532,000,000. There has been an uplift of agriculture and of country life. The farmer is a national factor of growing importance. He is coming into his own.

Why Not?

The wealth of the city is not in its buildings, not in its banks but in the boys and girls, and the ideals in their lives. These ideals are the things that we neglect most.

THIS is not a paragraph from a sermon, but the expressive language used by the First Assistant District Attorney of New York City in an address recently delivered before a gathering of professional men, who cheered it to the echo. Then the speaker, Mr. Frank Moss, proceeded to say:

> The grist of the mills of the seven courts in the Criminal Courts Building is boys and lads. A recent grand jury investigation declared that the city is full of gangs of boys. These gangs are not handled by the blue-coated men in the Police Department or touched by the detectives, but are allowed to grow up to produce a great mass of criminals willing to do anything.

His remedy? A mayor, with a heart full of love for the children; good men with ideals as heads of every city department; honest officials, whose public life and conduct would be a living example and an inspiration; every branch of the city government so conducted that the environment of childhood and youth would be bettered, instead of being totally neglected as now; and finally, the introduction of a system which would bring the young into personal contact with those whose duty it should be to love and care for them, to awaken in them true manly ideals of life and to instil a proper horror of lawlessness and crime. "Is such a condition of things attainable?" some will ask. Well, it is surely worth the experiment.

It tells you about all the strange customs and beliefs of the South Sea Islanders, tracing many of them back to Hebrew ancestry and the days of King Solomon. The first edition of these books is now being rapidly distributed. We need hardly add that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC FOR 1913 is sent free to every subscriber, old or renewal, whether with or without premium.

—A SPECIAL MESSAGE to Congress, sent in by President Taft on December 3, makes an elaborate explanation of our foreign policy, which has resulted in the recognition of this country as a "peer in the great concourse of nations." In describing the country's commercial progress, the President says our policy has been to substitute "dollars for bullets"—which has at least the merit of frankness. The message reviews the various successful efforts for peace on the part of our government, especially in South American countries. In closing, it refers to the approaching completion of the Panama Canal as an event which will "mark a new era in our international life," and establish conditions for which we must prepare ourselves.

Medals to Army Officers

The Medal of Honor

PRESIDENT TAFT decorated with medals five officers of the United States army at the White House on November 23. The decoration was a coveted medal bestowed upon the men for conspicuous bravery. This medal has been given to but few men in the army, and there are perhaps not more than thirty-five men in active service who have received it. All five of the officers were summoned from their posts in the Far West to receive the decoration. Captain Julian Gaujot of the First Cavalry received the medal for going alone under fire into the federal garrison at Douglas and persuading the remnant of the Mexican Government forces to surrender to him before they were all killed by the insurgents. Captain Archie Miller, Lieutenant Arthur H. Wilson, Lieutenant John T. Kennedy and Quartermaster Sergeant Joseph Henderson, all of the Sixth Cavalry, were given the medal of honor for the capture of a famous Moro pearl pirate who intrenched himself on a rocky island in the Malay Archipelago. England has the Victoria Cross, more highly prized than any honor in the British service. It is bestowed for the risking of life for another in action, the risk being by fire, flood, bullet or weapon of steel. Germany, France, Russia, and other nations have similar decorations for conspicuous bravery. We have a splendid army and navy of intelligent, loyal and brave men. They are the pride and boast of the people whose government they defend. The nation congratulates the five officers who received the medal for their conspicuous courage. There is very great need of courage upon the part of the soldiers of the cross. The moral evils are so large and strong, they are so insolent and aggressive, they are so malicious and destructive that it behooves every officer and soldier in the army of the Lord to fight, and fight bravely and desperately, to save the young and the old from moral and spiritual destruction. And the Ruler has a decoration ready to bestow upon such bravery. Such bravery and its reward are recorded by the great hero:

I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day. (II. Tim. 4:7, 8.)

Cost of Living Compared

IN THESE days of well-nigh universal complaint at the high cost of living, it is interesting to read the letter of an optimist to one of the daily papers claiming that the price of living in 1872, a number of years after the Civil War, was greater than it is now. "I have lived some seventy years and my memory is good. I quote you some figures taken from 1872, and apply them to the same articles of to-day. On the same day in 1872 I paid as follows: For three tons of coal, $48; one barrel of flour, $16.25; two bushels of potatoes, $5.50. In the same month I paid as follows: For one pair of shoes, $5.50; one felt hat, $4; one suit of not all-wool clothes, $35; one quarter (front) of beef, 150 pounds, at 14 cents, $21; one pig, 175 pounds, at 12 cents, $21; total, $156.25. The same cost to-day: Three tons of coal, $18; one barrel of flour, $6.25; two bushels of potatoes, $1.60; same quantity of front quarter of beef, at 12 cents, $18; same quantity of pork, at 9 cents, $15.75; one pair of better shoes, $4; one hat of better quality, $2.25; one suit of better quality and make, $24; total, $89.85. In favor of to-day, $66.40." Whatever may have been the cost of living in inflated periods of the past, it is ever so much too high now, and it will be worth while for the statesmen, the philanthropist, the reformer, to seek carefully the cause and undertake a remedy. It must not be forgotten that the utilization of the waste from the appetites and armaments alone would contribute immensely to the nation's material wealth and happiness. The cost of living in Samaria was thus explained:

And the people went out, and spoiled the tents of the Syrians. So a measure of fine flour was sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, according to the word of the Lord. (II. Kings 7: 16.)

Lungfish from Africa

A FISH that can live out of water for months, possibly for a year, has recently been added to the American Museum of Natural History. It came from Africa. The specimen is called a lungfish, because when out of water it inhales air as if it were a land animal, though when in the water it breathes through gills. The fish was received at the museum in a dormant condition coiled up in a cocoon, deeply sunken in a clod of earth which had been dug up from a dried-up river bottom in Africa. When received at the museum the cake of earth showed a little tunnel-like opening where the fish burrowed in the soft mud and through which later it secured its supply of air. As far as is known this is the second specimen of a lungfish ever brought to this country, and will be viewed with great interest by the many visitors to the museum. The variety of God's handiwork in the creation of fishes is illustrated in the prophet's description of the fishermen and their successful hauls:

Their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many. (Ezek. 47: 10.)

A Fitting Monument

THIRTY years ago Bishop and Mrs. Ridley undertook a most difficult and perilous task in a mission at the north of British Columbia. The burden fell largely on the shoulders of Mrs. Ridley. She so lived Christ among the Indians and miners that they almost worshiped her. And when after many years of service she died suddenly, the whole region for a hundred miles around was thrown into the deepest mourning. "Our mother gave her life for us," the natives said. "You now give her body to our keeping. Her grave will be holy. Now we have seen pure feet walking in the way. She kept all the commandments of God. We never saw it so before." At the northernmost point of British Columbia's seacoast there stands a white marble cross as a memorial of the Christly Mrs. Ridley, who gave her life to save others, and who emphasized the apostle's argument for martyrdom:

Because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. (I. John 3: 16.)

Typhoon Swept Philippine Islands

BY a telegram received at Washington it was learned that a terrible typhoon swept parts of the Philippine Islands late in November, causing an enormous loss of life. The figures of the dead have been placed as high as 15,000. The storm swept the Visayas, and is said to have practically destroyed Tacloban, the capital of Leyte, and to have wrought immense damage at Capiz, the capital of the province of Capiz. Tacloban has a population of 12,000, and Capiz of 20,000. The typhoon swept in a southerly direction, crossing the island of Leyte, going on to Panay and along the coast to Mindanao. Iloilo, where the damage is said to be greater, is one of the most fertile provinces of the Philippine Islands, with vast sugar and hemp plantations owned largely by natives, with a sprinkling of former American soldiers as land-owners. The Federal Government in the Philippines and at Washington has done all in its power to relieve the suffering and repair the damage. The people of America feel deeply for the sufferers from the terrible typhoon. There are storms in the air of the material and spiritual world. They are necessary for its purification. As with most other blessings, they carry their perils, which have to be guarded against. The storm is the expression of the Almighty Power. The prophet calls it so:

The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet. (Nah. 1:2.)

Dr. Eliot's Unsound Religion

DR. CHARLES W. ELIOT, president emeritus of Harvard, addressed the Unitarian ministers in Canning Hall, Boston, the other day, and has this to say on the kind of teaching he thought was needed in mission work in converting the heathen Chinese. He denied the teaching of the English prayer book, and the existence of hell he called a most horrible doctrine. He said: "You cannot go to these Chinese or Japanese with doctrines that are mere traditions. Take the doctrine of justification by faith, or the atonement, or the doctrine of the Trinity, etc. These are not acceptable to the Chinese or Japanese minds. They find more in Confucianism or Buddhism. But tell them that you believe in good works and that you do not accept the inferiority of women, and then they listen to you." Dr. Eliot is a man of fine character, and his opinion on many subjects would be of great value. But as a theologian he is no authority whatever. He must himself know that the cardinal doctrines he so glibly denied at the meeting in Boston are the ones that have built ninety one-hundredths of all the Christian churches in America and the world, have sent almost all the dear men and women to Gospel fields, and have redeemed almost all of the converts in heathen lands. To take the divinity and atonement of Christ out of the Bible and from the minister, the church, the mission, and the heathen convert would be to leave nothing worth while. Would the wise teacher offer the bum of the Bowery or the opium fiend of Canton good works, which he cannot perform without the divine life and love to regenerate him, or female suffrage as a remedy for his fatal spiritual malady? Or would the true minister offer the man with better dress and surroundings, whose heart before God is as black as the charred wrecks of appetite, cold morals and woman suffrage instead of a crucified Christ as a remedy? To take female suffrage and the doctrine of good works as a novelty to China, which has had no religion but good works for four thousand years, as a substitute for the heavenly Father's love in the gift of his Son on the cross would be simply ridiculous and a betrayal of a solemn trust as well. The missionaries on the ground are wise enough to minimize denominational differences, to present the live truths in terse, strong language rather than in involved theological formulas, but they have never been guilty of the folly or sin of denying the cardinal doctrines of their religion and bringing them down to the low levels of the morals of Confucianism, or of the equality of the sexes. A majority of the ministers and church members at home and in the foreign field believe the truth of the apostle's words:

Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved. (Acts 4: 12.)

POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Pollyanna, eleven years old, comes East to live with her aunt, Miss Polly Harrington, of Beldingsville, Vt. Miss Harrington is a lady of most unlovely and ungenerous character, though she believes herself to be a very good woman, and tries vigorously to do in every case what she believes to be her duty. She has consented to receive Pollyanna at the request of the Ladies' Aid Society of the small Western town where the child's father had been pastor of a poor mission church. Her mother had died some years earlier, her father but recently. The young wife had never received her family's forgiveness for marrying the poor minister. But now Miss Harrington consents to receive the little girl and directs her servant Nancy to prepare a small attic room for her. She wishes to put her at a distance from her own apartments and avoid the risk of her marring the valuable furnishings of any other room. Nancy is sent to the station to meet Pollyanna. From every fresh disappointment she rallies amazingly, always finding something to be glad about. She explains that this is a game which her father had taught her and played with her. Nancy agrees to try to play the game, too. Forbidden to open the window of her attic room because the fly screens had not arrived, Pollyanna goes out on the porch roof to sleep there. She is brought back by the alarmed household. Her aunt finds it difficult to punish her, for the punishment appears to Pollyanna to be a reward. Pollyanna takes jelly to bed-ridden Mrs. Snow, who always wants something different from what is sent, and wheedles her into having her hair dressed and her curtains raised. She also meets a mysterious silent Man and after a number of one-sided salutations makes him talk to her.

CHAPTER IX

A Surprise for Mrs. Snow

THE next time Pollyanna went to see Mrs. Snow, she found that lady, as at first, in a darkened room.

"It's the little girl from Miss Polly's, mother," announced Milly in a tired manner; then Pollyanna found herself alone with the invalid.

"Oh, it's you; is it?" asked a fretful voice from the bed. I remember you. Anybody'd remember you, I guess, if they saw you once. I wish you'd come yesterday. I wanted you yesterday."

"Did you? Well, I'm glad 'tisn't any farther away from yesterday than to-day is, then," laughed Pollyanna, advancing cheerily into the room, and setting her basket carefully down on a chair. "My! but aren't you dark here, though? I can't see you a bit," she cried, unhesitatingly crossing to the window and pulling up the shade. "I want to see if you've fixed your hair like I did—oh, you haven't!—but never mind; I'm glad you haven't, after all, 'cause maybe you'll let me do it—later. But now I want you to see what I've brought you."

The woman stirred restlessly.

"Just as if how it looks would make any difference in how it tastes," she scoffed. But she turned her eyes toward the basket. "Well, what is it?"

"Guess! What do you want?" Pollyanna had skipped back to the basket. Her face was alight.

The sick woman frowned.

"Why, I don't want anything, as I know of," she sighed. "After all, they all taste alike!"

Pollyanna chuckled.

"This won't. Guess! If you did want something, what would it be?"

The woman hesitated. She did not realize it herself, but she had so long been accustomed to wanting what she did not have, that to state offhand what she did want seemed impossible—until she knew what she had! Obviously, however, she must say something. This extraordinary child was waiting.

"Well, of course, there's lamb broth—"

"I've got it!" crowed Pollyanna.

"But that's what I didn't want," sighed the sick woman, sure now of what her stomach craved. "It was chicken that I wanted."

"Oh, I've got that, too," chuckled Pollyanna.

The woman turned in amazement.

"Both of them?" she demanded.

"Yes—and calf's-foot jelly," triumphed Pollyanna. "I was just bound you should have what you wanted for once; so Nancy and I fixed it. Oh, of course, there's only a little of each—but there's some of all of 'em. I'm so glad you did want chicken," she went on contentedly, as she lifted the three little bowls from her basket. "You see, I got to thinking on the way here—what if you should say tripe, or onions, or something like that, that I didn't have! Wouldn't it have been a shame—when I'd tried so hard," she laughed merrily. "How do you do today?" she finished in polite inquiry.

"Very poorly, thank you," murmured Mrs. Snow, falling back into her usual listless attitude. "I lost my nap this morning. Nellie Higgins next door has begun music lessons, and her practicing drives me nearly wild. She was at it all the morning—every minute! I'm sure, I don't know what I shall do!"

Pollyanna nodded sympathetically.

"I know. It is awful! Mrs. White had it once—one of my Ladies' Aiders, you know. She had rheumatic fever, too, at the same time, so she couldn't thrash 'round. She said 'twould have been easier if she could have. Can you?"

"Now you don't look as if you'd be glad even for calf's-foot jelly"

"Can I—what?"

"Thrash 'round—move, you know, so as to change your position when the music gets too hard to stand."

Mrs. Snow stared a little.

"Why, of course I can move—anywhere, in bed," she rejoined a little irritably.

"Well, you can be glad of that, then, anyhow; can't you?" nodded Pollyanna. "Mrs. White couldn't. You can't thrash when you have rheumatic fever—though you want to something awful, Mrs. White says. She told me afterwards she reckoned she'd have gone raving crazy if it hadn't been for Mr. White's sister's ears—being deaf, so."

"Sister's—ears? What do you mean?"

Pollyanna laughed.

"Well, you see, Miss White was deaf—awfully deaf; and they had such an awful time making her understand anything, that after that, every time the piano commenced to play across the street, Mrs. White felt so glad she could hear it, that she didn't mind so much that she did hear it, 'cause she couldn't help thinking how awful 'twould be if she couldn't hear anything, like her husband's sister. You see, she was playing the game, too. I'd told her about it."

"The—game?"

Pollyanna clapped her hands.

"There!—I 'most forgot; but I've thought it up, Mrs. Snow—what you can be glad about. It's this: I thought—how glad you could be—that other folks weren't like you—all sick in bed like this, you know," she announced impressively.

Mrs. Snow stared. Her eyes were angry.

"Well, really!" she ejaculated then, not quite agreeably.

"And now I'll tell you the game," proposed Pollyanna, blithely confident. "It'll be just lovely for you to play—it'll be so hard. And there's so much more fun when 'tis hard! You see, it's like this." And she began to tell of the missionary barrel, the crutches, and the doll that did not come.

The story was just finished when Milly appeared at the door.

"Your aunt is wanting you, Miss Pollyanna," she said, still in the tired voice she had spoken in before. "She telephoned down to the Harlows across the way. She says you're to hurry—that you've got some practicing to make up before dark."

Pollyanna rose reluctantly.

"All right," she sighed. "I'll hurry." Suddenly she laughed. "I suppose I ought to be glad I've got legs to hurry with; hadn't I, Mrs. Snow?"

There was no answer. Mrs. Snow's eyes were closed. But Milly, whose eyes were wide with surprise, saw that there were tears on the wasted cheeks.

"Good-by," flung Pollyanna over her shoulder, as she reached the door.

One by one the July days passed. To Pollyanna they were happy days, indeed. She often told her aunt, joyously, how very happy they were. Whereupon her aunt would usually reply, wearily:

"Very well, Pollyanna, I am gratified, of course, that they are happy; but I trust they are profitable as well—otherwise I should have failed signally in my duty."

Generally Pollyanna would answer this with a hug and a kiss—a proceeding that was still always most disconcerting to Miss Polly; but one day she spoke. It was during the sewing hour.

"It wouldn't be enough then, Aunt Polly, that they were just happy days?" she asked wistfully.

"Certainly not, Pollyanna."

"They must be pro-fi-ta-ble as well?"

"Of course."

"What is being pro-fi-ta-ble?"

"Why, it—it's just being profitable—having profit, something to show for it, Pollyanna. What an extraordinary child you are!"

"Then just being glad isn't pro-fi-ta-ble?" questioned Pollyanna, a little anxiously.

"Certainly not."

"Oh dear! Then you wouldn't like it, of course. I'm afraid, now, you won't ever play the game, Aunt Polly."

"Game? What game?"

"Why, that father—" Pollyanna clapped her hand to her lips. "N-nothing," she stammered.

Miss Polly frowned.

"That will do for this morning, Pollyanna," she said tersely. And the sewing lesson was over.

That afternoon Pollyanna, coming down from her attic room, met her aunt on the stairway.

TELLING IT OVER AGAIN*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

IT IS suggested by the International Sunday School Lesson Committee that all of the lessons for the quarter shall be considered in the Home Daily Bible Readings during the week before the Review. It is hoped that all CHRISTIAN HERALD homes will do this. Let it be done in the following order: Monday, Mark 6: 45-56, Jesus Walking on the Sea; Mark 7: 1-23, Clean and Unclean. Tuesday, Mark 7: 24-30, Matt. 8: 5-13, Mission to the Gentiles; Mark 7: 31, 8: 10, Wanderings in Decapolis. Wednesday, Mark 8: 11-26, The Sign of the Leaven; Hosea 7, Wickedness of the Wicked. Thursday, Mark 8: 27, 9: 1, The Great Question; Mark 9: 2-13, The Transfiguration. Friday, Mark 9: 14-29, The Lunatic Boy; Matt. 18: 1-14, The Child in the Midst. Saturday, Matt. 18: 18-35, Forgiveness; Luke 9: 49-62, For and Against Him.

On the Sunday previous to the Review, give to each scholar two or more of the following questions, typewritten if possible, telling him that he will be expected to give replies on Review Sunday.

First Lesson. On what sea did Jesus walk? From what mountain did he descend to walk on the sea? Show a sketch map of the mountain and the sea. Why did Jesus leave the mountain and come down upon the sea? How did Jesus still the tempest on the sea and in the hearts of his apostles? Where dd they land? What happened as soon as they were landed?

Second Lesson. Who were the Pharisees? What fault did they find with Jesus? By way of reproof to them from what prophet did Jesus quote, and what was the quotation?

Third Lesson. Show a sketch map of the region of Tyre and Sidon. What did a mother from Tyre ask Jesus to do? How did she prove her faith in Jesus? How did Jesus show his power to grant her request? What other sick person did Jesus cure by his word of power? Show a sketch map of Capernaum.

Fourth Lesson. Draw a sketch map of Decapolis. How did Jesus cure the deaf and dumb man in Decapolis? Why did Jesus request the man he had healed "to tell no man"? How did a multitude of people learn of it? How did Jesus feed the hungry multitude? Compare that with the feeding of the multitude at Bethsaida.

Fifth Lesson. How many blind men are described in this lesson? What did Jesus do to open the eyes of those who were blind in their understanding? What did Jesus do to the man who had two blind eyes? Show by a sketch map where this occurred.

Sixth Lesson. What effect did strong drink have upon the Jews and the Samaritans? By what prophets of God were they warned? Is the taking of strong drink a sin of our nation? Compare drunkenness and alcoholism. What is the only safe and sane course in regard to liquor?

Seventh Lesson. What were the opinions of different men about Christ? Who had the right opinion? Why did Peter have the right idea? Into what error did Peter fall?

Eighth Lesson. When did Moses and Elijah come back to earth from heaven? Where did they meet Jesus? Tell the names of the three men who saw the meeting. When Moses and Elijah had returned to heaven what did the three men say to Jesus? Why was their proposition unwise?

Ninth Lesson. When Peter, James and John had come down the mountain with Jesus, what wonderful thing did they see him do? How does Jesus help boys to-day?

Tenth Lesson. What pattern of goodness did Jesus give his apostles? What spirit did Jesus see in the little child to be taken as a pattern? Are all children like the one Jesus commended? Should all children try to be like that one? Whom has Jesus appointed to be the helpers of all children to make them good?

Eleventh Lesson. What was the rule of the apostle Peter in forgiving others? When he asked Jesus about that rule, what did Jesus say? Why did Jesus teach that there should be much forgiveness? How many persons can you count that you have not forgiven? What is the greatest number of times that you have ever forgiven any one?

Twelfth Lesson. What nation of people set themselves against Jesus and caused him to quit their land? How did the apostles of Jesus feel about it? Show a sketch map of Samaria. Why were the Samaritans opposed to Jesus? Tell of three would-be followers of Jesus. What did Jesus say to them to show that they really did not desire to follow him? What place must Jesus have in the hearts of his followers?

(NOTE.—The above questions might be asked in the family group on the days the lessons are read. It is suggested that there should be both a morning reading and an evening reading in order to cover the whole quarter's lessons.)

"Straightway Jesus spake unto them, saying, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." Matt. 14: 27.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE SHEPHERDS
From the painting by H. Lerolle

Speak low to me, my Saviour, low and sweet
From out the hallelujahs sweet and low,
Lest I should fear and fall, and miss thee so,
Who art not missed by any that entreat.
Speak to me as to Mary at thy feet!
And if no precious gums my hands bestow,
Let my tears drop like amber while I go
In reach of thy divinest voice complete
In humanest affection—thus, in sooth,
To lose the sense of losing; as a child,
Whose song-bird seeks the wood forevermore,
Is sung to in its stead by mother's mouth,
Till, sinking on her breast, love-reconciled,
He sleeps the faster that he wept before.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

"For the kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." Rom. 14: 17.

Glowing Souls. There is near Pottstown, Pa., a large surface deposit of dark stones covering several acres, called "ringing rocks." They have a metallic sound when struck with a hammer, which gives them their name. During a recent thunderstorm on a dark night, persons passing the rocks were startled to see a light bluish flame rise from the ground and spread over a space ten or twelve yards square. That flame rose and fell after the manner of the northern lights, lighting up the darkness around it. Some old residents in that neighborhood say that these strange lights are always seen on stormy nights. They explain that the rocks are so metallic in formation that they attract all the electricity in the atmosphere for miles around, and through some natural cause the electricity becomes luminous like a phosphorescent glow. Scientific men declare that the rocks are so highly charged with magnetism that any electric disturbance will cause the glow. It is possible for men and women to be so highly charged with the magnetism of the Holy Spirit that they will glow with a divine light, and will illumine the spiritual darkness of the world about them. It is possible for every one of us to live a luminous life like that.—Rev. Louis Albert Banks.

"Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." (John 6: 37.)

I have been enabled to commit my soul to him who says: "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out," and who is "able to save to the uttermost." These two texts have been as sheet anchors by which my soul has outrode many a storm when otherwise hope would have failed. "In no wise" takes in all characters, and "to the uttermost" goes many a league beyond all difficulties. I recommend these anchors; they are sure and steadfast.—John Newton.

"He hath done all things well; he maketh even the deaf to hear and the dumb to speak." (Mark 7: 37.)

Lippen is a beautiful Scotch word, well understood by the common people, and means "to trust implicitly in." Chalmers beautifully applied the word to the act of faith on a visit to a poor woman who was dying. He found her very ignorant, incapable of comprehending the most common terms. With all the earnestness of his nature, he pointed out to her the way of salvation, spoke of faith in the Lord Jesus, of belief, of confidence, of trust. But all was of no avail; no spark of intelligence responded to his words. At last, guided by the Spirit of God, he said in gentle tones: "Oh, woman! it is just to lippen to him." "Is that all?" said the dying woman. "That's all," said the minister. The word echoed in the woman's heart, and she died, believing in Jesus.

"Jesus spake unto them, saying, I am the light of the world," etc. (John 8: 12.)

"Jesus Christ is the light of the world in every sense in which that sentence can be interpreted, for every oil lamp, gas light, electric, acetylene, oxyhydric, or any other light except a tallow candle or a dish of oil with a wick floating therein has been made in a land with a Bible."—Saying of a Chinese gentleman, quoted in China's New Day, by Dr. Isaac T. Headland.

"Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong dink; that tarry late in the night, till wine inflame them." Isa. 5: 11.)

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—HERE IS THE best suggestion yet offered on the superintendent's hardest problem, holding the boys. The new book, Boys' Work in the Local Churches, which is volume V in the Messages of the Men and Religion Movement, tells us the best way to make a boys' class in the Sunday school stick till it is a men's class, is to take a gang of boys, already attached to each other, transplant them into the school and make the gang an organized class with the gang leader for president, and allow the class to become a patrol of Boy Scouts without ever ceasing to be a Sunday school class in the years when that form of action makes its strongest appeal; then somewhere from twelve to fifteen let the class be Knights of King Arthur, and from fifteen years up let the class be a Pilgrim Fraternity. Fads may come and fads may go, but the Boys' Organized Sunday School Class goes on forever, becoming in due time a men's class with the same teacher as before if he has kept on growing all the while. Without the connecting thread of the class the boys are apt to fall out when they outgrow the "Scouts" or "Knights." The whole book is packed with such wise suggestions, and no superintendent can afford to miss them.

—PROBABLY THERE are no more common mistakes made than working for boys rather than getting boys to work—a continual appeal to the selfishness of the boy, rather than to his altruism. "The five necessities of a live class are: The gang spirit, qualified male leadership; organization of the class itself; recreation, and the altruistic spirit." The book recommends a "Boys' Council" if there be a separate boys' department in the Sunday school, a majority of the boys elected by the boys themselves and two additional named by the church committee on boys' work. "Generally speaking boys below twelve should be grouped by themselves (nine to twelve). Boys of about twelve, thirteen and fourteen form a fairly natural group. Boys of fifteen, sixteen and seventeen form a natural group, and boys of eighteen, nineteen and twenty a still other natural group. When the churches of a community are really thoroughgoing in their work for boys they will cover the whole territory with a friendly supervision of the boy life of the place. Every block in the city will have some Christian man or supervisor whose business it shall be to know the boys in that block, discover the danger spots, find out who needs help and then organize leagues of friendship, secretly perhaps, to keep those boys from going wrong."

—TO-DAY WE HAVE a problem that challenges the imagination of youth as a merely individualistic program did not. We ask boys to-day not only to be good, but to be good for something. They glow with enthusiasm over their part in such a great task as lifting society Godward.

[Let our readers call the attention of Sunday school superintendents to this department, and ask them to send questions, opinions and suggestions to Dr. W. F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.]

CHICAGO'S "FIRST FRIEND"

SUPERINTENDENT F. EMORY LYON of the Central Howard Association, Chicago, is big brother, or "first friend," to probably as many, if not more, paroled prisoners than any other man in the country. Yet the Association which he heads is comparatively obscure. This is partly because the work it does can be better done in a quiet, unostentatious manner, and partly because the world as a whole seems to pay but little heed to what is done to help the friendless prisoners in penal institutions.

F. Emory Lyon in His Office

Although the work of the Central Howard Association is of a quiet kind, it is no less one of high aims and wonderful accomplishments. Under the parole laws of the States in the Middle West, certain prisoners may be released on condition that some individual qualifies as "first friend," guarantees employment and general oversight of the one thus given his liberty. Hundreds of prisoners appeal to this association for such help. Mr. Lyon either signs the papers of approved applicants as "first friend" or secures an employer who is willing to do so.

The work of this organization is not confined, however, to merely releasing prisoners and standing by them until they get upon their feet. It champions the cause of the friendless transgressor in other ways. Those brought before the courts without friends or funds to aid them in their effort to secure justice have found help and practical encouragement from Mr. Lyon and the Central Howard Association. Destitute families of prisoners are frequently provided for, and better laws for the handling and care of prisoners have been placed on the statute books because of this earnest work.

"What are some of the results you have to show for your work?" was asked Mr. Lyon recently.

He reached above his desk and took a letter from a drawer in his filing cabinet.

"Here is a letter that came not long ago from one of our 'boys,'" he replied. He was paroled a little over a year ago and we secured him a position as traveling salesman. He is still under our supervision. This letter tells us that he has been advanced to a position paying $4,000. Pretty good, isn't it, for a man who not so very long ago was an inmate of a penal institution and without a friend in the world?"

It is needless to state that this result was accomplished through giving the friendless one a helping hand at the right moment.

"Here's another case," Mr. Lyon continued, refreshing his memory from the filing case.

"A lad of eighteen left his home in Massachusetts to see the world. With but little experience he soon ran aground, was taken up on a charge of vagrancy here in Chicago and sent to the House of Correction. We secured his story, investigated, obtained his release, and started him home with a ticket that carried him straight to his waiting mother's arms."

The spirit of Christ is still in the world! And some of it is hid under a bushel in Chicago—the Central Howard Association.

"No," said Mr. Lyon, "we do not shout our work from the housetops. We're too busy for that. If we can get it done we don't mind if the world doesn't know all about it."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

The following is learned by heart at the request of the late Hon. William E. Gladstone, the Grand Old Man of England, by every boy and girl being educated at the Hawarden Castle Orphanage:

Drunkenness expels reason,
Drowns the memory,
Distempers the body,
Defaces beauty,
Diminishes strength,
Inflames the blood,
Causes external and incurable wounds,
It's a witch to the senses;
A devil to the soul;
A thief to the purse;
A beggar's companion;
A wife's woe and child's sorrow,
It makes man become a beast and self-murderer.
He drinks to other's good health,
And robs himself of his own.

"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." (Matt. 16: 16.)

"What think ye of Christ?" is the test,
To try both your State and your scheme;
You cannot be right in the rest,
Unless you think rightly of him.

"A voice came out of the cloud, saying, This is my Son, my chosen; hear ye him." (Luke 9: 35.)

From the heaven above, God commanded that his Son, Jesus Christ, should be obeyed. "Hear ye him." It was not the first time that his authoritative voice had been heard.

Bread and meat are the stuff that makes our bodies; obedience is the stuff that will make our manhood and womanhood.

"Let us be, and do, and love like him."

"And Jesus said unto him, If thou canst! All things are possible to him that believeth." (Mark 9: 23.) The incident connected with this text gives encouragement to all who are striving to help boys. We honestly believe that no boy is so bad but a Christ-like man may be made out of him.

"In heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father who is in heaven." (Matt. 18: 10.)

"Lo! Lord, I sit in thy wide space,
My child upon my knee;
She looketh up into my face,
And I look up to thee."

GEORGE MACDONALD.

"Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you." (Eph. 4: 32.)

Forgive, dear heart, forgive:
Let not the tide of strife
Mar thy sweet inner life:
Forgive, dear heart, forgive.

Forget, true heart, forget;
Let Love heal all thy scars;
Face upward to the stars;
Forget, true heart, forget.

WILLIAM BRADFORD DICK.

No-Rim-Cut Tires—10% Oversize

Look at All the Winter Treads

Compare the following all-important points. Then you'll know the cogent reason why Goodyear tires far outsell all others.

Here is a double-thick tread—an extra tread, made of very tough rubber, vulcanized onto the regular.

In that extra tread are these deep-cut, sharp-cut blocks. So deep and so tough that they last for thousands of miles.

Countless edges and angles face every direction, and they grasp the road surface with a bulldog grip.

Why They Last

Those are the reasons why these tough treads last.

But the tires last too, for the strain is not centered on any small part of the fabric.

These blocks widen out so they meet at the base. Thus the strain is distributed over the fabric just as with smooth-tread tires.

Have you found those features in any other non-skid?

Here they come in tires that can't rim-cut—tires 10 per cent over the rated size.

Tires which save, in these two ways, an average of 48 per cent.

Tires which so excel that men now use them on some 250,000 cars. You'll have them on yours when you see them.

The Goodyear Tire Book—14th-year edition—tells all the tire facts that you want to know. Ask us to mail it to you.

OUR YOUNGER READERS

CHRISTMAS MESSAGES FOR EVERY BOY AND GIRL

WE WANT to wish all boys and girls in the homes where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes a very Merry Christmas and a Glad New Year.

This winter is sure to be the best and jolliest season in the Young People's Department. The cupboards are as choke full of plans and prizes, pleasures and surprises as a bulging Christmas stocking. Our harvest of good things is gathered in and no matter how it storms and blows otherwhere we shall always be warm and inviting in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Cozy Corner.

Our Young People's Department is so big and popular that we have set forth on a crusade of happy times together and besides all the other good things we are going on a magic trip around the world right here in our own Ingle Nook. But I am giving secrets away and must stop it.

Keep on a sharp lookout; do not miss a single detail, for everything will be important. Watch for our prize offers and send the very best work you can do. I want to feel that every "younger reader" of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will earn a prize before the winter is over, and I will try and see to it that this comes about.

"All hail the power of Jesus' name!"

Christmas Prizes and Prizes

AND right here and now is a special Christmas prize offer of Thirty Best Christmas Books and One Hundred Beautiful Reproductions of One of the World's Greatest Paintings of the Baby Christmas King.

Best letters not longer than three hundred words will win these Christmas books and pictures. The books are the newest and best and the pictures are as lovely as any colored lithographs I have ever seen, and they are 10x13 inches.

Come now, let me hear from you all, and see what you can do in the way of a Christmas letter to the Cozy Corner Aunt.

Our Little People

THIS offer must not discourage our littlest folk. If you could see some of the delightful letters that little people send me every day you would know that older boys and girls must needs bestir themselves to win out in this competition.

Remember this: I want to hear from every one, and from your friends and schoolmates who care to try their hand at winning one of these very beautiful and special Christmas gift prizes.

AMONG THE CHRISTMAS PRIZE BOOKS

Boys Will Like These

Davidess), The Lucky Sixpence (Emilie Kenson Knipe), At the Manor (Mary B. Sleight), and be sure to read Pollyanna; her story in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is one of the dearest of all the bewildering array of new stories.

The Big Christmas Book

IF YOU want a Christmas gift that will last you all your life and never grow tiresome, ask for The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton, or give it to yourself. Every boy and girl will revel in this book just as much as every father and mother and grown-up friend in the house will revel in it. This is in every sense a book for everybody and for every day; because the marvels and wonderful experiences described by brave old Captain Quinton are truths which are more astonishing than romance. There never has been such a strangely fascinating book published; in all of its four hundred and ninety-six pages there is not a dull paragraph. Santa Claus could do few more satisfactory or kindly favors this year than to leave a copy of this book in every home. See editorial note on page 1270 of this issue.

For the Little People

WHEN CHRISTMAS CAME TOO EARLY (Miss Blodgett), Princess Rags and Tatters (Harriet T. Comstock), A Little Book of Christmas (John Kendrick Bangs), Wonder Tales of Old Japan, with beautiful colored pictures, by Shozan Abota, Cherry Tree Children (Miss Blaisdell), Some Little Cooks and What They Did, The Goldfish (by Julian Street), The Party Book, The Fir-Tree Fairy Book, Prayers for Little Men and Women (John Martin), Two and Four-Footed Friends, a collection of nice short stories about interesting children and animals.

NOTE: These are some of the best Christmas books which will be given away in this week's prize contest in The Cozy Corner.

Our Good-Night Verse

There was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man, come into the world.—John 1: 9.

P. S.—I think it would be a Christmas courtesy to the Cozy Corner to send a stamp for a Christmas answer to your letter, because this makes our Christmas an affair in which we all take part, otherwise the expense of putting a two-cent stamp on so many letters is really very great, as you will readily see.

I am lovingly always,

The Aunt to the Cozy Corner

What A Million Like

Will Please a Million More at Christmas

Think what it means for one million people to wear one brand of hose. It means that those hose must be pretty close to perfection. They must be silky, soft and light. They must fit like a glove. They must wear longer than hose are expected to.

More than a million men, women, children and infants are wearing Holeproof Hose for exactly these reasons.

Don't you think hose that are pleasing so many will please as many more as a Christmas Gift?

POLLYANNA

"Why, Aunt Polly, how perfectly lovely!" she cried. "Come right in. I love company," she finished, scampering up the stairs and throwing her door wide open.

Now Miss Polly had not been intending to call on her niece. She had been planning to look for a certain white wool shawl in the cedar chest. But to her unbounded surprise now, she found herself, not in the main attic before the cedar chest, but in Pollyanna's little room sitting in one of the straight-backed chairs — so many, many times since Pollyanna came, Miss Polly had found herself like this, doing some utterly unexpected, surprising thing, quite unlike the thing she had set out to do!

"I love company," said Pollyanna, again, "specially since I've had this room, all mine, you know. Oh, of course, I had a room, always, but 'twas a hired room, and hired rooms aren't half as nice as owned ones, are they? And of course I do own this one; don't I?"

"Why, y-yes, Pollyanna," murmured Miss Polly, vaguely wondering why she did not get up at once and go to look for that shawl.

"And of course now I just love this room, even if it hasn't got the carpet and curtains and pictures that I'd been wanting—" With a painful blush Pollyanna stopped short.

"What's that, Pollyanna?"

"N-nothing, Aunt Polly, truly. I didn't mean to say it."

"Probably not," returned Miss Polly, coldly; "but you did say it, so suppose we have the rest of it."

"But it wasn't anything only that I'd been kind of planning on pretty carpets and lace curtains and things, you know; but of course—"

"Planning for them!"

Pollyanna blushed still more painfully.

"I ought not to have, of course, Aunt Polly. It was only because I'd always wanted them and hadn't had them, I suppose. Oh, we'd had two rugs, in the barrels, but they were little, you know, and one had ink spots and the other holes; and there were never only those two pictures—the one fath—I mean, the good one we sold and the bad one that broke. Of course, if it hadn't been for all that, I shouldn't have wanted them so—pretty things, I mean; and I shouldn't have got to planning, all through the hall that first day, how pretty mine would be here, and—but, truly, Aunt Polly, it wasn't but just a minute—I mean, a few minutes—before I was being glad that the bureau didn't have a looking-glass, because it didn't show my freckles; and there couldn't be a nicer picture than the one out my window there, and you've been so good to me, that—"

Miss Polly rose suddenly to her feet. Her face was very red.

"That will do, Pollyanna," she said stiffly. "You have said quite enough, I'm sure." The next minute she had swept down the stairs, and not until she reached the first floor did it suddenly occur to her that she had gone up into the attic to find a white wool shawl in the cedar chest near the east window.

Less than twenty-four hours later, Miss Polly said to Nancy, crisply:

"Nancy, you may move Miss Pollyanna's things downstairs this morning to the room directly beneath. I have decided to have my niece sleep there for the present."

"Yes, ma'am," said Nancy aloud.

"Oh glory!" said Nancy to herself.

To Pollyanna, a minute later, she cried joyously: "And won't ye jest be listenin' ter this, Miss Pollyanna? You're ter sleep downstairs in the room straight under this. You are—you are!"

Pollyanna grew actually white.

"You mean—why, Nancy, not really—really and truly?"

"I guess you'll think it's really and truly," prophesied Nancy, exultingly, nodding her head to Pollyanna over the armful of dresses she had taken from the closet. "I'm told ter take down yer things, and I'm goin' ter take 'em, too, 'fore she gets a chance ter change her mind."

Pollyanna did not stop to hear the end of this sentence. At the imminent risk of being dashed headlong, she was flying downstairs two steps at a time. Bang went two doors and a chair before Pollyanna at last reached her goal—Aunt Polly.

"Oh, Aunt Polly, Aunt Polly, did you mean it, really? Why, that room's got everything—the carpet and curtains and three pictures, besides the one outdoors, too, 'cause the windows look the same way. Oh, Aunt Polly!"

"Very well, Pollyanna. I am gratified that you like the change, of course; but if you think so much of all those things, I trust you will take proper care of them; that's all. Pollyanna, please pick up that chair; and you have banged two doors in the last half-minute." Miss Polly spoke sternly, all the more sternly because, for some inexplicable reason, she felt inclined to cry—and Miss Polly was not used to feeling inclined to cry.

Pollyanna picked up the chair.

"Yes'm; I know I banged 'em—those doors," she admitted cheerfully. "You see, I'd just found out about the room, and I reckon you'd have banged doors if—" Pollyanna stopped short and eyed her aunt with new interest. "Aunt Polly, did you ever bang doors?"

"I hope—not, Pollyanna!" Miss Polly's voice was properly shocked.

"Why, Aunt Polly, what a shame!"

"A shame!" repeated Aunt Polly, too dazed to say more.

"Why, yes. You see, if you'd felt like banging doors you'd have banged 'em, of course; and if you didn't, that must have meant that you weren't ever glad over anything—or you would have banged 'em. You couldn't have helped it. And I'm so sorry you weren't ever glad over anything!"

"Pollyanna!" gasped the lady; but Pollyanna was gone, and only the distant bang of the attic stairway answered for her. Pollyanna had gone to help Nancy bring down her things.

Miss Polly felt vaguely disturbed; but then, of course she had been glad —over some things!

CHAPTER X

Introducing Jimmy

AUGUST came. August brought several surprises and some changes. First, there was the kitten. Pollyanna found the kitten mewing pitifully some distance down the road. She brought it home at once, as a matter of course.

Miss Polly looked at the forlorn little gray bunch of neglected misery in Pollyanna's arms, and shivered: Miss Polly did not care for cats—not even pretty, healthy, clean ones.

"Ugh! Pollyanna! What a dirty little beast! And it's sick, I'm sure, and all mangy and fleay."

"I know it, poor little thing," crooned Pollyanna tenderly. "And it's all trembly, too, it's so scared. You see it doesn't know, yet, that we're going to keep it, of course."

"No—nor anybody else," retorted Miss Polly, with meaning emphasis.

"Oh, yes, they do," nodded Pollyanna, entirely misunderstanding her aunt's words. "I told everybody we should keep it, if I didn't find where it belonged. I knew you'd be glad to have it—poor little lonesome thing!"

Miss Polly opened her lips and tried to speak; but in vain. The curious helpless feeling that had been hers so often since Pollyanna's arrival had her now fast in its grip.

"Of course I know," hurried on Pollyanna gratefully, "that you wouldn't let a dear little lonesome kitty go hunting for a home when you'd just taken me in; and I said so to Mrs. Ford when she asked me if you'd let me keep it. Why, I had the Ladies' Aid, you know, and kitty didn't have anybody. I knew you'd feel that way," she nodded happily, as she ran from the room.

"But, Pollyanna, Pollyanna," remonstrated Aunt Polly. "I don't—" But Pollyanna was already halfway to the kitchen, calling:

"Nancy, Nancy, just see this dear little kitty that Aunt Polly is going to bring up along with me!" And Aunt Polly, in the sitting room—who abhorred cats—fell back in her chair with a gasp of dismay, powerless to protest.

The next day it was a dog, even dirtier and more forlorn, perhaps, than was the kitten; and again Miss Polly, to her dumfounded amazement, found herself figuring as a kind protector and an angel of mercy. When, in less than a week, however, Pollyanna brought home a small, ragged boy and confidently claimed the same protection for him, Miss Polly did have something to say. It happened after this wise:

On a pleasant Thursday morning Pollyanna had been taking calf's-foot jelly again to Mrs. Snow. Mrs. Snow and Pollyanna were the best of friends. Their friendship had started from the third visit Pollyanna had made, the one after she had told Mrs. Snow of the game. Mrs. Snow herself was playing the game now, with Pollyanna. To be sure, she was not playing it very well—she had been so sorry for everything so long that it was not easy to be glad for anything now. But under Pollyanna's cheery instructions and merry laughter at her mistakes, she was learning fast. Pollyanna was thinking of Mrs. Snow when suddenly she saw the boy. He was sitting in a disconsolate little heap by the roadside, whittling half-heartedly at a small stick.

"Hullo," smiled Pollyanna, engagingly.

The boy glanced up, but he looked away again, at once.

"Hullo yourself," he mumbled.

Pollyanna laughed.

"Now you don't look as if you'd be glad even for calf's-foot jelly," she chuckled, stopping before him.

The boy stirred restlessly, gave her a surprised look, and began to whittle again at his stick, with the dull, broken-bladed knife in his hand. Pollyanna hesitated, then dropped herself comfortably down on the grass near him. In spite of Pollyanna's brave assertion that she was "used to Ladies' Aiders," and "didn't mind," she had sighed at times for some one of her own age to talk to. Hence her determination to make the most of this opportunity.

"My name is Pollyanna Whittier," she began pleasantly. "What's yours?"

Again the boy stirred restlessly. He even almost got to his feet. But he settled back.

"Jimmy Bean," he grunted with ungracious indifference.

"Good! Now we're introduced. I'm glad you did your part—some folks don't, you know. I live at Miss Polly Harrington's house. Where do you live?"

"Nowhere."

"Nowhere? Why, you can't do that—everybody lives somewhere," asserted Pollyanna.

"Well, I don't—just now. I'm huntin' up a new place."

"Where did you live—before?"

"Well, if you ain't the beatin'est for askin' questions!" sighed the boy, impatiently.

"I have to be," retorted Pollyanna calmly, "else I couldn't find out a thing about you. If you'd talk more I wouldn't talk so much."

The boy gave a short laugh. It was a sheepish laugh, and not quite a willing one; but his face looked a little pleasanter when he spoke this time.

"All right then—here goes! I'm Jimmie Bean, and I'm twelve years old, goin' on thirteen. I come last year ter live at the Orphans' Home back here; but they've got so many kids there ain't much room for me, an' I wan't never wanted, anyhow, I don't believe. So I've quit. I'm goin' ter live somewheres else—but I hain't found the place yet. I'd like a home—jest a common one, ye know, that don't spell itself with a big H. If ye has a home, ye has folks, an' I hain't had folks since—since dad died. So I'm a-huntin' now. I've tried four houses, but—they didn't want me, though I said I expected ter work, 'course. There! is that all ye want ter know?" The boy's voice had broken a little over the last two sentences.

"Why, what a shame!" sympathized Pollyanna. "And didn't there anybody want you? Oh, dear! I know just how you feel, because after my father died, too, there wasn't anybody but the Ladies' Aid for me, until Aunt Polly said she'd take—" Pollyanna stopped abruptly. The dawning of a wonderful idea began to show in her face.

"Oh, I know just the place for you," she cried. "Aunt Polly'll take you—I know she will! Didn't she take me? And didn't she take Fluffy and Buffy, when they didn't have any one to love them, or any place to go?—and they're only cats and dogs. Oh, come, I know Aunt Polly'll take you!"

Jimmy Bean's thin little face brightened.

"Honest Injun? Would she, now? I'd work, ye know, an' I'm real strong!" He bared a small, bony arm.

"Of course she would! Why, my Aunt Polly is the nicest lady in the world—now that my mama has gone to be a heaven angel. And there's rooms—heaps of 'em," she continued, springing to her feet, and tugging at his arm. "It's an awful big house. Maybe, though," she added a little anxiously, as they hurried on, "maybe you'll have to sleep in the attic room. I did at first. But there's screens there now, so 'twon't be so hot, and the flies can't get in, either, to bring in the germs on their feet. Did you know about that? It's perfectly lovely!"

The sermon was preached by Archbishop Keene of Dubuque, whose theme was the prospect of peace. Very soon after the sermon, the pastor of the church, Father Russell, came down from the rostrum, informed the President that it was eleven o'clock, and escorted the presidential party to the door of the church. The services of the "mass" occupied another hour, and were closed by Cardinal Gibbons.

The list of invited guests included the President and Mrs. Taft, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Chief Justice White of the Supreme Court of the United States, the minister of Costa Rica, the minister of Bolivia, the minister of San Salvador, the minister of Venezuela, the minister of Cuba, the minister of Uruguay, the minister of Nicaragua, the minister of Chile, the minister of Haiti, the minister of Guatemala, the minister of the Dominican Republic, the minister of Peru, the minister of Colombia, the minister of Honduras, the minister of Panama, the chargé d'affaires of Argentina, the secretaries of the Mexican legation, and many other prominent officials of both church and state.

Following the services, the members of the diplomatic corps and other invited male guests were escorted to the rectory of the church, where luncheon was served. The government officials informally complimented the clergy and members of the Pan-American Union for the success of the ceremony. They lauded the high ideals which prompted the movement to cement the bonds of friendship between the republics of the Americas. President Taft did not attend the luncheon but was represented by Secretary of the Treasury MacVeigh and Attorney General Wickersham. Chief Justice White of the Supreme Court and District Commissioners Rudolph and Judson, with many of the leading business men of the District, were also present at this function. Cardinal Gibbons at the luncheon spoke eloquently of President Taft, and praised the "fine discrimination which enables him to select the right man for the right place," mentioning the selection of Chief Justice White (a Catholic) as an illustration of this admirable quality in the President.

It has been the oft-asserted purpose of the Roman Church to "make America Catholic," and these annual Pan-American Thanksgiving Masses are designed to make and to keep both Americas Catholic by binding them more solidly together, and then, through the influence of powerful diplomacy at Washington, to use the great influence of the government of the United States to hold the other nations in line. There will be no such striking falling away in the Western hemisphere as she has been forced to witness in the Eastern if the great American hierarchy can accomplish its purposes. CHARLES M. SNOW.

An Embarrassed Postmaster

SEVERAL weeks ago, a woman in Elgin, Ill., wrote to the mayor of San Francisco announcing herself as a candidate for matrimony and asking his help in making her case public. She had fallen heir to a valuable estate, but it was conditioned that she must be married by a certain fixed date in December, otherwise she would lose the property. All applicants were to write to her at Elgin. Now, the lady in the case has disappeared, either having changed her mind, or else having found a suitor nearer at hand; but there is serious trouble in the Elgin post office. The postmaster is practically buried under a mountain of mail, which has come in reply to this lady's invitation. There are over 7,000 letters, and almost as many photographs, and they are still pouring in at the rate of hundreds daily. Doubtless the too complaisant mayor now regrets having given the matter publicity. It would be hard to describe the feelings of the poor Illinois postmaster, who is the only real sufferer in this absurd affair.

THE VOICE OF THE NATION ON ROME

FURTHER OPINIONS ON THE ROMANIST CRUSADE TO "MAKE AMERICA CATHOLIC"

A Methodist Minister on the Designs of the Roman Hierarchy

DURING a period of over forty years in the Christian ministry, I often wondered why ministers and other Christian workers were so silent and inactive in the presence of the subtle activities and measureless assumptions of the Roman Catholic Church. At last I am cheered to see an interest awakened in this subject, and believe this interest will continue and increase wherever loyalty to Christ is found.

It is scarcely possible to emphasize the seriousness of this subject. Taken in all its bearings the followers of Jesus Christ never faced a more serious one. And while preserving the kindest feelings toward Roman Catholics as individuals, the designs of the Papal hierarchy must be exposed and defeated. These designs may be set forth in one sentence—the absolute control of the body and soul of every member of the human family. Any one who thinks them less lives in a fool's palace. If these designs are not frustrated, then the following is a sample of the teaching and action that are sure to go on and increase. In a recent issue of the Catholic Progress, it is stated: "The woes of—naming the county—are due to one cause, the existence of Protestantism. . . . Would that every Protestant meeting-house were swept from the land." What followed? A church in which I held many services, and in which I rejoiced over souls brought into saving union with Christ, was forcibly entered at night, the Bibles and hymn books gathered into a heap, the harmonium placed on the pile; kerosene and matches did the rest. Fortunately the building was not wholly destroyed. Vicious conduct is sure to follow vicious teaching.

The Importance of Father Phelan

IT MUST naturally have occurred to many persons, as it has occurred to me, that the editor of the Western Watchman, whose name is so frequently coupled in the religious press with some of the most extraordinary statements I have ever read, must be a person of more than usual authority. Who is he, and how does it happen that he, alone of all men, is accepted as the undisguised champion of the Vatican in its fight to "make America Catholic"?

Dubuque, Ia. J. B. M.

Our correspondent has rightly surmised that Father D. S. Phelan is a person of consequence. We have his own modest admission of the fact in these words, which he copies in his own paper (September 26 issue) from the Catholic Register and Canadian Extension: "Some of our American contemporaries are being given a course of instruction on the 'Ne Temere' by the venerable editor of the Western Watchman. They have yet to learn, apparently, that the Holy Father himself regards Father Phelan as a veritable fountain-head of orthodoxy. When he makes a pronouncement they will do well to accept it. The contrary course has gotten some good people into serious trouble." In the same issue (September 26), Father Phelan gives an admiring and breathless world a glimpse of his intimate relationship with the Pope. The Omaha Voice apparently had the temerity to remark that Dr. Phelan was "brilliant but erratic," to which that gentle soul retorts: "It is a comfort for us to have in our lonely wanderings the company of the Holy Father." Lest this sweet though rather ambiguous remark might be regarded by some of Father Phelan's co-religionists as savoring of disrespect, the Pope's friend clinches his claim by relating an incident, which happened fifty years ago, when he had such a "pull" with the then Pontiff that he won single-handed a fight to stop the enlistment of an American Catholic regiment in St. Louis, which was meant to go to Rome and take the place of the French troops that were to be withdrawn. "The Pope was with us," he now writes, in explanation of his wonderful pull, which continues unimpaired to this day. He is a mine of original information and has given more snap and acrimony to the situation than half a dozen cardinals could have done. He disdains hyperbole, calls a spade a spade, and on the strength of his intimate relations with the Pope has written things that would have paralyzed the pen of any other Catholic editor in the country.

Germany at Odds with the Vatican

ACCORDING to a special cable despatch to the New York Times from Berlin, dated December 1, Germany's 24,000,000 Roman Catholics are on the verge of a controversy with the German Government, which presages a bitter renewal of Bismarck's Kulturkampf crisis. The Roman Catholic Center Party, together with the Conservatives, constitute the only reliable Parliamentary majority at the chancellor's disposal. If the Centrists, as they now openly threaten, declare war on Bethmann-Hollweg, his position will be perilous in the extreme. The chancellor has promptly taken up the Catholic challenge. Matters have been brought to a climax by the action of the Federal Council rejecting the application of Bavaria for a more liberal interpretation of the anti-Jesuit laws. The Cologne Volkszeitung, the Catholic organ, and Germania, the Berlin organ, declare that the "Pope's subjects in Germany will never tolerate the police régime of a Prussianized Germany, which now essays to impose upon them an anti-Jesuit propaganda, and are prepared to resort to political extremes to annihilate it." The chancellor is quoted by the Frankfurter Zeitung as having notified a prominent Catholic parliamentarian that "German patience with the dictatorial practices of the Vatican was approaching the point of exhaustion." Prussian diplomatic relations with the Holy See, he intimated, would be broken off next time the Pope attempted to interfere with the sovereign rights of the State, as was recently the case in the encyclical relating to trades unions. The chancellor warned the Catholic deputy that it was "the last Papal intervention in the independence of interdenominational labor organizations Prussia will tolerate."

Rome's Mayor Defies the Vatican

A CABLE despatch from Rome (December 1) says: "In anticipation of the municipal elections, Mayor Nathan made a speech to-day before an immense audience, reviewing the work of his administration. He recalled his speech of September 20, 1910, on the occasion of the commemoration of the entry into Rome of King Victor Emmanuel and the fall of the temporal power, in which he warmly criticized the Papacy. In that speech, said the mayor, he had merely contrasted the condition of Rome before 1870 with the position it assumed afterward. He had simply stated facts, but his speech had acquired importance through the criticisms directed against it, even by the Pontiff. He said he would not retract even a syllable of that speech, submitting it to the legitimate judges, the electors. Mayor Nathan concluded by urging the maintenance of the bloc of the Liberal forces against 'the bloc the reactionary clerical forces are organizing under the shelter' of the Vatican."

For Christmas

Give Everybody Parker Gift Pens —Leakless Pens

LAST year hundreds of people made up their Christmas lists with Parker Gift Pens for everyone.

Why don't you save the hurry and worry of Christmas shopping this year by taking your Christmas list and a Parker catalog now, and picking out appropriate pens for each person on the list?

Parker Pens are more than handsome gifts. They are fine writers, and they never leak.

Why do ordinary fountain pens leak and smear your fingers? Because their feed tubes are straight.

A straight feed tube always holds some ink drops—even when the pen is upright in your pocket.

There's heat in your pocket—98 degrees of body heat. This warms the pen.

And there's air in the pen barrel, just above the main ink. This air expands from the heat, pushes up into the feed tube to escape, and pushes the ink drops up and out around the writing end of the pen to smear your fingers when you remove pen-cap to write. But

The Parker Feed Tube is Curved and touches the inside of pen-barrel. This touch causes Capillary Attraction. (That's the force that makes a sponge take up drops of water, etc.) So, when you turn a Parker upright to go in your pocket, Capillary Attraction pulls back the ink drops that want to loiter in the Parker Lucky Curve feed. Thus the feed tube is free of ink when the heated air expands and climbs up. And thus the Parker never leaks.

Parker 14k gold nibs, tipped with hardest Iridium, never scratch. Spear Head Ink Controller regulates ink-flow and prevents blotting. New Disappearing Clip hangs on to your pocket like a beggar but clears out of the way when you write.

Standard styles $2, $2.50, $3, $4, $5 and up, as per size and decoration.

New Parker Jack Knife Safety Pen is leakless in any position—even on its head. Fine for lady's purse. $2.50, $3, $4, $5, and up.

Get your Christmas Parkers on trial. Dealer will refund, any time within ten days from purchase, if there's the least dissatisfaction. If your dealer doesn't sell Parkers, we'll send you complete catalog, and you can order direct. Parker Christmas Pens come in handsome gift boxes. Settle Christmas shopping excitement now.

Questions and Answers

M. R., Cleveland, O. What is known of the religion of the great composers, whose productions for a century at least have delighted the music-loving world?

Martin Luther was the founder of the German school of music. Handel has been called "a Christian, with the Jewish artistic temperament." Bach came of Lutheran parentage. Mendelssohn was of Jewish ancestry, but his father embraced Christianity and had his children baptized. Haydn was a Roman Catholic, and so also were Mozart and Liszt.

J. A. C., Farmington, Minn. You have stumbled against an old argument which has been frequently used by skeptics. What the Creator may have done or may do for other worlds, even assuming there are other inhabited planets, we can only conjecture. All our speculations in this direction must end in nothing, for the sum of human knowledge, contrasted with the vast infinity of creation above and around us, is very small. Some spiritual writers have conjectured that the "many mansions" to which Jesus referred (John 14: 2) may be those shining orbs above and around us.

Mrs. J. C. S., Central Lake, Mich. When did modern Christmas giving commence?

Although Christmas gifts may be said to have had their origin in the gifts of gold and frankincense and myrrh presented by the Magi, the modern celebration of Christmas only dates from the sixth century. Much earlier, however, the old heathen festival of the Saturnalia had been transformed into a Christian festival, which was celebrated by the giving of presents. It is now generally observed in its present form by nearly all Christian bodies throughout the world.

G. S. B., Scranton, Pa. Please state the naval strength of Turkey.

Turkey has eight battleships in commission and two more almost finished; twenty-four destroyers and torpedo boats and a number of small gunboats. The personnel consists of about 900 officers, 30,000 sailors and 9,000 marines. It was British officers who reorganized the Turkish navy and Germany who sold to the Turkish Government the two best battleships, the Kurfürst Friedrich Wilhelm and the Weissenburg, which are now known in the Turkish navy as Kheyr-ed-Din Barbarossa and the Turgut Reis. These ships cost $4,500,000. The two now in course of construction will each cost much more.

Mrs. M. O., Thorp, Wash. The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away. When we use the customary phrase that God takes away any of our friends from this world, it is simply a familiar form of acknowledging submission to his will as the Disposer of all things. Life and death are in his hands. There is nothing irreverent about such an expression. We should learn to bow to his will, even though it may sometimes try our hearts sorely to do so. Surely, it is well to regard your little one as safe in the arms of a loving Father.

W. A. L., Philadelphia. I have been interested in your crusade against the teachings of the Catholic Church, and would like to know whether the "Oath of the Knights of Columbus," which is being circulated in Philadelphia, is in fact as used by the Catholic Church. In this oath they promise to harass, and, if possible, kill any opposition to their faith, and in particular the Masons and Protestants. They are to be furnished with daggers and promise to keep firearms in case of necessity for religious uprisings and to obey the Pope in everything; failure to obey will be punished by severing arms and legs and cutting the throat and burning sulphur in a slit opened in the stomach. The signature to be made with their blood for faithful performance, etc. If you have not seen a copy of this oath I will loan one to you.

We do not consider resistance to the political activities of the Roman hierarchy at all in the nature of "a crusade against the teachings of the Catholic Church." We do not feel called upon to deal with the so-called "errors of Rome" or the beliefs of any other religious body; but we think that the success of the efforts made by the Roman hierarchy to obtain political control throughout the land is a menace to our free institutions, and, in the interest of the whole country, should be checked. As to the so-called "oath" we have no means of testing its accuracy; but there is nothing in any of the copies that have reached us that is contrary to either the spirit of Rome or her practice in years gone by. On pp. 406-408 of Vol. II of Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic you will find a description of Alva's actual doings in the Netherlands that will remind you of the most gruesome paragraphs of that alleged "oath." And in the Western Watchman of November 21, 1912, in an editorial Dr. Phelan said: "Our heroes are the Duke of Alva and Catherine de Medici. You cannot excite any pity in our souls by whining accounts of Catholic atrocities in the seventeenth century. We have never written a line in extenuation or palliation of the Inquisition. We never thought it needed a defense."

E. V. E., Marshfield, Ore. 1. Is the religion of the Balkan States and Greece the Greek or the Roman Church? 2. Has the Greek Church all or any of the objectionable features and errors of the Roman, or is it more like the Protestant?

1. The prevailing religion of Greece and the Balkan States is that of the Greek Catholic Church, called more accurately the "Oriental Orthodox Church." 2. The point of doctrine on which the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches differ is the "procession" of the Spirit. The Roman Church holds that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and from the Son; the Greek omits the words "and from the Son." The most striking difference is that the Greek Church does not acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope of Rome. There are a number of divisions, having different heads, or "patriarchs." The clergy are married; communion in two kinds, i. e., both the bread and wine, is allowed to the laity.

R. A., Saratoga, N. Y. What are the general points of difference which distinguish the new Baptist Bible from the current versions?

In the proper sense, the new Bible is not altogether new. The American Bible Union (Baptist) issued a New Testament in 1862, which was prepared mainly by Professor T. J. Conant, and this, together with four books of the Old Testament, which he had also translated, is included in the latest publication. The work of preparing the new Bible as a whole was begun in 1889, being assigned to eminent Baptist scholars. Some of the changes may be noted: The Greek words for baptize and baptism are so translated, being followed by the words "immerse" and "immersion" in brackets. Archaic forms of expression such as "loveth" and "leadeth" are rendered in the modern forms "loves" and "leads." "Epistles" is rendered "letters." "Calvary" becomes simply "a skull." In John 4: 24 "God is spirit" is substituted for "a spirit." Acts 17: 22 reads, "I perceive that ye are very much given to the worship of divinities," which is an excellent change. Matt. 6: 34 is changed to "the morrow will have its own anxiety." Matt. 5 substitutes "happy" for "blessed." In the Psalms "praise ye Jah" takes the place of "Hallelujah." In Gen. 3: 17-21 "Adam" becomes "the man." In certain passages "hades" becomes "the underworld," and "hell" "infernal regions," although in a number of others "hell" is retained. These are only a few of a number of similar changes. The whole book gives evidence of careful, conscientious scholarship, and the textual notes at the bottom of the pages are a great help to the reader, being frequently in the nature of a commentary. It should be remembered that as far as the New Testament is concerned, the changes noted have been in use in the Baptist denomination for many years, and further, that in no single instance do they affect the essentials of the Christian faith. They are simply corrections of the older translations with a careful modernizing of the phraseology.

L. M. R., Stormsburg, Neb. We consider it possible that a man might be a Christian and yet be a professional ballplayer. There are no doubt honest, upright men in that business as in other callings.

R. M., Caledonia, Minn. 1. We know of no reason why a Christian could not be a member of any of the organizations you mention. 2. The confessional, as practiced by Rome, has no warrant anywhere in the Scripture.

W. L. P., Goldsborough, N. C. The passage in Eph. 4: 5 indicates the rallying-point for believers in the early church. The church is one in the unity of its allegiance to Jesus Christ as its head; one in unity of faith of the Gospel as once for all delivered to man, and which is not to be superseded by any other belief (see Jude 5: 3), and one in regarding baptism as the sacrament whereby we are incorporated into the visible body of believers. Alford remarks concerning this same passage in Ephesians: "There is not added 'one Pope, one council, one form of government'." Where there is no ministry with Christ as the head, there is no Christian church.

E., Seattle, Wash. 1. W. T. Stead had some peculiar views, and was an experimenter in psychology and spiritualism, but he gave evidence on many occasions of true Christian belief. Those who knew him best regarded him as a man of exceptionably fine Christian character. Many of the tributes paid to him by the British and American press took this view. 2. There is no record in Scripture of any of the apostles exercising in a literal and authoritative sense, the power of personally forgiving sins. They all, without exception, preached the forgiveness of sins through faith in and acceptance of Jesus Christ as Saviour. This power, which is mentioned in John 20: 23, is intended in a ministerial or declarative sense, as the authorized interpreter of his Word.

The Wreckage of Mr. Jansen's Boys' Dormitory

THE DISASTROUS TYPHOON IN CEBU

THOUGH the seriousness of the devastating typhoon that swept parts of the Philippine Islands a short time ago was apparent from the cabled despatches, it was not realized that such an appalling disaster had visited those with whose progress and efforts we are familiar and to whom we are linked by ties of sympathy and friendship. From the island city of Cebu, P. I., Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Jansen send us an account of the terrible ravages which the storm wrought in their missionary "parish of a hundred islands." Mr. and Mrs. Jansen and their work are already well known to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, for it is in their watery field that the big mission motor boat El Heraldo Cristiano—largely the gift of our readers—is doing such able service.

Mrs. Jansen writes of their recent disaster as follows:

"A week ago, on our arrival at Hongkong en route for Cebu, P. I., we cheerfully faced the short stretch of the ever restless Chinese sea which lay between us and the Philippines. But the hotel in Hongkong, where we awaited the ship which was to take us on the rest of our journey, held terrible news for us. A copy of the Manila Times lay on the reading-desk and it told us in a few big headlines what had just happened in the city and island to which we were hastening:

"'Storm Wrecks Cebu City. Tens of thousands homeless. Deaths from the island of Cebu total close to a thousand.' We now know that it was more, as this number did not include the then unknown loss in the country around Cebu City. Nine steamers are reported lost, four were sunk in Cebu harbor, and a large number of sailing bancas (fishing boats). The destruction of the cargo boats which ran in and out of Cebu is in itself a tremendous loss to the island. So terrific was the force of the wind and torrential rain which burst upon the land and on the sea around Cebu that not only ships but stone bridges, roads, railway lines, and of course thousands of the frailly built Cebuan houses, were swept to destruction. The force of the wind lifted roofs and walls and entire houses, carrying them away, scattering and destroying and burying timber and household stuff. It hurled sticks of timber and pieces of wood and metal five feet into the ground in some cases.

"Added to all, tidal waves rushed into the most thickly populated districts of the city, sweeping before their waters people and homes.

"As we thought, when we first read this news, of the children, of those mothers and fathers so well known to us we did not dare to picture them in that whirlpool of death. They had their warning. The harbor hurricane signals had been telling of the nearing typhoon, but it was upon them even while the warnings spoke. And the wind at a velocity of over 100 miles an hour drove all power of quiet reasoning away, while from two to six feet of rushing waters made escape by flight impossible. The city river bed, which the children during the previous awful five months of drought had made their playground, now became for many of them their place of death, while the parents perished on every hand with the last death longing to save their children imprinted on many of their faces. The entire city was plunged in darkness, and to the people who had become so accustomed to the electric lighting the unbroken darkness was an added horror. Had the sea wall of the city not stood the awful strain of the tidal wave death must have played far more awful havoc in the city. Neither was the fresh water cut off, although the typhoon rains caused an overflow of the reservoir, so that the rush of its waters tore away rocks in their course.

"Appalling stories of death and anguish are being brought into the city by scores of bereaved parents and orphaned children. Children were swept from the arms of mothers and fathers, and parents from their children, to be crushed to death or drowned by the force of the mountain streams, which had become wide and deep torrents, as they tore down the steep hillsides to carry with them the beaten bodies and the wrecked homes to the rushing rivers in the valleys.

"The patient sorrow of the Christians is terrible to see. They do not weep except when they pray aloud together. They do not complain. Old and young alike gather around almost silently, like little children stricken by great sorrow. With voices thrilled by strange grief they pray together. They tell of their sorrows, saying,

CHRISTMAS AT ELLIS ISLAND

BY GRACE HELEN BAILEY

Some Types of Future Citizens Awaiting the First Christmas in the New Land

AS a belated group of people hurried off the little government steamer that plies between Ellis Island and Battery Park, one of the crew called out a greeting. It sounded like: "Merry Christmas to ye, folks." Yet it may have been only the trickeries of the wind, for no one stopped, although every one was smiling good-naturedly. Some of the passengers were officials, a few were visitors, and one amply proportioned, kindly woman was so unmistakably a missionary that the identifying badge was not necessary. As she went swiftly along the wharf, the woman with the badge suddenly paused with a quick exclamation. She called out to a man with gold braid on his cap:

"Tell Miss Hasper I'll be up in a minute."

Her voice had a thrill in it of keen interest as she bent down to investigate a bit of a something huddled on a queer oilcloth-covered bundle which had been conscientiously bound about with yards of rope. The something had two red woolen stockings which might have been taken for robins lost in the snow. But it was only a child in the grip of an infinite desolation. Down on her knees went the missionary, swift fingers plundering the bulging twine-netted bag on her arm. Out came a staring worsted doll, ruddy of cheek, unwinking of eye. The missionary couldn't understand the child, and the child couldn't understand the missionary—the doll understood them both. Out flung the arms of the child, in through the portals of a forlorn, homesick, little heart went the worsted orphan, and the Judean splendor of the world's first Christmas dawn enveloped the three.

An old woman came hobbling toward them. Brown and shrewd was the peasant face, and kindly too. Her wrinkled old hands twitched at the missionary's sleeve to show that she understood. She wanted to share in the joy of it. The two women smiled as only women can smile on the happiness of a little child. It was the season for the little children and for those with the heart of a child. The passing of nearly two thousand years had only made greater the glory of the first divine Child and his wonderful star.

For days Ellis Island had kept the secret of the kindly plan—worked out by the missionaries and approved by officials—of giving a Christmas surprise party to the children, small and large, of ten or twelve nations. Most of these pilgrims from the Old World were very ignorant; all were poor; many had need of the healing hands that would never touch them. Among them were future citizens, who some day would point out the island to their children while gaily voyaging to Coney in the summertime. But among them also were scores to whom the very memory of the island would bring the bitterness of life's greatest disappointment.

The missionary had much to do this day. She hurried into the side entrance of the huge building, interminably vibrant, like some gigantic hopper, shaking day and night, sifting into the country citizens in the raw. But to her—to all these missionaries who work here at the gateway of the nation—the immigrant is not a part of so much raw material, but a personal equation, a man, woman or child with individual wants, secret griefs and fears, trembling aspirations and great hopes for the future. Most of these port missionaries are foreign-born themselves; many came over in the steerage and landed at Ellis Island; all know exactly how it is with the bewildered newcomers.

The missionary ran up the steps to the women's detention quarters on the second floor. She was laughing and panting, for to-day she was twenty years young and her feet had the willingness of a young girl's. She waved to a man in uniform, sitting by a door, whose sign said warningly, "No admittance." He opened it for her, she passed into the room of the women, and they fell upon her like a swarm of locusts. She made a sign to an attendant, and, with the netted bag held high over her head, ran out, still laughing. Together they went down long corridors, white-tiled and immaculate, to the big dining-room, where twelve hundred hungry voyagers can sit at table. Here everything was bustle and brilliance, for this was the room chosen for the Christmas party. Two great, sparkling trees were flanked by long tables, and these were being piled high with presents for old and young. Just a few touches here and there and everything was ready.

Around the Christmas Tree at Ellis Island

Then the music struck up, and from the tiled corridor came the sound of heavy, shuffling feet trying to march, as the doors of the detention rooms were thrown open and the wondering occupants poured forth. The men filed into the dining-room first, the women came next, the girls and smaller children bringing up the rear. They are mostly Italians, dark-eyed, vivacious, swiftly responsive and easily moved to tears or smiles of pleasure at the music and the fascinating mounds of presents that they passed. Here and there, tragic, lowering, a Slav or a Russian passed by; now and then a brightly turbaned Oriental followed on the heels of a Hollander or Scandinavian. There were robust youths and maids; men bearded like patriarchs, and women bent and withered with much service. Two hopeless cripples dragged past in the line.

The tramping ceased and the orchestra, from a rollicking march, slowed into the first majestic bars of "America." Too often, the singing of our borrowed national hymn is a perfunctory thing. But when "America" is sung in halting English or wordlessly, by eight hundred men and women who have sold their all, turned their backs on the homes of their forefathers, and are standing at the gateway of the Promised Land, then "Sweet Land of Liberty" bursts forth as a prayer. That hymn to Liberty was a great sob full of pent-up, inexpressible emotion. Those faces, swarthy or pale, glowing with something that was to them a new hope, almost a new religion, held a tremendous significance.

The port chaplain, his own eyes moist, raised his hand and the room was stilled. It was a very little prayer, for he knew they could not understand a word he said. But they felt the sympathy in his voice and listened reverently. When a young Italian clergyman spoke his people huddled eagerly about him, responding to every word. Each missionary addressed his own people in their native tongue. They are very wise, these missionaries, in the needs of the people in their care. They knew just what the Christmas festival had meant to the emigrants at home—few gifts, for the spare pennies were few, but much good cheer and real devotion. They knew when to start the singing of the Italian, German, Russian, and Swedish national songs, in which the homesick travelers could join. But the children of the immigrants wearied of prayer and singing long before their elders. The material slaps and shakes had anything but a quieting effect upon the restless, wriggling little rebels, and squalls of wrath and pain began to break through the music; so when the signal came to move, a general sigh of satisfaction was distinctly audible. Two lines of attendants were formed and the men advanced singly. Hat and cap in awkward hands, they moved eagerly toward the tables. As they filed by, they received packages of stockings, handkerchiefs, fruits, German honey cake, and—apparently most welcome of all—two cakes apiece of scented soap. The popularity of those cakes of scented soap was instant and overwhelming. Certainly, none of the other gifts seemed so to delight the grown-ups, even when tentative nibbles proved conclusively that they were not exactly certain of the nature and purpose of the highly-perfumed white cakes.

The women and girls climbed on benches to watch the men and boys receive their presents. These folk had not been long enough in the New World to set aside the customs of the Old, where the dominant male comes first always, and at Ellis Island they were wise enough to conform to age-long prejudice. But when the men had passed into the corridors the subdued chatter threatened to burst into riotous gaiety. Grandmothers and girls alike bubbled over

WITH THE BALKAN RELIEF WORKERS

ANOTHER $1,000, FIFTH REMITTANCE, FORWARDED TO SOFIA. THE NEED AND HEROISM OF THE SUFFERERS

IN THE military school at Sofia, that has been turned into a hospital, two soldiers died the other night of their wounds. One of them, feeling his end near, handed the bullet that had been removed from his wound to the nurse attending him, saying: 'Please send this to my wife as a memento of the part I took in this war for the liberation of our brothers in Macedonia.' He also handed her his purse containing eight francs ($1.60), requesting that this be sent to his wife, who is left with six children. The other soldier, before breathing his last, also handed his purse, containing four francs (80 cents), asking that this amount be sent to his wife and children. Both of these men sent, through the nurse, their last greetings and benediction to their wives and children. They did not seem to regret having offered their lives for their country; their only grief was for the helpless ones who are left in want."

These are just two little incidents taken from a letter from the Rev. Dr. Stephan Tomoff, one of the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee in Sofia. They might be duplicated from another letter, and to them might be added the long stories of the privations and sufferings of those who are waiting—many hopelessly—for the heads of the families to return from the front. Dr. Tomoff, in his letter, gives the details of many of the horrible atrocities perpetrated by the retreating Turkish army. He says: "In Bansko, a small town in Macedonia, all the members of a Bulgarian family were ruthlessly murdered by the Turks when they saw that they would be forced to let the place be occupied by the advancing Bulgarian column. First, the father and mother were slain, then the two eldest daughters, who were teachers in the town school, and finally the little children.

"In the town of Serfidjeh, in southern Macedonia, the Turks murdered seventy-five men, of whom five were priests and most were the heads of families. A correspondent writing from the so-called Tcherna Scala (Black Rock), a stronghold recently captured by the Bulgarians, says:

"'I visited the lazaretto in Tsarevo Selo, where I talked with two wounded Bulgarians from the village of Gurnevo, who had barely escaped with their lives. In that place the Turks had perpetrated massacres that surpassed all former atrocities. A squadron of Turkish troops passed through the village and killed the Bulgarian peasants in their houses and yards. They compelled the men to lie on the ground, and shot them. In this way they killed one hundred and forty-seven. One of the wounded men could hardly speak. He whispered that the Turks first murdered his father before his eyes, then the other members of the family and finally his son, whom they compelled to lie down on the ground, and there shot him. Only a few hours after this, the Bulgarian troops met and defeated that body of Turks, almost annihilating them.'"

Mrs. Furnajieff writes: "Our wounded soldiers are arriving daily in hundreds. No more marching to the roll of the military drum for them, for they are all bandaged and pale from suffering. Sticks and crutches are in great demand, and many will never again walk without them. Yet, as they are carried from the station to the waiting cars, those of slighter wounds sing the national song and shout their hurrahs like American college boys returning from a football match that they have won.

"Heroism is contagious. It has taken hold of the women and children, the boys and the girls. Every one is anxious to be of service, ready to comfort those in tears, to succor hunger and help the starving, to work where there is need, night and day; in a word, to do his part in these strenuous days."

Some of the Convalescent Wounded at Dinner in the Hospital

The contributions toward the Balkan Relief Fund continue to flow through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office to the sufferers in Bulgaria and Macedonia. This week a fifth remittance, $1,000, is being sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Committee at Sofia.

That the appeal for the sufferers in the Balkan struggle has made a deep impression on the heart of sympathetic America is evidenced by hundreds of letters which have reached THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office. Many mention specially that part of the work which most stirs the heart of the writer. From Portland, Ore., J. E. W. writes: "Please use the enclosed to the very best advantage as you see it in relieving the sick and wounded in the war of the Allies and the Turks, and may God bless it and cause it to do some good." L. J. H., a Nova Scotian lady, encloses a bill, saying: "Please use this in aid of the Balkan widows and orphans and for the wounded soldiers. May our heavenly Father bless this glorious undertaking, and from his boundless store provide full and plenty for the brave sufferers." From A. P. W., of Falmouth, Va., comes this letter. After mentioning an enclosure the writer says: "To think of the suffering in that cold mountain climate without food or other comforts and of Christians being massacred is enough to make one weep. While we send up our Thanksgiving anthems for the peace and plenty of our homeland we are too apt to forget that even now our brothers and sisters in the East are hungry, and cold, and sick, and wounded, and dying. I hope this small sum may, when added to others, do some one good." The following additional contributions toward the Relief Fund have been received:

Christmas and Beyond

AS WE celebrate the Christmas festival in our homes and churches and public gatherings, let us not forget that the anniversary of the Advent has a double significance. Jesus came to earth, the world's Redeemer in the form of a little Child, and was cradled in a manger. When he comes again—and we have his own blessed assurance that he will—it will not be in the same humble wise, but the "nations shall see the Son of Man coming with power and great glory." This is the larger vision which ought to be associated with the Christmastide.

So as we listen to the Christmas songs, and while we take down the Old Book and read to the group around the blazing hearth the sweet story from the second chapter of Luke, which tells of the angel's message and the coming of the world's Redeemer, let us not forget that King Jesus will come again. It is a beautiful and sublime thought that this world is drawing nearer to that great event which is the logical rounding out of the prophecies. It brings to us a vision of a time when there will be no sects or denominational divisions in the Church of Christ; when all the old quarrels will be healed and when his followers will be everywhere united. And what a welcome he will receive! With what joy he will be acclaimed by those who have suffered for his sake and who, amid trials, privation and persecution, have remained faithful and true. Let us look beyond the Christmas Day, then, to this event for which the whole world longs, and let us so live and act and think and love that we may be worthy to welcome him.

Befogging the Issue

IT IS to be regretted that a journal usually so candid and fair-minded as the Catholic World should resort to unworthy attempts to befog the great issue now before the American people, viz.: the plan of the hierarchy and its official following to "Make America Catholic." In the December issue it endeavors to divert public attention from the main question by attributing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD purposes which do not enter into the present discussion at all. It objects most vociferously to the application of the term "Romanist" to its coreligionists in this country, denouncing such an appellation as "an ugly, malicious falsehood," of which this journal has been "knowingly guilty." "That we are Romanists in the good sense is our glory," it goes on to explain. "We recognize Pope Pius X, the Bishop of Rome, as the Vicar of Christ upon earth." . . . "To call them Romanists" in "the bad sense" it regards as an affront. It has evidently overlooked the fact that Pope Leo XIII in his letter of January 22, 1899, to Cardinal Gibbons on "True and False Americanism in Religion," himself declared that the Catholic Church was "rightly called Roman"; and it follows that a member of that church would be very properly designated as a "Romanist"—a term which does not necessarily convey a sense of disparagement, although the Catholic World seems to regard it as offensive in the highest degree. We wonder why. Our erudite neighbor the New York Sun points out that for a thousand years the term "Roman" was applied to Catholic Christianity. The Pope was "Pontifex Romanus." Bryce in his American Commonwealth (chap. 103), writes of the "Roman" Catholic Church and the "Roman fold" in America. Cardinal Amette, archbishop of Paris, in an address at Notre Dame Cathedral, Dec. 17, 1911, declared himself "Roman and French." Butler's Catechism (1852) carries the official approval on its pages of four "Roman" Catholic archbishops. The Vatican's own formula is "The Catholic Church, Apostolic and Roman." These examples from authoritative sources amply justify the use of "Romanist," not in any derogatory sense, but as a logical term in referring to Catholics, just as we use the words "Methodist," "Baptist," and "Christian Scientist" in speaking or writing of the members of these respective churches. Does the World think these good people would regard such terms as opprobrious? Not a bit of it!

Now, we can only view the ill temper of the Catholic World as a subterfuge to cover up its inability or unwillingness to face the real issue. It next takes another tack, also wide of the mark, when it goes on to say: "To an honest discussion [of religious principles] no one will take exception." If the editor of that publication has read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—and we make little doubt that he has—he must know that the question of religion, per se, has nothing to do with the present controversy. Catholics, Protestants, Christian Scientists, Jews and even Mohammedans all enjoy the same right and privilege of freedom of worship in this republic. We have never expressed a desire to begin a religious controversy with our Catholic brethren. The real issue lies in another direction altogether, and, moreover, it is one which has been raised not by Protestants, but by Catholic prelates and Catholic journals. They have forced it upon the attention of the nation. How else can the Catholic World interpret the voluntary and almost simultaneous action of the great Protestant assemblies—Presbyterian, Methodist, Episcopal, Congregational, Lutheran and Baptist—which uttered "the voice of the nation" in resolutions denouncing the political aims and aspirations of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in America? What moved them to take such definite action? It was such incidents as the setting up of a new and un-American claim of "precedence" by a cardinal of the church over the governor of an American State at a public banquet; the claims of the right of cardinals to the recognition due to "princes of the blood"; of their right to salutes by American warships that are usually accorded to princes. It was their strenuous efforts to secure increased political power and undue representation in Congress, on which subject one archbishop declared "The church can never have its own until this comes to pass," while a cardinal made the broad assertion: "Where the liberties of a people are committed to a Catholic, their liberties are safer than where committed to any other individual" (see New York Times, January 28 and October 9, 1911). It was incidents such as these, together with the glowing announcements in the daily press of the setting up of "thrones" for cardinals in America, that aroused the public spirit of inquiry and protest. It was the wild, boastful utterances of Catholic journals openly proclaiming themselves to the world as "Catholics first and Americans decidedly afterwards." If any Protestant body had attempted such things, it would have been instantly condemned by every sensible citizen, regardless of religion. But it was done and is still being done by Catholics, and yet the Catholic World, neither admitting nor denying these plain facts, attempts to persuade its readers that the criticisms of the non-Catholic press, including, of course, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, are malicious, un-Christian and untrue. No; it is not a religious controversy, but it is an arraignment by the American people of a church which has gone so far and so flagrantly out of its sphere that the time has arrived for rebuke.

A New Slaughter of Innocents

THE story of the slaughter of the little children of Bethlehem at the order of anxious Herod has always been a sad paragraph in the sweet Christmas chapter of the Gospel story. Now as Christmas time comes round again, there is, in the midst of the merriment, a new strain of surprise and sadness as the revelations are being made of the sufferings of little children in the perplexing tangle of our nation's industries.

Shocking revelations have been made to the New York State Factory Investigating Commission, which has been holding sessions in a number of the cities of the State. Most startling were the revelations made by Miss Mary Louisa Chamberlain, who gathered during the past summer a supply of first-hand information by getting employment in several canning factories and making careful notes of her observations. By some sort of manipulation the recent reform measure limiting the hours of factory labor for women and children exempted the canneries from these restrictions. The plea was made that since the season of fruit and vegetable gathering is short and the crops must be cared for hastily as soon as they ripen, it is necessary to crowd the laborers. But it is appallingly poor economy to destroy the health of the women and children of a State to protect one of its industries.

Saddest of all, at Christmas time, are the tales of sleepy little babies in city tenements put and kept at work making dolls for the Christmas trade. It seems that baby fingers can do part of the work better than fingers fully grown. Could there be a more grotesque and pitiful irony? Frail babies of poor people drained of their scant vitality and robbed of their scant pleasures to provide toys for the children of the well-to-do!

In the midst of our Christmas giving and Christmas singing and Christmas feasting, let the people of our States plan for a Christmas gift worth while—the gift of life and liberty to the sad hosts of child laborers throughout our prosperous land.

The Road to High Ideals

I have been receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about five years. It was subscribed for me through the kindness of a dear old grandmother, who, thinking I might go astray in this game of life, thought your paper would be a guide for me, I suppose. Not being used to such reading or literature, I did not take to it for quite a while; but I always did like truth, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD seemed to be full of it, and I must honestly say it just seemed to plead for me to lead a clean life. It has taught me to seek higher ideals, and makes me believe more and more that we have great power in God, if we will only give in and live up to his great laws, which give us strength to be of use to God and our fellow man.

Now, I am anxious for some one else to get a lift from your paper. Surely you would know one who needs it, so I am sending $1.50 for one year's subscription, if you will kindly see to it and oblige

A READER OF YOUR PAPER.

Sacramento, Calif.

WE PRINT the foregoing, not because the writer, from being indifferent, has grown to be a lover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but because his letter is corroborative of many others which unite in declaring that, under Providence, this journal has been to them a means of spiritual uplift, strength and encouragement. This is precisely what the editors desire the paper to be to all of its readers—a Gospel messenger, a safe counselor, a faithful guide and a leader to higher ideals and nobler living. We feel it to be a very gracious thing that our efforts are made instrumental, even in a humble way, in bringing about such results. We know that many of our readers share in this feeling and that they, like the California subscriber quoted above, believe in "passing on" the blessing to others. The most direct way of showing one's gratitude for help thus received is to assist others to the same privilege by sending them a subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This is real home missionary work in which all may have a share. There could be no more appropriate time than the Christmas season for such a gift. Don't forget that we are making a special price of $2.25 for two subscriptions to all who wish to have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent to a friend as well as to themselves. If you take advantage of this opportunity, a copy of The Christian Herald Almanac will be sent with each subscription FREE.

Discoveries at Pompeii and Cumæ

THE International Archeological Congress meeting at Rome, and including the most famous scientists of Europe and America, after having completed its important work, went to Naples to visit the ruins of Pompei, Cumæ and Pæstum, which, under the direction of Professor Victor Spinazzola, have given wonderful results in the last few months by the complete and wise policy of making use of all the ruins. He has been able to reconstruct the balconies, windows, façades, and in some cases entire houses. It is a new demonstration of the life of the time when those places were destroyed. The frescos which ornamented the façades of these houses gives an effective idea of the luxury of the past. The excavations at Cumæ, which have only just begun, promise very important results. Cumæ dates back from the time when the Romans captured the town from the Samnites, and it became a very fashionable resort, where Cæsar, Cicero and other famous Romans built their luxurious villas. The place is mentioned in the works of Virgil. The excavations at Cumæ promise to be even more significant than those of Pompeii itself. The spade is busy revealing the material, intellectual and religious records of the past. These revelations are corroborating many of the stories of the Bible, and are making contributions to the knowledge of the present that can hardly be calculated. The paths of science seriously followed naturally lead to God, the Author of all truth and wisdom. The excavators at Pompeii and Cumæ are in search of knowledge and their work suggests the words of the wise man:

Yea, if thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding; if thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures; then thou shalt understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God. (Prov. 2: 3-5.)

Suffragist Against Bible

A WOMAN in Chicago the other day advocating female suffrage in an address said: "We cannot accept the Bible as a divine inspiration, because it features the male sex in everything, almost to the exclusion of the female. In the Bible we know God is represented as a man, Christ as a man, the apostles as men, and women are commanded to obey their husbands. The Bible was written by men at a time when women were chattels." Fortunately few women, and few women who advocate female suffrage, share the unbelief of the Chicago speaker. The old Testament gave woman a higher place than the literatures of any of the contemporary nations. It recorded a Miriam at the head of a band of women shouting over victories, a Deborah leading an army, a prophetess and a judge, a mother of Samuel, whose songs were a part of the sacred hymns, a mother of Lemuel, the ideal woman of the world's best literature, ancient or modern. Aristotle regarded women as beings midway between freemen and slaves. Plato said that "a woman's virtue is to order her house, to keep what is indoors, and to obey her husband." The Grecian daughter could not inherit a penny of her father's estate. All women were counted as minors. Seneca was bitter against the women of his time. It would scarcely be known from his writings that Cicero ever had a mother. Pliny in an essay commends the action of his friend who celebrated the funeral of his wife with a gladiatorial fight, indicating, however, regret that the African panthers intended for the occasion had been delayed by a storm. It was the nations of the past that had no Bible that underestimated, oppressed and degraded the millions of their women. And in heathen lands at this time there are hundreds of millions of women occupying an inferior relation to man, and many of them pressed down to the point of intolerable slavery to the men in body, mind and soul. The New Testament is full of reverence for, love of, and loyalty to womanhood. A woman was the mother of the Babe in Bethlehem, the Christ of the Bible. Women were his warmest friends and supporters. They were the last to leave the cross, the first to find the Saviour's tomb. They have furnished about two-thirds of all of the membership of the churches since the days of Christ. Christianity has given to women her largest liberty, her greatest opportunity, her highest dignity, her sweetest joy and most exalted hope for this life and that which is to come. It is fortunate for both church and state that our women are believers and not unbelievers, and that Christ can address most of the women of our land in the words he once used:

O woman, great is thy faith. (Matt. 15: 28.)

Christianity and National Life

MR. JAMES J. HILL, the railroad magnate, was present at the dedication of a building for the North Star College at Warren, Minn., which he had erected at an expense of $50,000. He made a significant address, in which he pointed out an agreement between science and Christianity, and gave several reasons why Christianity should be taught in the public schools. He concluded with these words: "No nation can exist without a true Christian spirit behind it, and laws that forbid teaching Christianity are the weakest things in our government. I hope to see the decalogue in every schoolroom." The Bible and the Christ of the Book will be the measure of the mental growth and virtue of the children of the republic and of the prosperity of the nation. For childhood, manhood or the nation the words of the Psalmist are of practical significance:

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. (Ps. 119: 105.)

King Not Whisky Manufacturer

A FOREIGN correspondent of a Chicago paper said this recently: "Few people outside English court circles are aware that King George is a whisky distiller on a large scale, and that the famous Lochnagar whisky is produced on his Balmoral estate, the great distilleries being situated about two miles from the castle. They supply not only the royal cellars, as well as those of the Kaiser and of the Czar, but also many of the leading clubs in London and the market genrally, the revenues derived therefrom by King George's privy purse being enough to pay every penny of expense in connection with the maintenance of the Balmoral castle and estate, and to leave a handsome profit besides." Rev. John Lee, D.D., a Methodist minister of the Rock River Conference, which includes the city of Chicago, wrote King George, informing him of the charge made against him. In due time he received from the King's private secretary the following letter, dated at Buckingham Palace, October 30: "The private secretary presents his compliments to the Rev. John Lee and is commanded by the king to acknowledge the receipt of his letter of the 14th inst. In reply, the private secretary begs to inform Dr. Lee that there is no truth in the report referred to in his communication." Lying is always bad; it is especially so when it is widespread in its consequences. Some fanatics who thought they were good temperance people and Christians, but who were mistaken, circulated openly and widely the wicked falsehood that President McKinley was a saloonkeeper. The only basis for the slander was that Mr. McKinley's wife inherited from her father's estate a hotel which had on it a long lease, the proprietor of which took out a license to sell liquor. Mr. McKinley tried hard to buy off the lease and prevent the sale of liquor on the premises, but failed. President McKinley told one of our most intimate friends that in all his public life he had never been so keenly stung as by the false slander persisted in by Christians and church people who ought to have been his best friends. The more recent charge made broadcast that one of the most illustrious citizens of the land was a confirmed inebriate, on his way to a drunkard's grave and a drunkard's hell, was just as false as the other slanders, though made by those who claimed to be church members. A lie against a king, a late President or an ex-President, or any one else, told however loud or long, can never become a truth, but will be eventually exposed. Truth is self-revealing in its nature. The vile slander hurts worst the person indulging in it, as the thief steals most from himself. The false charge is forbidden by the Ten Commandments and by Christ's royal law of love, on which the commandments rest.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor. (Ex. 20: 16.)

Giant Gun Bursts

ONE of the fourteen-inch guns was shattered into fragments during a test at the Fort Hancock reservation at Sandy Hook the other day. Portions of the barrel weighing three thousand pounds were hurled a quarter of a mile out into the ocean. The test was made with a charge of 320 pounds of powder and a projectile weighing 1,660 pounds. The masonry was wrecked, the breechblock was reduced to fragments, and the outer casting of the gun was ripped open for nearly half of its length. The great gun, which had cost the government $130,000 of the people's hard-earned money, was dismantled and its muzzle rested in the sand, worthless save for the junkheap. Though all of the men operating the gun were stunned and one of them was thrown into the air, fortunately no one was killed. A commission of investigation will report the cause of the disaster. It is pretty certain that it was the result of a flaw in the casting. In the present state of civilization in the world huge guns for coast defense will be necessary for a while; but the explosion of the giant gun and the wicked waste of money in its destruction awaken in us the hope that such mammoth murdering engines may all be abolished, and our nation enjoy the era of peace, which Christ came into this world to bring to nations as well as to the individual heart. The prophet saw the Babe to be born and called him

The Price of Peace. (Isa. 9: 6.)

A CHRISTMAS SERMON

GOOD TIDINGS AND GREAT JOY

BY CHARLES AUBREY EATON, D.D.*

Text: Luke 2: 8-18

NIGHT upon the fields and in the city and upon the silent stretches of the sea. The world at rest, except a little band of humble men keeping watch over their flocks upon the Judean grazing grounds; just shepherds, lowest of all laborers, dull of mind, unlearned in the language of life. The night winds sound their trumpets along the passes of the hills: "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament sheweth his handiwork," even as when the shepherd king looked upon the Syrian stars. But these simple shepherds heard not the mystic voices of the night nor saw the splendors of the sky. Their thoughts were of feeding flocks and wild beasts prowling for prey. They wished only the morning and rest.

"And lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you: ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, good will toward men."

Time's Greatest Event

The Bible is always a book of contrasts because it deals with human life, but nowhere in all the unfolding drama of redemption are there more amazing contrasts than here. In a moment there flowers upon these common men engaged in common tasks the vast and solemn mystery of eternity. The shepherds and the angel of God; the feeding flocks and the rejoicing heavenly hosts; sordid fear and deliverance for all men; meager existence amidst the sheepfolds and the rolling floods of eternal glory bearing to a world the message of mankind's redemption. O wondrous night! when eternity lifted time into its bosom, heaven was thrilled with joy unspeakable and full of glory, and men were afraid because they did not know.

The birth of Christ is the greatest event in the annals of time. While the glory of God is revealed in creation there seems to be a nobler glory surrounding his work of redemption. When the dawn of the world broke and the morning stars sang together man came forth from God. Designed for dominion, he became a slave. Born for life, he fell into the dark abyss of death. Offspring of infinite holiness, he sullied his spirit with sin.

After long millenniums the world lay prostrate under the shadow of universal ruin. Religion had become a burden. Philosophical systems led only to despair. All societies were breaking down of their own weight. Tyranny and force were the foundations of government. But God had not forgotten. In his heart were the purposes of love and at last he appears among men in the person of the Eternal Son, to recreate the world which had wandered from him. Well might the heavenly host break forth into praise. This is the essence and meaning of the Christmas time. Salvation has come to stricken men. Salvation from sin in its power, its guilt and its consequence. Salvation from despair and hate and fear and failure. Salvation from self and selfishness. The world and all men in it may be born anew from above. The Saviour has come and death shall reign no more.

The Gift of God

Redemption of men through the gift of his Son is a glorious work of God. It opens infinite vistas of thought and possibility. It identifies the eternal with time, gives new values and meaning to life, and kindles afresh that "spark which animates our clod." "One world at a time" was the sneering protest of a noted unbeliever in the supernatural. But even without God "one world at a time" is impossible. The stars cling to each other by gravitation as inevitable as their own existence. The tides throb response to other worlds. All life drinks sustenance from the distant sun. You can cross the oceans only by the guidance of the stars. And when you enter the mysterious region of the soul you feel at once a subtle and persistent outreach after that which lies beyond. It is not an idle fancy of superstitious ignorance that God has appeared among men. Nay, rather it is the inevitable, the logical attention of a Father to the welfare of his childen whom he loves. He made the world, and now in Christ he remakes the world. Regeneration of the race through Christ is even more wonderful than its generation through Adam. In Adam all die, because all have sinned; and the wages of sin is death. In Christ all shall be made alive, because in him the Gift of God is eternal life. Left to himself, the moral history of man attaches itself to and springs out of a principle of decay. With the coming of our divine Redeemer the world-history of man is identified afresh with the glorious God. We are hid with Christ in God. The law of sin and death gives place to the law of love, holiness and life. Peace has come to earth and found lodgment amidst the din of battle. The grim anguish of death is penetrated by a new hope. And because peace is now possible in a world of struggle, and good will falls like the dew of heaven upon hearts throbbing with hate, let us join with the heavenly hosts in their glad ascriptions of praise and thanksgiving. Glory to God in the highest. A new creation has dawned upon the world.

It is not surprising that the birth of the Saviour should be announced to men so lowly. Christ came to bring life. And life always grows from the lower to the higher; from simple to complex; from the one to the many. A religion designed by God for the salvation of all men everywhere must be more than a cult, or a system. It must be in its essence life, and it must impart life. Cults and systems may grow out of it as leaves and fruit grow upon a tree; but like the tree it cannot grow upward and outward unless it grow downward. It must be planted in the earth before it can spread its branches in the air. The coming of Christ set the heavenly hosts to singing for joy because at last the poor had the good news of life eternal preached unto them. Glory to God in the highest because he thrust the precious seed of the new life of man into humble lives. Let the shepherds tell their story. God has spoken to them, and through them to all that are oppressed and weak.

The Message of Christmas

It is Christmas time again. No portents fill the sky for us. No angelic hosts break from the engulfing silence to ravish our ears with heavenly harmonies. Rather it has become to many a season of hectic commercialism. The giving of gifts has been caught in the coarse clutch of buying and selling. Crowds throng the market places, not to rejoice in Christ our Saviour, but often to buy things they cannot afford to give to people who do not need. The spirit is being killed by the letter. The symbol has taken the place of the substance. It is not a time of spiritual uplift; of vision, and response to eternal realities. The hardest month in the year for the doing of religious work in city churches is December; and it is the hardest and most fruitless because it is the month in which we celebrate the birth of our divine Redeemer. Everybody is tired. My friend, stop a moment. "There is born this day to you in the city of David a Saviour." "Yes, yes; but how shall I make forty gifts when I have only enough money to pay for five?" "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace." "Yes, yes; but delays in delivery of bundles are most vexatious." "Fear not; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." "Oh, yes; but do you think my presents expensive enough?"

This madness cannot last. The day is too great; its message too divine. Already there are signs of reaction. The real spirit of the day struggles for supremacy, and it will win. The message of Christmas is all told in the word of the angel. "There is born unto you this day a Saviour." Good news indeed for the Shepherds! And for us!

The world has many needs, but most of all it needs a Saviour. Not a series of propositions about religion; not a study in psychology; not a ritual nor a polity; but a personal Saviour who loves us and gives himself for us and to us. This is the need of every life, and Christ is the Saviour we need.

Let Us Go to His Cradle

Let us go with the shepherds to his cradle. Unlike them, we know the story of the centuries. We behold in him the incarnate love and life and power and wisdom and justice of the eternal God. We see in the matchless beauty of his manhood the ideal possibilities of human nature. We have seen him in his manger cradle and we have seen him upon the cross. We know that in the compass of his spirit there has been fought to a triumphant issue the whole battle of human life. He is a Saviour indeed, because he comes from God, the only begotten Son. In him the Creator recreates the lost world. He is a Saviour to all men, because he is man as well as God. Tempted in all points like as we, yet is he without sin. He lived our life, bore our sorrows, died our death, suffered for our sins, rose again for our justification. He is our Saviour. He knows while we are ignorant; he is strong where we are weak; good where we are bad; victorious where we are beaten. He writes the promise of God's love like a rainbow in our tears. He changes the grave into a door of hope. He makes our very weakness to become glorious strength. Oh, thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

With the song of the angels in our ears, with the spell and passion of our Saviour's spirit upon our hearts, how shall we spend our Christmas? First of all, with him. It is his birthday. Because he lived we live here and shall live more gloriously hereafter. Begin the day with him. Look upon his face. Let him kindle the lamp of your soul.

Then with him live your day. To those dear ones in your home bring your love. Thank God for them and they will thank God for you. Give simple gifts that shall symbolize your love. You love because God loved you and gave himself in Christ for you. Think of Christ at Christmas.

Do not send gifts to those who know no need. Send them your love. Write them a letter. Let them hear in the glad accents of your voice the echo of angelic acclaim. We have a Saviour, and in him we have everything. Glory to God in the highest; because Love has found a habitation in the hearts of men.

If you have money for many gifts or few, give something to the children of the poor. A doll for a little girl; something for the boy who has nothing and who needs love brought to him in symbols. Remember the sick and the homesick. Do as Jesus did. He blessed the children. He had compassion. Let your soul enlarge itself by a day of companionship with him. You have no sorrows that he cannot heal. Do not be sad if you are growing old, and the children have gone far away, and you sit in the twilight. Beyond the evening sky the sun is shining. Beyond the silence is song. And you have a Saviour. He will make your old heart young. Spend the day with him, and the saddest of memories will become sweetest. If no gift is left at your door and no friendly voice wishes you a merry Christmas, you have the gift of God's love, and his voice speaks gently if you will only hear.

The shepherds, anxious about their flocks, dreamed not that God was near. Yet all eternity was blazing with the glory of redemption, and song was sounding like ocean upon summer shores. Listen; for heaven is very near. Look up and behold the angels. You have a Saviour. He is here to-day. Welcome him and give glory to God!

AS YE TWINE THE WREATHS OF HOLLY

AS YE twine the wreaths of holly,
And the plumy fir boughs free,
All the dear home walls to brighten,
As ye trim the Christmas tree
With the many dear love tokens
That ye give with lavish hand,
All the wee loved hearts to gladden
Of your own dear childish band,

As ye hear their laughter ringing,
As they romp with happy play,
As ye hear their voices singing
In their joy this holy day,
See ye not, beyond the windows,
Sad eyes longing, looking in,
Faces pale with want and sorrow,
Faces marred with shame and sin?

Have ye seen the little children
Crying in your sight for bread?
Drawn with pain their little faces,
Shivering with the cold so dread?
Do you know the Christ Child loves them?
That he's asking you to give,
From the bounteous stores he's given,
Bread that these may eat and live?

Can you turn away unheeding,
Careless since your own wee band
All are safe, no sad want knowing,
Since he opened wide his hand
Unto you with kingly giving?
What if yours stood in their stead?
Will you not his poor remember?
Give that these, too, may be fed?

The School, Its Teachers and the Home

WHEN a family moves into a new community the question first asked, if there are children to be considered, is whether there is a good school in the neighborhood. The school should by preference be conveniently near the home. It ought to be well warmed and lighted, and the several grades should be cared for by competent teachers. Whenever ground is broken for a new town, one of the best locations is selected for the school which shall attract the children. Yet in many a country neighborhood boys and girls are well and thoroughly taught by the little school-ma'am, who is herself one of the finest forces in civilization. There is a little hamlet in the mountains of northern New York, thirty miles from a railroad station, and so shut in by deep drifts through the winter that the mail is often delayed for weeks, in which, remote as it is, a teacher has lived and labored for nearly twenty years. She foregoes the comforts and luxuries that might be hers nearer her own home, and contentedly and cheerfully stays among the people in the mountains in order that she may send from their fastness after a while boys and girls fit to serve and earn their living in the large cities. She has books and papers and culture, and all that she has and is she freely gives to her pupils and their families.

The mother who invites such a teacher as the most honored guest does more for her children by showing that hospitality than she could possibly do in another way. The children obtain a glimpse of the teacher in her personal character, and she becomes better acquainted with them in the home than when they meet only in the schoolroom.

Concerning Church Fairs

BEING asked whether he considered it consistent with Christian teaching that the Church resort to bazaars, etc., as a means of increasing the finances, Professor David Smith makes this reply in the British Weekly:

"Misgiving is inevitable when one remembers how our Lord dealt with the traffickers in the court of the temple: 'Take these things hence; make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.' Yet indiscriminate condemnation is generally a mistake; for institutions are seldom absolutely good or bad, and it is usually the spirit which animates them that determines their legitimacy. I confess that I cannot help thinking rather kindly of bazaars, when I remember the experience of my own happy ministry. One of the pleasantest institutions in my dear old congregation was a ladies' work party, which met regularly during the winter in the lesser hall of the church. I never visited the work party without remembering how it is written in the story of the building of the tabernacle in the wilderness (Exod. 35: 25) that 'all the women that were wise-hearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, the blue, and the purple, the scarlet, and the fine linen.' And the truly religious aspect of the institution was revealed to me when an active member of the party, the daughter of a godly working-class home, told me how she felt about it. She had no money to give the church, but she could give her time and her work; and she gave these gladly for the Master's sake. And thus I learned that a bazaar may be a sacred opportunity, a 'means of grace,' an outlet of Christian love and devotion. My experience then has disposed me rather favorably to bazaars; yet there is no denying that the institution is liable to serious abuse, and in these days, it seems to me, the abuse frequently approximates to a scandal. The only way of avoiding the abuse of an institution is to define its use; and, to my mind, the guiding principle here is that the bazaar is essentially abnormal; it is a legitimate adventure, but it should never be made a regular function of congregational life. No congregation is in a healthy condition when its income is inadequate to its expenditure; for this means the preponderance of waste overrepair. Of course, there may be an occasional deficit, but this should need only to be brought before the members to be amply supplied by their free-will offerings. Wherever there is a live population, it is poor preaching that is responsible for sparse attendances and niggardly contributions. The minister must do his honest part by strenuous devotion to the supreme office of the study of the Word. This is the sure secret of congregational prosperity: and there is no other, neither pastoral visitation nor pious rapture."

HOPE

THE world is asleep, all hushed is nature's warm, sweet breath,
The world is asleep and dreaming the silent dream of snow;
But through the silence that seems like the silence of death
Under the shroud of ermine the souls of the roses glow.

And forever the heart of the water throbs and beats,
Though bound by a million gleaming fetters and crystal rings;
No sound on lonesome mornings the lonely watcher greets—
But the frosty pane is impressed with the shadow of coming wings.

Do You Know Your Bible?

ANSWERS to the November questions will be published next week, together with the Honor Roll for the month. As soon as the replies to the December questions reach the office the Honor Roll for the year and the announcement of prizes will appear. Here are the new questions, closing the lessons for 1912:

LIST NO. 12

1. What man was tempted five times to leave the great work he was doing, but stood firm at his post?
2. Where is a kind of copper mentioned which was said to be as precious as gold?
3. On what occasion were people helped to understand the word of God by its being read "distinctly"?
4. What verse contains four exhortations to sing praises?
5. Each of two verses in the same part of the same chapter contains the words "beams," "doors," "locks" and "bars." Find the verses.
6. On what occasion did priests and Levites of Israel weep with a loud voice while many shouted aloud for joy?
7. The five verses of the seventieth Psalm are a practical repetition of a part of what other Psalm?
8. What king of Judah earnestly sought God when he was but sixteen years of age and began to accomplish a great work at the age of twenty?
9. Of what king is it said that he and his people were "guided on every side"?
10. What king was mighty because he "prepared his ways before the Lord"?
11. Which one of the miracles of Christ is related in all four Gospels?
12. In what two chapters, in different epistles, does Paul show that faith brings us into the family of Abraham and thus makes us heirs of the promise given to him and his descendants?

Among our faithful students is a brave soul whose work should stimulate all the rest to their best endeavors. This lady believes in the old proverb: "If at first you don't succeed," etc. She writes: "I have had very little use of my eyes at night for fifteen years." This statement explains the first part of her note: "I was so discouraged when the last answers came I thought it did not pay for me to tax my weak eyes and send the answers in. I was too rusty and dull for the HERALD class. But I found myself at it again, and this is the best I can do." But her best is perfect, and she sends twelve correct answers to the November questions.

—MISS LOTTIE PHELPS, 2209 Spencer Street, Omaha, Neb., writes: "My father, J. H. Phelps, who lives here, will be eighty-eight years old on January 3. As he is something of a 'shut-in,' I would like to make the day a pleasant one for him, and I wonder if THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family (of which he has been a member for more than twenty years), would kindly remember him with letters or postal cards on that day. He has been a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church for more than sixty years; he organized the Presbyterian Sunday school in Burr Oak, Mich., in 1855, and was its superintendent for nearly twenty years."

THE VISITOR

A CHRISTMAS STORY COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE. BY OWEN OLIVER

THE lights of Halsham Junction blinked at me through the snowstorm as I walked along Station Alley on Christmas Eve. I saw the down light change red to green and knew that the last train was "on." I heard the engine snort as it started from Halstead Town, and it puffed loudly as it struggled up the incline. I was close to the station before the bright cars overtook me, and turned the passage into a dazzle of white. I had only to run fifty yards to catch the train; but I did not run. The four-mile tramp across the snow appealed to me more than my own fireside.

I think my decision was only semi-conscious; but, when I had passed the station, a voice within accused me, as if one part of myself spoke to another: "You lost the train deliberately." The other part answered sharply, like a man who is confronted unexpectedly with an unpleasant fact: "Yes; I know."

I had been married a little over three years, and in those years life had changed gradually from an affair of two to an affair of one. I had realized this for a long while, but I had refused to set it out plainly in my mind before. Now that I had done so, the change seemed to demand explanation. I accepted the alienation between Margaret and myself as established beyond alteration and past regret; but I puzzled how it had come about; puzzled till I left the outskirts of the town and came into the open road. Then the great white world invaded my mind and crowded my little affairs out.

The snowstorm had stopped suddenly, and the black sky had cleared. The full moon had come out above the white hills; the blinking stars were watching her ride. The frost was creeping upon the earth like an unseen army of pigmies with tiny nipping fingers. The white carpet had crispened under my feet. Crish, crish, crish! The snow and the moonshine made a fairy phantasy of everything. The fleecy bushes seemed turned into flocks of sheep, and the white-robed trees into shepherds who guarded them. . . . "While shepherds watched their flocks by night." I hummed the carol that I learned at my mother's knee; and my memory passed on to other tales of Christmastide that I learned there. . . . The gabled house up on the knoll might be the home of Santa Claus. The queer-shaped cloud between his house and the moon might be the chariot waiting to carry him through the air to drop his gifts down the chimneys of good little girls and boys. The tall, besnowed countryman who strode down the lane which slanted to the main road might be Santa Claus himself. He carried a great sack over his shoulder, just as the good saint might have done. It was the hour when every year he walked abroad. I played with the fancy awhile. When the heart is empty we fill it with creatures of the brain.

Our ways joined at the signpost. He slowed his steps a little, as if he waited for me. I took a good look at him in the moonlight, and was glad that closer inspection did not dispel my illusion. He seemed somewhat young for the kindly Visitor—I thought that snow rather than age whitened his long hair and beard—but he was sufficiently like the picture of my imagination to satisfy me; a more saintly Santa Claus than my childish pictures; but still Santa Claus. He had a noble face; peaceful and wondrously kind.

"Good evening, Santa Claus," I greeted him, hoping that he would enter into my fancy.

"A happy Christmas, friend," he answered.

His voice was singularly pleasing; deep and full and yet sweet, and like his face marvelously kind. I knew at once that he was no ordinary countryman.

"You are a stranger here, sir," I suggested.

"Not quite a stranger," he answered, "a visitor."

Drawn by Robert W. Amick

"A happy Christmas, friend," he answered

"Of course," I agreed; "the Christmas Visitor!"

"I come every year at Christmas," he said, and smiled. Evidently he was quite disposed to humor my jest.

"With your bag of gifts," I said; and I, too, smiled.

"With my bag of gifts," he assented.

"For the good little boys and girls; and perhaps for the naughty little boys and girls too, if they have promised to be better."

"For all my little children," he said, "and sometimes for children who have grown bigger."

"Then there might be one for me," I laughed.

"There may be one for you," he told me.

He smiled again, and I smiled again.

"The fancy is in keeping with the night," I remarked. "You must not spoil my illusion."

"Illusions are better than the truth sometimes," he remarked, "and truer!"

"Then you should carry some in your bag," I told him.

"My bag is full of illusions," he replied.

"Hush!" I implored. "Let me believe it is full of toys for Santa Claus's children."

"Was there ever a toy without an illusion?" he asked. "Does any child find a wooden horse, or a waxen doll on Christmas morning? The boy mounts a prancing steed and rides off through fairyland to kill the giant and slay the dragon and rescue the beautiful princess. The girl finds a sleeping princess; and, when she kisses her, for the prince, and picks her up, the princess opens her eyes and lives. You say it is a leaden ball at the end of a wire that wakes her. The child says it is the kiss of love. Which explanation is best?"

"Explanations have to follow facts, unfortunately," I protested.

"In the great things of life," he stated gravely, "the facts have to follow the creations of the mind, which you call illusions. It is the illusion of love which wakes the princess."

"And hard fact which changes the illusions," I commented, "including the princess!" I sighed.

"Ah!" he said gently. "Is that your trouble, friend? You have lost the illusions which made a fair princess? And now you see just a waxen doll?"

"No," I denied. "No. . . . She is a very beautiful lady. . . . She who was my princess."

"But you find her ungracious? Or dull?"

"Her grace remains," I asserted, "although . . . She is not ungracious, even to me. She is certainly not dull."

"Is it greatness of mind that she lacks—the illusion gone?"

I shook my head.

"My—the lady whom I called my princess is not petty-minded or small," I declared. "She bears herself very nobly."

"But the soul that you saw in her? Is it that which you see no more? Or"—he looked at me keenly—"is it virtue that you miss?"

"Sir," I said haughtily, "the lady is my wife; and I can leave my honor in her hands. She is a high-souled woman, and there is no virtue that she misses."

The stranger looked at me again.

"There would seem to have been little need of illusion," he commented, with a touch of severity. "What fault do you find with this excellent lady, now that your illusion has passed?"

"I find no fault with her," I told him. "You cannot blame the doll—but she is no doll—that the child grows older and the illusion is gone."

"But I can blame the princess," he retorted, "and the prince. I gather that the illusion was about your relations to each other. You expected to live in love and concord; and in plain fact you quarrel."

"Scarcely that," I dissented. "We have had no bitter quarrel. . . . Sometimes I have thought it would be better with us if we had! We—it is as if fate—"

He held up his hand.

"You are part of fate," he told me. "You and she. Remember that."

"As if we," I substituted, "had mixed two unlike

FIFTY-TWO GREAT SERMONS

AFTER all is said and done in religious work, the preached Word continues to be the steadiest and strongest agency for the spread of the Gospel and the development of Christian character. It is bewildering to think of the number of sermons preached in Christendom every week, yet THE CHRISTIAN HERALD feels justified in stating that the very best of this world-wide message from the pulpits of the Christian Church is offered to its readers through its Sermon Page. No other part of the paper is edited with more painstaking care and earnest discrimination.

The Sermons are evangelical and deal with the fundamental facts of faith and life; not with minor points about which Christians differ and dispute.

The series for 1913 will bring conviction to the unconverted, counsel to the harassed, comfort to the sorrowing, inspiration for work, instruction in the Scriptures, guidance toward places of spiritual power and victory, and practical help and encouragement for the problems and tasks of daily life. There will be also inspiration in the thought that you form a part of this world-wide congregation listening to the best thought and utterances of the leaders and teachers of the Church Militant.

Among those who will contribute these 52 vital, helpful Sermons will be the following:

FREE To Yearly Subscribers

THE new CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC contains 108 pages, eight more than last year. It is a book of facts and figures that will be found constantly useful in every Christian household. In addition to the calendar and special information concerning dates, holidays, and facts pertaining to the year 1913 itself, it is a liberal compendium of useful knowledge on all subjects, but particularly those which have an immediate interest for CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

Progress of Religion

For instance, there is an article entitled "The Progress of Religion," which is a preface to eighteen pages of statistics and information relating to the various religious bodies or denominations in the United States—what they are, what they do and what they number. These statistics have been prepared especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC by H. K. Carroll, LL.D., who was religious statistician of the United States Census.

Another section of the ALMANAC is devoted to the government of the United States. It contains many statistics concerning the government officials, the various bureaus at Washington, the public debt of the United States, Post Office regulations, the Census, Immigration, etc.

Following this is a section devoted to comparative statistics of all States, showing their area, largest cities, population, agriculture, minerals, wealth, schools and public charities.

Other Features

"The Market Garden" is treated very fully, and so is "The Great American Hen."

A page entitled "The Liquor Traffic" shows the progress of prohibition throughout the world.

"The Realm of Woman" is full of interest for the homemaker.

"While Waiting for the Doctor" tells you what to do in case of accident before the physician arrives.

Of course there are tables of weights and measures, interest laws of the States, "Things the Farmer Should Know," "Household Hints," "Hints for the Care of Children," and "Facts Worth Remembering" concerning mountains, islands, rivers, cities, railways, etc.

Finally there are fiction stories, great thoughts of great men, pages of humorous material and jokes—jokes which can be read with innocent enjoyment in any Christian household.

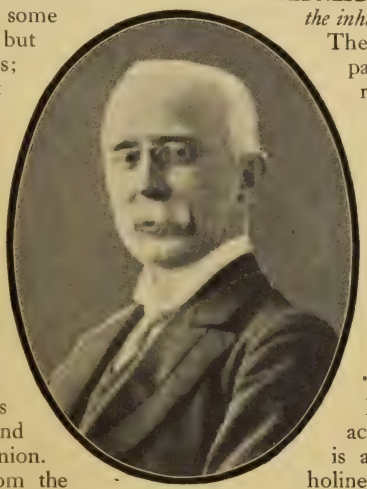
DR. JOWETT'S DAILY MEDITATIONS

A BIBLE THOUGHT FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

THERE is probably no more spiritual writer or preacher in the American pulpit to-day than Dr. J. H. Jowett. He speaks to vast audiences, and his discourses always have the clear evangelical note which assures them of a welcome everywhere. He is not like some spiritual writers, a dreamer or a visionary, but rather a preacher of practical righteousness; a loving guide who leads us by the quiet valleys and pleasant waters of God's mercies; a wise counselor in worldly troubles and difficulty, and a safe adviser for those who are sick of soul and wearied with the battle of life. In these Meditations Dr. Jowett gives a daily tonic to every one who reads them—a daily thought that will prove helpful in developing the spiritual life—a daily ministry of hope and encouragement and of restfulness in the Divine help and favor. Religion with him becomes a very personal thing. We realize in these Meditations the meaning of living "near to God" and walking with Christ as Saviour and Companion. They are a daily morning draught from the wellspring of "living water"; a morning anthem of praise; a sunrise song in the heart; a putting on of the garments of holiness. Regularly read, the Meditations will be the setting up of an altar in every home, at which all may get strength and grace for the trials and labors of the day. They are the choicest gift in our New Year's budget. The following is the New Year's Day Meditation:



DR. J. H. JOWETT

WEDNESDAY, January 1, Psalm 33 : 1-9.—"Let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him." The awe that expresses itself in dread would paralyze us: the awe that expresses itself in reverence would fill us with life. Mere dread would stiffen us into stone: reverence makes us sensitive as an aspen leaf. The reverent spirit thrills to the Divine presence as the silver birch on the mountain slope thrills to the touch of the morning breeze. Reverence is sensitiveness, perceptiveness; it bows before the August, it responds to all the delicate movements of love.

And so it is true that reverence is the basis of all noble character. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." It is the raw material of all wise and noble achievement. Given reverence, perfection is a radiant possibility. We can "perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord." The man who is devoid of reverence may be very busy, but no temple does he build: at the end of the day he will have a rubbish-heap. "The nations that will not fear thee shall utterly perish."

The Seven Cities of Asia

By FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Francis E. Clark, D.D., LL.D.

IN HIS journeyings this year, Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of the Christian Endeavor Society, has visited the Seven Cities of Asia, which are the subject of exhortation and prophecy in Revelation, and he has recorded his impressions in a series of wonderfully enlightening articles, which will appear exclusively in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the coming year. Those who have followed him in "The Footsteps of St. Paul" these last months in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be delighted with his entertaining and instructive letters in "The Seven Cities." He opens with a description of his visit to Sardis, "The Buried City," of which the angel declared, "Thou hast a name that thou livest and art dead," and it shows how wondrously the prophecy has reached fulfilment. Next comes Thyatira, the "City of the Iron Rod and the Morning Star." Then Laodicea, "the Lukewarm," which was "neither cold nor hot." Ephesus, "the Church of Waning Enthusiasm"; Pergamos, "the City of Satan's Seat"; Philadelphia, "the City of the Open Door"; and Smyrna, "the City of the Noble Crown," are all described, the most fascinating story of travel and the most enlightening commentary on Scripture ever written. The articles are illustrated with beautiful photographs by Mrs. Clark, the companion of the Doctor on his travels.

Wilbur F. Crafts, D.D.

OUR Sunday School Class is admittedly the biggest of any in this country in point of numbers. This department will be enlarged during 1913, and our "Superintendents' Round Table," which has already become a popular feature, will be a weekly interchange of helpful hints and personal experiences by men and women who are practically interested in the development of Sunday school work. It is a department that no one should miss who has at heart the Gospel training of the young.

Statisticians have asserted that there are millions of American children of the Sunday school age who are now not enrolled in any school. This fact alone should demand the careful consideration of every parent and guardian who has the moral and spiritual welfare of the child at heart. In many communities THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Department constitutes the chief dependence of members and teachers in the conduct of their classes. In expanding the department, our object is to make it still more widely serviceable, and this will be accomplished under the capable leadership of Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts and Mrs. Crafts.

Church Union

By H. K. CARROLL, D.D.

H. K. Carroll, D.D.

DR. H. K. CARROLL, the most eminent church statistician in America, who prepared the last Religious Census for our government, has written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD two very remarkable and comprehensive articles on Church Union. They form an authoritative presentation of a subject which is now engaging the attention of Protestant churches throughout the country. Dr. Carroll writes without bias and gives the situation, with the arguments on either side, for and against union, setting forth clearly and logically its advantages and the difficulties in the way, and showing how the latter may ultimately be overcome. There should be a widespread demand for these articles, since they come from the best-informed source in this country. Church leaders and members of all denominations are equally interested in informing themselves of the future of this great movement for a united Christianity. Now the outlook would seem to indicate that the time is ripe for definite action. It will not be a battle for denominational extinction, or for the relinquishment of denominational autonomy, but for union on a basis so broad that all the branches of the Christian Church can gather under the banner of the great Commander, and work harmoniously for the advancement of his Kingdom.

Do You Know Your Bible?

By THE ASSOCIATE EDITOR

A. H. Howland, B.D.

DOES any one in the world know enough about the Bible? Who has ever gotten to the end of its treasures and its splendors? THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Question Class, which has now been in successful operation nearly two years, will be continued in 1913 on the same broad and popular lines. It is designed to develop an interest in Bible study and to increase the familiarity of its members with the contents of the Bible.

It's a totally different form of Bible study from that ordinarily followed—something quite new. The element of human interest is kept prominent. The questions are largely about the people of the Bible and the interesting events of their lives—things that are useful and helpful to know and which the students find real pleasure in searching out for themselves. They deal with the important truths of Christian experience and the vital elements of the Christian faith. A very large number of readers sent answers to the questions for 1912. The students included successful business men, busy housewives, schoolboys and schoolgirls, and even prisoners. The "honor roll" is printed every month, in which appear the names of the readers who have answered the greatest number of questions. At the end of the year prizes are awarded to those who have made the best record. There is no formality about enrolling. Any one can join the class at any time.

The Roman Church Question

DURING the last few months, the widespread agitation caused by the Roman Catholic campaign to "Make America Catholic" has steadily increased, and it has now assumed the proportions of a great national question. Its discussion will continue in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the coming year, among the contributors being distinguished leaders in the various Protestant denominations and men prominent in educational and civil life. It is a problem which the Roman Church has precipitated through its open claims to such recognition as no other religious body has ever dared to assert in this Republic. Its pernicious activity in politics; its setting up of Papal thrones for the cardinals in America; its steadily growing hold on public offices and its increasing demands on the public treasury, have all been rightly interpreted as a part of the general propaganda for making this Republic an appanage of the Vatican. Official utterances from the Vatican leave no doubt of the truth of this interpretation. It should not be forgotten, however, that the religious doctrines of the Roman Church form no part of this particular discussion. Every Protestant denomination concedes to our Catholic citizens the same rights and privileges of religious freedom and worship which it claims for itself; but as the Roman cardinals have set up claims involving temporal authority and the hierarchy has openly used ecclesiastical influence for political purposes, such authority and influence being apart from "spiritual" church activities, the present situation calls for serious consideration.

The whole propaganda to "Make America Catholic" is one concerning which the whole nation needs enlightenment.

CHAPTER 4

The Temptation; Jesus Rejected at Nazareth.

AND [c] Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost returned from Jordan, and [b] was led by the Spirit into the wilderness,
2 Being forty days [c] tempted of the devil. And [d] in those days he did eat nothing: and when they were ended, he afterward hungered.
3 And the devil said unto him, If thou be the Son of God, command this stone that it be made bread.
4 And Jesus answered him, saying, [e] It is written, That man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God.
5 And the devil, taking him up into a high mountain, shewed unto him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time.
6 And the devil said unto him, All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them: for [f] that is delivered unto me; and to whomsoever I will I give it.
7 If thou therefore wilt [1] worship me, all shall be thine.
8 And Jesus answered and said unto him, Get thee behind me, Satan: [g] for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.
9 And [h] he brought him to Jerusalem, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, If thou be the Son of God, [i] cast thyself down from hence:
10 For [j] it is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee:
11 And in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.
12 And Jesus answering said unto him, [k] It is said, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.
13 And when the devil had ended all the temptation, he [l] departed from him [m] for a season.
14 ¶ And [n] Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into [o] Galilee: and there went out a fame of him through all the region round about.
15 And he taught in their synagogues, being [p] glorified of all.
16 ¶ And he came to [q] Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, [r] he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day, and stood up for to read.
17 And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written,
18 The [s] Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised,
19 To preach the acceptable year of the Lord.
20 And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him.
21 And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears.
22 And all bare him witness, and [u] wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. And they said, [v] Is not this Joseph's son?
23 And he said unto them, Ye will surely say unto me this proverb, Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country.
24 And he said, Verily I say unto you, No prophet [w] is accepted in his own country.
25 But I tell you of a truth, many [x] widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land;
26 But unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, [y] a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow.
27 And [z] many lepers were in

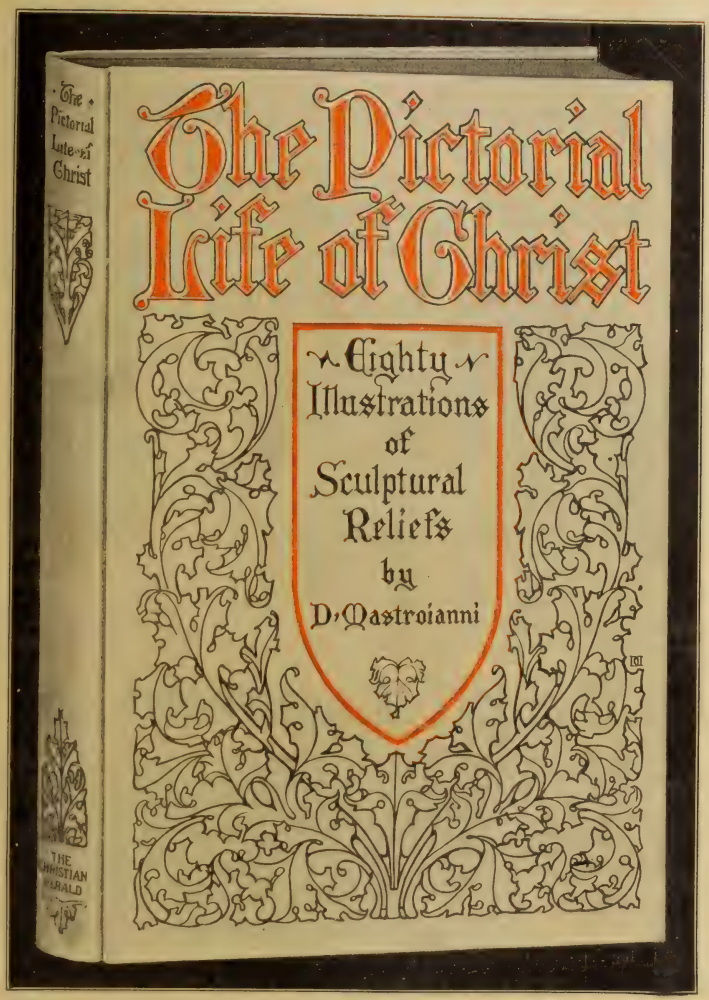
THE PICTORIAL LIFE OF CHRIST



Miniature Reproduction—Actual Size of Volume, 8x11 Inches

DEAR READER:

A few days ago, I received the first finished copy of The Pictorial Life of Christ, fresh from the binder. On looking over the book at leisure, I was so much struck with certain things about it that I decided to jot them down for the benefit of those members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family who have not yet seen the volume.

While THE CHRISTIAN HERALD produces many books, most of them of good quality of workmanship, this is easily the superior of them all. When we secured the rights of publication and set about the work of production, several months ago, we brought to the task all the loving care and forethought that we could expend on a book that dealt with the greatest theme in the world—the Life of our Saviour on earth. In the reproduction of Mastroianni's sculptures, we spared no expense. The engravings are the finest that can be produced; the paper of the best quality for work of this class; even the inks were chosen with a care such as we have bestowed on no other work in my recollection, and this applies to both letterpress and illustrations. Its covers are a triumph of the binder's art, beautiful in design, chaste and appropriate in finish.

Dr. Dodd has written a reverent and faithful Life of the Master, free from controversial blemishes and accordant to the Gospel story, while incidentally shedding much needed light on the people and customs of that time in Palestine and on the social and political atmosphere of the period. Although I had read every line of his work before it went into the hands of the printers, I am now more than ever struck with its charm and value, and with its eminent appropriateness to the use of this noble volume. It was surely a happy combination of artist and author.

Three months ago, while the Life was in process of production, I felt that we had something which every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family would love to possess. Now that it is finished, I am more than ever convinced that it would be a most welcome addition to your store of books—indeed, next to the Bible, you would mark it as the first of your literary and artistic possessions. Every one of the eighty-five full-page mezzotints is a real masterpiece—something absolutely new in artistic treatment and giving a new conception of the Master and his surroundings which you cannot fail to appreciate. Not that it is revolutionary in the slightest sense, but rather that it more clearly presents our inmost thought of the Son of Man and his environment than any artist till now has been able to set before us. This, then, is the thought I wish to urge upon you: that you have here, in this new Pictorial Life, the closest approach to the real Jesus as he was among men, which the skill of man has yet been able to give us.

I wish I could send you some of these wonderful pictures, but the better way is for you to get the book for yourselves.

In material and artistic value, it is a book that belongs to the de Luxe class; but our ample book-making facilities have enabled us to combine it with a CHRISTIAN HERALD subscription at $3.00 for both. Let me express the hope that every subscriber who reads these lines of mine will take the opportunity to secure a copy of The Pictorial Life of Christ with the renewal of subscription. We are now sending them out by the thousand.

Cordially yours,

Geo. H. Sandison

Is Evangelism Dying Out?

THERE are several hundred evangelists in the United States and the leaders of this particular branch of the ministry give their views in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the much discussed question "Is Evangelism Declining?" They will write the actual facts, drawn from personal experience, and our readers can form their own judgment of the accuracy of those prognosticators—many of them clergymen, by the way—who assert in pulpit and press, that "the day of the evangelist has passed away forever." We have our own opinion on the matter, but prefer to give both sides a hearing. Churches, like other organizations, need an occasional stirring up, and when home talent is incapable of rekindling the spiritual fires, the evangelist becomes a necessity. Look out for the evangelists' articles, for they will be interesting reading.

Bible and Newspaper By Dr. F. C. IGLEHART

THE Bible and Newspaper, edited by Dr. Ferdinand Cowle Iglehart, records current facts in this and other countries, and with them interprets intellectual, sociological, moral and religious truths. The facts are selected from farm, mart, shop, mine, home, school and church. The page sparkles with the jewels of thought and beautiful sentiment. It is deep in its convictions and fearless in their expression. Some of the ablest ministers, editors and speakers of the country regularly use its facts and incidents as illustrations for their sermons, editorials and addresses. The page draws from the daily newspaper with its live people and important facts. It also refers to the Bible, the granite of truth, the rock of ages. Each story leads to a Bible illustration, which relates divine providence to the practical affairs of men.

A Leading Contributor for 1913

PROFESSOR DAU stands among the foremost of those who have done signal service in dealing with the vital religious issues of the day. His high scholarly attainments, his familiarity with church history here and abroad, and his stanch adherence to Protestant principles have been strikingly shown in his contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during 1912. He is a versatile writer of great spirituality and unusual literary charm and his helpful and uplifting articles deal with a wide range of Christian experience.

Prof. W. H. T. Dau

What Is Conversion?

A HUNDRED evangelical pastors of different denominations have been requested to give their personal interpretation of the meaning of True Conversion. The replies will doubtless be widely read and discussed. A Japanese proverb says, "Many paths lead up the sides of Fujiyama, but they all meet at the top," and so, however various the methods these workers may adopt, if they result in true conversion, the end will have been attained. Their letters will be one of the most interesting features of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the coming year.

Irving Bacheller

By the Author of "Eben Holden"

THERE is no more popular American writer than Irving Bacheller, the author of Eben Holden and other "best sellers." He always has a helpful message, which is none the less agreeable because it is often expressed with a kindly, mirth-provoking humor. When visiting us the other day in the Bible House, he quietly said he had a new story in preparation for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Bacheller lives in a beautiful ideal world which is peopled by "the children of his brain," who have always been dear to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Marietta Holley

Quaint Wit of Josiah Allen's Wife

TENS of thousands of our readers, who laughed over the adventures of Josiah and Samantha at Coney Island last year, will be delighted to know that Miss Holley will contribute stories and sketches to our columns during 1913, in which there will be lots of her quaint fun and philosophy. If Samantha was simply funny, she would be good, but a bushel of wisdom comes with every shaft of her wit.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THE gentle spirit of our beloved and lamented associate, Mrs. Sangster, who was called away this year, has descended upon her namesake and granddaughter, Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., upon whose shoulders her literary mantle seems to have fallen. Miss Sangster is a young writer of rare promise and a remarkably sweet poet, whose contributions will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during 1913.

Mrs. Anna M. Shaw

Woman Suffrage in America

MRS. ANNA M. SHAW, the leader of the Suffrage Movement in America, is a wonderful woman. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has requested Mrs. Shaw to tell its readers about the progress and prospects of Suffrage in America, and also to express her opinion concerning the "Violent Suffragettes" abroad, whose militant methods she very strongly deprecates.

Edwin Markham

Poems Every One Should Know

WHEN Edwin Markham wrote his fine poem, "The Man with the Hoe," America realized that a great poet had come into view. His career has been brilliant and successful beyond all his contemporaries. Many will remember his splendid poem, "The Cup of Pride," which appeared in our pages early this year. He has been asked to contribute to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during 1913, and our readers may look forward to several remarkable poems from his wonderful pen. Other poets, each meritorious in some particular field, many of them already known to our readers, will send in their contributions during the year.

Mrs. F. M. Kingsley

A Story by Florence M. Kingsley

FEW names are better known in American literature than that of Florence Morse Kingsley, the author of Titus, Stephen, and other famous books. Mrs. Kingsley, who has repeatedly contributed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has been requested to send a short story, to appear some time during the coming season, and we anticipate for our readers a pleasant and enjoyable perusal of her work. She is now in the heyday of her fame and popularity.

Gayle Porter Hoskins

Work of Well-Known Illustrators

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD illustrators are among the best known and most skilful artists of America. Such talented workers as W. B. King, Hanson Booth, Lawrence Herndon, Robert W. Amick, Walter O. Reese, John Rea, Maginel Wright Enright, Tony Nell, Gayle Porter Hoskins, Corwin Knapp Linson, Charles L. Wrenn, and Vincent Lynch are making the illustrations which appear week by week in our pages. The serial fiction and short stories are interpreted by these gifted men and women, and their work, besides adding to the delight of the stories, helps to carry their message to our readers. We are especially pleased to announce that Mr. M. Stockton Mulford, whose illustrations for our serial story, Pollyanna, have attracted much favorable attention, will continue to draw for the fiction department.

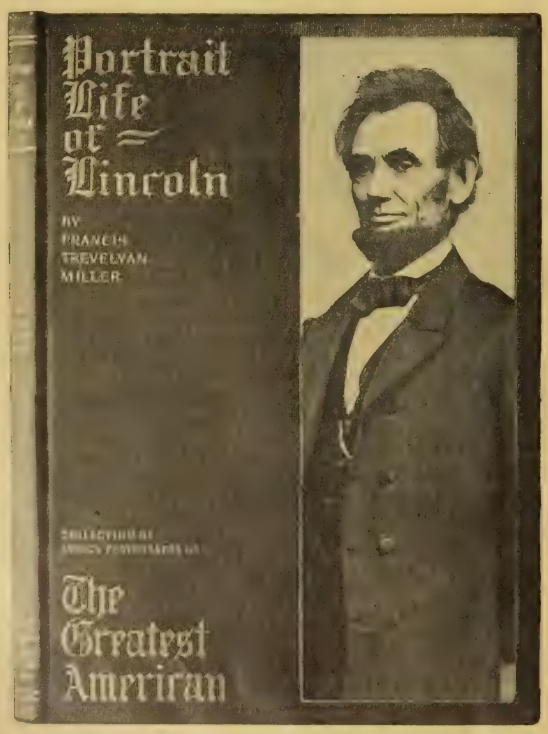
A Portrait Life of Lincoln

By Dr. Francis Trevelyan Miller



THE PORTRAIT LIFE OF LINCOLN is more than a book. It is a gallery containing every picture taken of Lincoln, the majority of which were part of the great collection of photographs made by Matthew B. Brady during the Civil War. These photographs are a revelation of historical truths. They are all of large size and many of them occupy full pages.

Among the 110 treasures are the first portrait ever taken of Lincoln; photographs of Lincoln taken when his name first passed over the country during the Lincoln-Douglas debates; photographs taken while he was running for United States Senator; during the Missouri Compromise; on the battleground of Antietam, the bloodiest day of the Civil War; last photograph of Lincoln ever taken; Secret Service photographs of the assassins of Lincoln taken on the gallows; photographs of the funeral bier and procession while Lincoln was being taken on his sixteen-hundred-mile journey to Springfield, when twenty-five million people were attending memorial services to the martyred President.

ORIGINALS ARE VALUED AT MORE THAN $110,000

The Portrait Life of Lincoln, however, is not merely a collection of photographs. Accompanying them is a prose commentary by Dr. Francis Trevelyan Miller, which throws further light on the life of this great man. As near as possible Dr. Miller has told it in Lincoln's own words, that is, with copious quotations from his speeches and sayings, which show the foundation of Lincoln's character; the influence of love on his life; his political principles; the rugged honesty of his heart; the problems that tested his strength; the gathering of humanity under his leadership; his fortitude in the hour of trial; his faith in the common people; his humility in the hour of victory; his sympathy for the unfortunate; the veil of sorrow that spread over the nation when he was assassinated. The volume contains Lincoln's first public speech and many of those delivered throughout his life, particularly the address at Gettysburg, in magnanimity of spirit, simplicity, brevity and historical import the greatest speech in American annals.

IT IS MORE THAN A BOOK—SIX GREAT BOOKS IN ONE

FIRST—An epigrammatic philosophy on life and its opportunities, drawn from the experience and life of Lincoln.

SECOND—A new interpretation of Lincoln's example in character building.

THIRD—An appeal to the American heart and conscience to utilize the inspiration of Lincoln.

FOURTH—An entrancing narrative and complete hand-book of the main facts in Lincoln's life.

FIFTH—The greatest gallery of original photographs of Lincoln ever embraced between covers—from original collections valued at $110,000.

SIXTH—The strongest application of the principles of Lincolnism in everyday life that has ever appeared in print.

WE will send you, postpaid, The Portrait Life of Lincoln, bound in cloth with illustrated cover, The Christian Herald Almanac for 1913, and The Christian Herald for one full year, all three for only $2

Or, we will send to old subscribers Free, as a premium, The Portrait Life of Lincoln, for sending us one new yearly subscription to The Christian Herald with $1.50.

Sacred Music for the Home

MUSIC is one of the most attractive features of family life. Whether it be only the family group or an occasional social gathering of friends, that household which is musical derives far more enjoyment out of life than one which cares little or nothing for the "concord of sweet sounds." During the coming year, a number of our best American writers of sacred and patriotic song will contribute new productions to the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Poets a-plenty too will send their finest verses, including aged Fanny Crosby, Eben Rexford, Alice Whittier and others.

Fanny Crosby

Our Church Societies

DURING the coming year THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in response to a very general demand, will publish three departments in which the Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union topics will be fully discussed and illustrated with new anecdotes, specially applicable to the lessons in each case. This department will be conducted by special writers, thoroughly familiar with the work and its needs, who have already had long experience in this particular field. The lessons will appear regularly fully a week in advance of the date on which they are to be used, thus affording ample opportunity for teachers and students to familiarize themselves with the contents, and especially with the anecdotal illustrations—a most valuable feature in all three departments.

200 Missionary Correspondents

WITH nearly two hundred missionary correspondents in foreign fields, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is enabled to present to its readers the very latest and most accurate news of missionary effort in every land under the sun. The contributions of these correspondents are instinct with the life of the movement at the front and give such a picture of Gospel activities as can be found in no other publication. Every denomination is represented and the letters are copiously illustrated with characteristic photographs taken by the workers themselves.

Interesting Short Stories

THE short stories published regularly in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past year have been exceptional in quality and interest. The idea of being able to find a complete story in each issue has proven very popular. This feature will continue with few exceptions through 1913. Among the short-story writers who are contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are Frederick Owen Bartlett, Ella Higginson, Jean Mahan Plank, Helen Coale Crewe, Anne McQueen, Anne Warner, Alice Garland Steele, Grace Boteler Sanders, J. J. Bell, Owen Oliver, Evelyn Gill Klahr, Mary Stewart Cutting, Anna E. Finn, Nora Fitch, Mabel Nelson Thurston, May Belleville Brown, Mary Lavinia Bray, Lily A. Long, Stella Clanton Dysart, Arthur Wallace Peach, Charles Lee Sleight, Annie Hamilton Donnell, Edwin Balmer, A. Ross Mackay, Charles G. D. Roberts, Florence Guertin Tuttle, Margaret Horner Clyde, Arthur K. Akers.

A particularly fine Memorial Day story has been written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mary Stewart Cutting.

Wonderful Art Covers

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the coming year is to have the finest collection of covers that it, or any other magazine, has ever given to its readers. We have obtained rights on some of the greatest paintings of religious subjects, among which are Hoffman's "Christ in Gethsemane," and a beautiful painting of the Christ Child by Emilie Collier, called by the artist, "The Breadth of His Love." Another subject is "The Castle of the Holy Grail," painted by H. Thoma, one of the best known of modern German painters. This picture has never been reproduced before and copies from the original cannot be obtained in this country. Paintings by Old Masters will be represented in "The Concert" by Ter Borch; "The Blue Boy," by Gainsborough; and "Georg Gisze," by Hans Holbein. We are glad, also, to promise another picture by Farquharson, the famous Scotch painter, who is noted for his wonderful pictures of sheep. These are only a few of the fifty-two wonderful covers we shall publish during 1913.

The Strange Adventures of Capt. Quinton

A TRUTHFUL RECORD OF HIS EXPERIENCES AND ESCAPES DURING HIS LIFE AMONG CANNIBALS OF THE SOUTH SEAS

IN 1690, Daniel Defoe, who had never been out of England, sat him down, and from the depths of his imagination evolved Robinson Crusoe, a book that will probably remain forever enshrined in the hearts of adventure-loving mankind.

In 1912, Robert Quinton, who had traveled the world over, sat him down, and, without drawing on his imagination at all, wrote a history of his experience in Crusoeland that is entitled to be placed beside the more famous book.

NOT FICTION, BUT THE TRUTH

We believe The Strange Adventures of Captain Quinton to be one of the most remarkable books of its kind yet published. More than all, it is true. It is not a mere figment of the imagination. The things described really happened. Yet Stanley, Livingstone, and Peary, all together, had not so many escapes from death as had this unassuming sailor-man, who tells the story of his life in such convincing language as to call forth the remark from one reader that "he doesn't write like a literary man, but more like a man who has really been there."

Open the book at any place, and you will find him encountering one or more of innumerable perils—canoeing on a boiling lake; escaping under a shower of poisoned arrows; battling with cannibals; racing through the tropical night in a launch, pursued by crocodiles; imprisoned in a ship's cabin by a horde of monster devilfish; spending the night in a tree with a leopard; battling hand to hand with head hunters; being pursued by angry monkeys; running a gauntlet of war canoes.

WILL INTEREST WOMEN AND MEN ALIKE

These are sanguinary experiences which must be read with bated breath, yet they are not more thrilling in their way than are the exquisite descriptions of treasure-chambers in caves lurid and beautiful as a dream of Arabian Nights; of a wave dance in which tribes of cannibals with an uncanny sense of beauty and rhythm represent with their bodies the ocean dashing high on imaginary coral reefs; of a silvery night spent in tropical tree tops in order to witness the stately dawn-dance of birds of paradise. The very multiplicity of incident is overpowering, but it must be remembered that the experiences of over thirty years are crowded into this book.

Assuredly Captain Quinton's truth is stranger than any fiction possibly could be, and the spirit of the South Seas is in it.

It is a big book. too, 496 pages and 185,000 words, enclosed in illustrated binding, and with a frontispiece portrait of the author, showing just what he looks like, this man whose life has hung in the balance so many times, and who yet has lived to tell the tale.

GOD THE CREATOR OF ALL*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS WILBUR F. CRAFTS

HERE in Genesis we have the preface of the Bible: one verse about the universe; forty-four about the creation of the earth; a few verses about the beginnings of the human race; a more extended record of the ancestors of the Jewish people. Then in Exodus the Bible story really begins, the preface having covered more than half of the time of Bible history, 2,500 years, during which time there was no written record. Job, living in those early ages, expressed his longing for the written word when he exclaimed, "Oh that I had one to hear me! and that I had the indictment (book) which mine adversary hath written. Surely I would carry it upon my shoulder; I would bind it unto me as a crown" (Job 31: 35, 36).

Let us thank God daily for his written Word!

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Those are the first words in the Bible, but the apostle John, in writing his Gospel, goes farther back than "the beginning," when he says: "In the beginning was the Word." Let us read the first three verses of the first chapter of John, and as "the Word" refers to Jesus, let us read in the name of Jesus. "In the beginning was Jesus, and Jesus was with God, and Jesus was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made" (John 1: 1-3). And furthermore in the written book of God concerning the kingdom of "the Son of his love": "all things have been created through him and unto him" (Col. 1: 13-17).

"And the earth was waste and void." That was the time of so-called "chaos." A little boy once explained what he thought chaos to be, saying: "It is a great pile of nothing, and no place to put it in."

"The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. The last word in this verse makes us think that the appearance of chaos must have been a vapor, a mist, and the mist was the halo which surrounded God. But most illuminating is the thought that the Spirit of God was there. Thus in the first two verses of the Bible there is set forth the Trinity: the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, the triune God, three persons in one God working together to make the world!

"And God said, Let there be light: and there was light." Now we will give what is called the literal translation, made from the Polyglot (expressed in several languages) Bible: "And God said, Let light be, and light was. And God saw the beauty of the light, that it was good; and God divided the luminous from the dark. And God called out to the light, Day, and to the darkness he called out, Night; and it was the wearing of shadows and it was the breaking of shadows, day one." But what shall we say of that word "day"? Let us read what the written Book says about this: "One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day" (II. Peter 3: 8). David the inspired Psalmist wrote: "Behold, thou hast made my days as an handbreadth and as nothing before thee" (Ps. 39: 5); and again in Ps. 90 we read: "For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night." If the day cannot be measured by our arithmetic, neither can a thousand years. Truly God's times are in his own hands. To avoid misunderstanding therefore it would seem wisest for us to interpret that day one, or first day, as the first event. The creation of light was the first event, and chaos was illumined with the glory of God.

"And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters" (the mist). It was then that God measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span (Isa. 40: 12). We must know that the span is the space that lies between the thumb and the little finger when the hand is stretched. So God formed with outstretched hand the region above us toward which we gaze into its blue depths and wonderful cloud pictures. And it was the second day; the second event in the creation of the world.

"And God said, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered unto one place." Thus was the sea formed and the earth also, for when the waters receded the dry land appeared.

"And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass and herbs and fruit trees." And it was so, and God saw that it was good. And it was the third day or event.

Then God said, "Let there be lights in the firmament." And there appeared two great lights, the sun and the moon, and lesser lights, the stars. It was day four, or the fourth event.

"A strange book is that Bible of yours," said a skeptic to a Christian. "Why do you say so?" asked the Christian. "It says that light was created before the sun and moon and stars," he replied. "So it does," replied the Christian, "it says that light was created on the first day, and the sun and moon and stars on the fourth day, but you do not seem to be up to date on science, for Tyndall and the best scientists of our day hold and explain a theory that light is independent of the sun in its origin." The skeptic was struck dumb, so to speak, and the Christian went on to tell him that "Science finds every year some new point of agreement with the Bible, where it had supposed there was only discrepancy: that Nature and the Bible are only two volumes by the same great Author — the written word and the created word. Their seeming disagreements at times are but the fault of our own rendering. The same great truths are stereotyped in both forever."

"And God said, Let the waters swarm with swarms of living creatures, and let birds fly above the earth" (Baptist Revision). Look at the birds and fishes, and the wonderful variety in form and color will cause you to think how myriad-minded is our God, for the variety in these two creations is almost infinite. Children should be shown such pictures when this lesson is being taught. When the fishes and great sea monsters and every winged bird were created it was "day five"—the fifth event.

"And God said, Let the earth bring forth living creatures after their kind; cattle, and creeping things." Straightway the earth swarmed with animals as the waters had swarmed with fish and birds.

There remained but one creation for God to make, and he said to his Son and to the Holy Spirit: "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." And so were born our first parents Adam and Eve. God gave them dominion over every creature he had created and every green herb for food. And it was day six, and the sixth event.

Dr. Joseph Parker asks, "What do we know about our own earth? Nothing worth naming! We have chipped the rocks here and there, and drawn diagrams which we have sold to children, and paid carpenters for drawers to keep spars in; we have made maps of the world which we are always readjusting and recoloring; we have called common things by uncommon names; but who knows anything about the earth? Who has walked over all the ocean beds, and acquainted himself with all the mystery of the sea? Who has seen both hemispheres at once? Who has been in both hemispheres in one day? Who can make the wind blow from the east or west? What is the wind? Ay, poor idiot philosopher, not with carrying large burdens of polysyllables, tell me what is the wind, and thy answer shall be the root of another question." Verily, it is the highest wisdom to accept with faith in God that which we cannot understand. Let us then

THREE OF THE SIX PANELS ENTITLED "CREATION"

These pictures were painted by Sir E. Burne-Jones, Bart., in 1877, and are now in the collection of Sir Alexander Henderson, Bart. Each day in the creation story is symbolized by an angel who bears a shining sphere in which is suggested the story of the day. The panels here reproduced are "The Ordering of Chaos." "The Creation of the Firmament" and "The Division of the Waters from the Land." The remaining panels of the set will be presented with the second lesson on the creation in next week's issue.

POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Story of Marco," "Into Still Waters," "The Transformation of Margaret," etc.

A SERIAL STORY. ILLUSTRATED BY M. STOCKTON MULFORD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Pollyanna, eleven years old, comes East to live with her aunt, Miss Polly Harrington, of Beldingsville, Vt. Miss Harrington is a lady of most unlovely and unge...ous character, though she believes herself to be a very good woman, and tries vigorously to do in every case what she believes to be her duty. She has consented to receive Pollyanna at the request of the Ladies' Aid Society of the small Western town where the child's father had been pastor of a poor mission church. Her mother had died some years earlier, her father but recently. The young wife had never received her family's forgiveness for marrying the poor minister. But now Miss Harrington consents to receive the little girl and directs her servant Nancy to prepare a small attic room for her. She wishes to put her at a distance from her own apartments and avoid the risk of her marring the valuable furnishings of any other room. Nancy is sent to the station to meet Pollyanna. From every fresh disappointment she rallies amazingly, always finding something to be glad about. She explains that this is a game which her father had taught her and played with her. Nancy agrees to try to play the game, too. Forbidden to open the window of her attic room because the fly screens had not arrived, Pollyanna goes out on the porch roof to sleep there. She is brought back by the alarmed household. Her aunt finds it difficult to punish her, for the punishment appears to Pollyanna to be a reward. Pollyanna takes jelly to bed-ridden Mrs. Snow, who always wants something different from what is sent, and wheedles her into having her hair dressed and her curtains raised. After a number of visits Mrs. Snow herself begins to play the game. Pollyanna also meets a mysterious silent Man and after a number of one-sided salutations makes him talk to her. Aunt Polly at last has Pollyanna moved to a larger and more beautiful room. After she has surprised her aunt into adopting a stray dog and cat, she finds a homeless boy, and brings him in, confident that Miss Polly will keep him.

CHAPTER X—Continued

WHEN the house was reached, Pollyanna unhesitatingly piloted her companion straight into the presence of her amazed aunt.

"Oh, Aunt Polly," she triumphed. "Just look here! I've got something ever so much nicer, even, than Fluffy and Buffy, for you to bring up. It's a real live boy. He won't mind a bit sleeping in the attic, at first, you know, and he says he'll work; but I shall need him most of the time to play with, I reckon."

Miss Polly grew white, then very red. She did not quite understand; but she thought she understood enough.

"Pollyanna, what does this mean? Who is this dirty little boy, and where did you find him?" she demanded sharply.

The "dirty little boy" fell back a step and looked toward the door. Pollyanna laughed merrily.

"There, if I didn't forget to tell you his name! I'm as bad as the Man. And he is dirty, too; isn't he? —I mean, the boy is—just like Fluffy and Buffy were when you took them in. But I reckon he'll improve all right by washing, just as they did, and—oh, I most forgot again," she broke off with a laugh. "This is Jimmy Bean, Aunt Polly. I brought him home so he could live here, you know. He wants a home and folks. I told him how good you were to me, and to Fluffy and Buffy, and how I knew you would be to him, because he's even nicer than cats and dogs."

Miss Polly dropped back in her chair and raised a shaking hand to her throat. The old helplessness was threatening once more to overcome her. With a visible struggle, however, she pulled herself suddenly erect.

"That will do, Pollyanna. This is the most absurd thing you've done yet. As if tramp cats and mangy dogs weren't bad enough, but you must needs bring home ragged little beggars from the street who—"

There was a sudden stir from the boy. His eyes flashed and his chin came up. With two strides of his sturdy legs he confronted Miss Polly fearlessly.

"I ain't a beggar, marm, an' I don't want nothin' of you. I was cal'latin' ter work, of course, fur my board an' keep. I wouldn't have come ter your old house, anyhow, if this 'ere girl hadn't 'a' made me, a-tellin' me how you was so good an' kind that you'd be jest dyin' ter take me in. So, there!" And he wheeled about and stalked from the room with a dignity that would have been absurd had it not been so pitiful.

"Oh, Aunt Polly," choked Pollyanna; "why, I thought you'd be glad to have him here! I'm sure, I should think you'd be glad—"

Miss Polly raised her hand with a peremptory gesture of silence. Miss Polly's nerves had snapped at last. The "good and kind" of the boy's words were still ringing in her ears, and the old helplessness was almost upon her, she knew. Yet she rallied her forces with the last atom of her will power.

"Pollyanna," she cried sharply, "will you stop using that everlasting word 'glad'? It's 'glad' from morning till night, until I think I shall grow wild!"

From sheer amazement Pollyanna's jaw dropped.

"Why, Aunt Polly," she breathed, "I should think you'd be glad to have me gl— Oh!" she broke off, clapping her hands to her lips and hurrying blindly from the room.

"Well, that is better," he murmured faintly

Before the boy had reached the end of the driveway, Pollyanna overtook him.

"Boy! Boy! Jimmy Bean! I want you to know how—how sorry I am," she panted, catching him with a detaining hand.

"Sorry nothin'! I ain't blamin' you," retorted the boy, sullenly. "But I ain't no beggar," he added, with sudden spirit.

"Of course you aren't! But you mustn't blame auntie," appealed Pollyanna. "Probably I didn't do the introducing right. She is good and kind, really—she's always been; but I probably didn't explain it right. I do wish I could find some place for you, though!"

The boy shrugged his shoulders, and half turned away.

"Never mind. I guess I can find one myself. I ain't no beggar, you know."

Pollyanna was frowning thoughtfully. Of a sudden she turned, her face illumined.

"Say, I'll tell you what I will do! The Ladies' Aid meets this afternoon. I heard Aunt Polly say so. I'll lay your case before them. That's what father always did, when he wanted anything—educating the heathen and new carpets, you know."

The boy turned fiercely.

"Well, I ain't a heathen or a new carpet; besides—what is a Ladies' Aid?"

Pollyanna stared in shocked disapproval.

"Why, Jimmy Bean, wherever have you been brought up?—not to know what a Ladies' Aid is!"

"Oh, all right—if you ain't tellin'," grunted the boy, turning and beginning to walk away indifferently.

Pollyanna sprang to his side at once.

"It's—why, it's just a lot of ladies that meet and sew and give suppers and raise money and—and talk; that's what a Ladies' Aid is. They're awfully kind—that is, most of mine were, back home. I haven't seen this one here, but they're always good, I reckon. I'm going to tell them about you this afternoon."

Again the boy turned fiercely.

"Not much you will! Maybe you think I'm goin' ter stand round an' hear a whole lot o' women call me a beggar, instead of just one! Not much!"

"Oh, but you wouldn't be there," argued Pollyanna, quickly. "I'd go alone, of course, and tell them."

"You would?"

"Yes; and I'd tell it better this time," hurried on Pollyanna, quick to see the signs of relenting in the boy's face. "And there'd be some of 'em, I know, that would be glad to give you a home."

"I'd work—don't forget ter say that," cautioned the boy.

"Of course not," promised Pollyanna, happily, sure now that her point was gained. "Then I'll let you know to-morrow."

"Where?"

"By the road—where I found you to-day, near Mrs. Snow's house."

"All right. I'll be there." The boy paused before he went on slowly: "Maybe I'd better go back, then, for to-night, to the Home. You see I hain't no other place ter stay; and—and I didn't leave till this mornin'. I slipped out. They ain't like folks, ye know. They don't care."

"I know," nodded Pollyanna, with understanding eyes. "But I'm sure, when I see you to-morrow, I'll have just a common home, and folks that do care, all ready for you. Good-by!" she called brightly, as she turned back toward the house.

In the sitting-room window at that moment, Miss Polly, who had been watching the two children, followed with somber eyes the boy until a turn in the road hid him from sight. Then she sighed, turned, and walked listlessly upstairs—and Miss Polly did not usually move listlessly. In her ears was still ringing the boy's scornful "you was so good and kind."

CHAPTER XI

BEFORE THE LADIES' AID

DINNER, which came at noon in the Harrington homestead, was a silent meal on the day of the Ladies' Aid meeting. Pollyanna, it is true, tried to talk; but she did not make a success of it, chiefly because four times she was obliged to break off a "glad" in the middle of it, much to her blushing discomfort. The fifth time it happened, Miss Polly moved her head wearily.

"There, there, child, say it, if you want to," she sighed. "I'm sure I'd rather you did than not—if it's going to make all this fuss."

Pollyanna's puckered little face cleared.

"Oh, thank you. I'm afraid it would be pretty

THE COMING OF "MARY CHRISTMAS"

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

IT WAS Christmas Eve, and the Rich Man was sitting alone in front of the fire, when the Poor Man breezed in.

"Merry Christmas," said the Poor Man as he unbuttoned his overcoat, and looked around for a comfortable chair, "how goés it?"

"Oh, as usual" replied the Rich Man; "wheat has gone up, and cotton has gone down; the factories are closed for the holiday, and—"

"For heaven's sake, man, keep still!" cried the Poor Man, "have you no sentiment? It's Christmas Eve, and to-morrow is going to be Christmas—Christmas! Do you know what that means?

"Yes," said the Rich Man, "it means tips to the servants, and elevator boys, and office boys, and head waiters. It means a special gift to the orphan asylum; it means lots of begging letters in the mail and perhaps a Christmas card from a designing niece. Oh! yes, I know what Christmas means."

"And when I came in I envied you!" said his friend, "yes, I envied you. You with your money and your big house, and your open fireplace (that was built to hang stockings at), and your servants, and—well, everything. Now I pity you! Why, my oldest girl is knitting me a necktie for Christmas, and my boy made me a chair, a morris chair, in school; and the baby bought me a woolly lamb with her own pennies. To-morrow we have a chicken for dinner—yes, I know that you will have a turkey: but you won't enjoy it, you can have all you want any time through the year—and the boy will have a leg, and the girl a wing, and the baby, yes, the baby will have the wishbone; and my wife will decorate the table with holly. I am going to give my wife a box of chocolates and a five dollar bill. She'll give the candy to the kiddies, and she'll spend the five dollar bill on them, and she'll be happy doing it—well, I must be going—"

And as the Rich Man drew a check-book from his pocket:

"No, I don't take money from friends, even on Christmas."

"But what can I do," said the Rich Man, "I want your girl to have a Paris doll, and the boy to have a watch, and the baby—"

"But I bought the girl a doll," said the Poor Man. "It isn't very large or expensive, but it has beautiful blue eyes; and I got a watch for the boy. It cost a dollar, but it keeps good time, and my wife and I spent a dollar and five cents in the ten cent store for the baby's stockings. No, Mr. Rich Man, we don't need your money to have a merry Christmas."

"But I should like to do something, something good," said the other. "What shall I do?"

"You ask that?" said his friend. "What shall I do?" Why, there are men and women starving in this city to-night. There are children who do not know what Christmas and Santa Claus mean. There are homeless babies freezing to death. And you ask what you can do! No, don't go riding down Fifth Avenue in your limousine and say, 'My friend was fooling me; I see no starving babies or freezing men.' Go down to the East Side, through the Ghetto and along the docks. And don't ride; walk. You'll see it!"

The Poor Man rose to go. He shook the proffered hand and strode away. But at the door he turned.

"Yes, I'm sorry for you," he said. "I'm going home to the wife and the kiddies, but you—you're going to stay here alone with your ghosts and your broken dreams."

The Poor Man went out and the door slammed behind him.

The Rich Man sat and stared into the flames, in front of the fireplace that was built to hang stockings at.

THE clock striking nine aroused the Rich Man. He stared about him for a moment and then left his cozy fireplace and went into the hall. His heavy fur-lined overcoat lay across a chair, and as one in a trance the Rich Man got into it and walked out of the house. It was a cold night, a black night outside. A bitter wind came whistling down the avenue as if it would tear the earth apart. The Rich Man wished for his limousine, but remembering his friend's admonition, he struck out instead for the nearest trolley line.

Many people looked up as the aristocratic figure in broadcloth and fur entered the car, and he returned their glances with interest. A letter carrier with a tired face and an empty bag sat next to a cheerful-faced mother with dozens of badly tied packages in her arms. A young girl, pale but pretty, smiled as he looked at her, and he saw that a sprig of mistletoe was pinned to her shabby muff. A laborer snored in his corner, but a furry toy dog protruded from his bulging pocket; and a shame-faced but happy looking young man carried in his hand a large florist's box. Even the conductor had a piece of holly in his buttonhole, and the Rich Man, looking, felt rather ashamed of his lack of Christmas spirit.

The Rich Man, after a moment's thought, got out at the next corner. A gaily gleaming restaurant with a glass front greeted him before the other stores. He stopped to watch a dextrous cook make butter cakes in the window. It was a novelty to him, for they did not do it that way in the days when he ate in such places. Soon he realized that he was not the only spectator. Three ragged, thin little newsboys, with red noses flattened against the glass, eyed the cook wistfully. And the Rich Man thought of the starving millions.

"Boys," he said in a husky voice, "want some dinner?"

The largest boy spoke up:

"Aw! quit yer kiddin'!" he said, not rudely, but sadly.

"But I mean it," said the Rich Man hurriedly; "come along," and with that, in he marched, followed by the most admiring train he ever possessed. How those boys ate; with a ravenous hunger that brought tears to the eyes. And when the Rich Man had given them each a handful of change, and had paid for their dinners, he felt the first real glow of happiness that had warmed his heart for years.

The Rich Man walked on and on. Suddenly he was conscious of a stealthy but unpracticed hand in his pocket and he turned to confront a wretched looking woman in a thin, threadbare shawl. At any other time he would have called a policeman, but the Christmas spirit had softened his heart a little bit.

"Why," said he, "are you doing this?"

"Oh, Mister," said the woman, we can't pay the rent, and they are going to turn us out," and she began to cry.

"How much do you need?" he asked.

"Six dollars," she whimpered in the midst of a sob.

"And would you endanger your immortal soul for six dollars?" asked the Rich Man curiously. A flash of anger passed over the woman's face, making her almost pretty.

"You," she cried, "you in your fine clothes and furs and heavy shoes, you can talk! What is six dollars to you? Six dollars is a lot to me. It means home!"

Without a word the Rich Man pulled a bill from a fat roll in his pocket. It was a big bill with a yellow back.

"Merry Christmas!" he said, and passed on, followed by her confused blessing.

An old man was tottering down the street. His queerly fashioned coat was a style of many years ago and it still showed that the handiwork of an expert tailor had gone into its making. He wore no overcoat. The Rich Man went up to him and touched him on the shoulder.

"I have a message for you," he said.

"Me, suh?" The old gentleman straightened up.

"Yes, you," said the Rich Man. "It's a message from Santa Claus. He said for you to take this." He pressed some crumpled yellow bills into the old hand, and before the man could say a word, had vanished into the thickening crowd.

At last he turned into a dark alley that led between two buildings, and, though he did not know it, feet followed him, soft-shod feet that were as noiseless as an Indian's. As the Rich Man walked into the darkest part of the alley, something soft and heavy struck him upon the head, and as skilful, supple fingers removed his watch, scarfpin, and money, he drifted off into oblivion.

IT WAS not long after that the Rich Man unclosed his eyes and with a trembling hand felt his head. He was so dizzy, and yes, there was a large lump on his forehead. He lay still for a moment, and was not very much surprised to feel a tiny hand upon his head, and to hear a soft little voice say:

"Poor man, poor man; did him hurt him's head?"

"It's a dream," thought the Rich Man. "I had better get up," and with a great effort he struggled to his feet, upsetting as he did so a tiny, thin little girl.

"Hello!" said the Rich Man thickly—he was still very dizzy—"where in time did you come from?"

"I didn't." said the little girl, "I was here when you falled when the naughty man hitted you."

The Rich Man's head began to get a little clearer.

"Oh, yes," he said; "he hit me; also," as he felt in his pockets, "he took my watch and my stickpin, and my roll. Thank God he left me a little change," as he pulled out a couple of dollars in silver, "that will get me home—"

He felt a tugging at his coat, and he looked down

The Angel's Message
By Margaret E. Sangster Jr.
In the fields the flocks were sleeping,
White as snow;
Through the town the night was creeping
Far below;
And the shepherds, ever faithful
To their charges dumb,
Waited in the cold and darkness
For the dawn to come.
When above them shone a glory
Soft and bright,
And they heard an angel's story
Through the night.
"Peace on earth," it was his greeting,
"Peace to men, and do not grieve,
For your Lord is sent among you
On this blessed eve."
Then he left, but in his footstep
Glowed a star;
And the wise men saw and followed
From afar.
To a stable cold and dreary
Safe it led their faltering way,
For within their Christ was lying
In a manger filled with hay.
And the shepherds and the wise men
Did adore,
While they knelt in silent rapture
On the floor.
For their Lord had come among them
To redeem the world from sin.
Shall we not, too on His birthday,
Cleanse our hearts and let him in?

THE DISASTROUS TYPHOON IN CEBU

'The Lord has taken them all,' or 'The Lord has taken that one and the other.' But how the children who have been spared a father or mother cling to those left them! while the parents, whose children have survived, grasp them with a visible dread, as if they still fear that they may be torn from their grasp.

"Probably the worst of all is that a swarm of locusts descended upon Cebu immediately after the winds, and these may devour what little had escaped the destroying hurricane. What a story of distress the Cebuan Christians have already had to tell us! As yet this year they have been unable to gather any harvest. Famine, through drought, had made the past five months a season of trialindeed. Then when rains at last came and softened the hot baked ground and crops were sown the dreadful locusts cut off all hope of reaping from the precious grain. Again the weakened Cebuans had gathered strength, and borrowed to obtain grain for sowing. While this last crop was growing the devastating flood and hurricane came, bearing with its terrible winds the dreadful locust pest which visits sections of the Philippines periodically and which so often follows a storm.

Clearing Away the Wreckage and Preparing to Rebuild in Cebu

"Christians at home have linked the poor Cebuan converts' hearts to theirs by the sympathy and compassion that have been shown them. More than ever grateful to God and the home friends are the poor Christian parents whose children were preserved from death through the awful time of danger just past by being housed in the more strongly built mission schools.

These Cebuan Christians have, in accepting the faith taught by the Gospel, cast in their lot with their foreign friends, and by so doing to greater or less measure from the day they became Christians linked their lives with their fellow believers of whatever race they might be."

elements and stirred them into one; and when the stirring stopped they slowly separated."

"And who," he asked, "stopped the stirring?"

I did not answer. He shifted the bag from one shoulder to the other. I offered to relieve him for a while, but he shook his head.

"We have all our own burdens to carry," he said, "and the burdens of others. I carry the burdens of many. Friend, let me ease you of some of yours. I will take up your parable of the elements that mingled together only so long as emotion stirred. It was love which stirred you and your princess, was it not?"

"We called it so," I replied. "It seems that this was our illusion. I suppose, nowadays, love is."

"Love is the greatest of illusions," he told me, "and nearest to the truth."

"What is truth?" I demanded.

"I have been asked that before," he replied, "and I have not answered. For no man can understand. But this I can tell you; that illusions make truth."

"Your parable is too hard for me," I confessed.

"I will make it easy," he promised. "Consider. A man dreams things which are not. If he only dreamed they would be only illusions; but he goes out into the world and fashions it to his ideas. The dreams of yesterday are the facts of to-day. So the poet sings of great deeds which never were; but his songs stir hearts to the deeds. It was the prince's kiss that made a sleeping woman a waking princess. Do you not understand?"

"Ah!" I said sadly. "They were a prince and princess; and we are a man and a woman—but she lacks little of the princess—in a world that kills romance. She is not . . . I cannot criticize my wife to you, sir."

He laid his hand on my shoulder.

"I bear the burdens of many," he said once more. "Speak of yourself. There is no fear that you will speak ill of your princess."

His touch seemed to win my confidence; and my heart was full to speech; and I spoke.

"I will tell you of a man and a princess," I said. "There was no unforgivable deed between them; no ill deed at all; no ill will, I think. . . . The man has none. God forbid that he should. They were just unsentimental."

"The princess was the less sentimental, perhaps."

"Perhaps. She had great dignity and self-respect. I—the man would not wish her different. Anyhow they could not help seeing the childishness of—of their illusion. They laughed away the romance, I think; and then there was nothing left to bind them. They were totally unlike. So they went their unlike ways. It is a separation of mind, and—and domestic life—that I mean. There is no open breach. There will not be. It isn't that they have altered. He is no less a prince than he was. Well, he wasn't. She was a princess; and she is. They are the same as they were. It is only the illusion—what they called love—which is lost.

"I think," the stranger remarked, "that the man was much more romantic than the princess. Perhaps that is part of the unlikeness?"

"Perhaps," I agreed. "Yes. I think the man was only superficially matter-of-fact. But he had more to stir romance. The princess was—is—so very beautiful. . . . Anyhow, his illusion has gone; and nothing can bring it back."

"Are you so sure that it has gone?" he asked. "Suppose some great danger threatened your princess? The fiery dragon of death—or life? It is the same dragon. Would you not stand between?"

"Of course," I said.

"And if it threatened you? Would not she—"

"Of course!" I said again. "But we haven't to fight dragons."

"Ah! You do not see them! Suppose she were ill? Hurt? In bitter trouble? . . . Friend, your face answers me. The illusion has not gone. It only sleeps. . . . Will you wait for it to be wakened by sorrow, or sickness, or death?"

I was silent for a time.

"I think," I said at last, "there is nothing less can wake our romance. There are harder things to win past than giants and dragons. . . . Indifference . . . ridicule. . . . You are very wise, sir; and you know that love is a double illusion. Perhaps I could wake half . . . I admire my princess so much. But the other half—if I went home and kissed my—my princess—I can see her raise her eyebrows and shrug herself. 'My lord is pleased to be merry to-night!' I can hear her say it."

"And suppose you told her that you were not merry but sad at the separation between you. You are sadder than you know, I think."

"Perhaps," I murmured. "Perhaps."

"Suppose you said, 'We loved each other very sweetly once, Princess. Shall we try again?' Are you sure that your princess would not reawaken?"

"Tolerably sure," I declared bitterly. "My princess would probably toss her head and walk off to her room. I can see her turn at the door, and suggest that 'Really, we are old enough to behave like rational beings.'"

"That seems to be your common illusion," the stranger told me. "You are more than rational beings. God who gave you minds gave you hearts."

"It may be an illusion," I answered; "but the dragon of the commonplace—the drag of the everyday upon our minds and hearts—is the greatest illusion in the world, I think. It will take a bigger sword than you bring in your bag to kill it."

He put his hand on my shoulder again; and this time his touch made me cold with fear.

"How do you know," he asked sternly, "what I may bring? How do you know what any year, any day, any hour may bring to one of you?"

He looked in my eyes, and his shone like seas of light. The snowy landscape glowed with a strange radiance. I thought the Visitor was more than earthly. If this was illusion, it mastered me, and I cried out: "If you bring sorrow, bring it to me, not to her."

His eyes softened and his touch grew gentle.

"I bring you memories," he said; and the strange light faded; and the Visitor was gone. I hardly missed him for a moment; for my whole mind was full of memory; memory so vivid that I seemed to live the past again.

I stood opposite Delse Village, remembering. Margaret and I had passed there this very night three years ago. The sound of carols came to us from the village, as it came to me now. It was a dark, wet night, and slushy under feet. We had walked through a drenching rain, and she paused, and took off her cap to wring it. I pressed her mass of glorious black hair between my hands and squeezed out the water. She laughed with her head hanging back, and her beautiful face turned upward. And I bent and kissed her wet cheek with sudden passion.

"You silly!" she cried; and her eyes still laughed. "I'm dripping! Let me go!"

But I held her fast.

"Haven't you an atom of romance, Margie?" I asked. I used to call her that sometimes; but no small pet-name could endure for queenly Margaret.

"Only—" She looked at me and laughed again. "Only Christmas," she said, with a teasing way that was unusual to her.

"I have another," I said. "You!"

"Have you? . . . Well, I'll give you a kiss, if you'll pull your poor cold romance along. . . . There! Now run!"

We ran for a little way. When we reverted to a walk, Margaret turned to me and spoke of romance—the only time ever.

"You have run your romance warm," she said gaily. "I suppose that is why—I am a very unsentimental person, Jack, as you suggest. My romances are atomic. . . . Such as they are, I recognize three: Christmas; me-to-you; you-to-me. . . They won't bear too much handling. Romances are—oh! like silky cobwebs that rough hands mustn't touch. . . . No! Gas-mantles after they've been flared!" She laughed quickly. She always ridiculed sentiment like that. "We'll put my cobwebs by till next Christmas; but . . . I'm going to surprise you."

She turned to me, put her arms round my neck, and deliberately kissed me; the only time she had ever done so unasked; and never since.

"Now, for goodness' sake, don't talk about it," she implored. "It just won't bear talk. I feel a big fool. We'll run again."

We ran; and I never spoke to her again of her unsolicited kiss. That,

"Perhaps I shall," she said quietly; "but not yet. I want to say something. Shall we walk on now?"

"May I kiss you again?"

"Yes."

I kissed her lips, and they returned the kiss faintly. I offered my arm, and she took it, and we walked on.

"I was sitting over the fire," she said in her still, rich voice, "after the last train was in. I knew you must be walking home, as we walked three years ago. I was thinking of that. I suppose I fell asleep, but I thought I was awake. There was a knock at the front door. I had sent the servants to bed. So I went and opened it. This part is a dream, of course; but I will tell it as if I was awake. Do not laugh."

"Dear," I promised, "I will not laugh."

"A man stood outside. He carried a great sack. His face was . . . I thought he was the—the Christmas Visitor." Her voice trembled.

"I think," I said huskily, "he was that. I, too, have dreamed."

"He said, 'I bring you a happy Christmas, friend'; and I said, 'You cannot bring me that.' He smiled and laid his hand on my arm. 'There is one coming along the road who can,' he told me. 'Come!' My hat and jacket were on the chair in the hall. I had left them there to take upstairs. I put them on and went with him." She paused.

"Yes," I said. "Yes?"

"It was a dream, of course; but I do not know when I woke out of it. We walked this way—the way that you would come. He spoke of the coolness that had come between me and—and the man who, in his heart, regarded me as a Princess—"

"Oh, Margaret!" I cried. "I do."

"The man whom, in my heart, I loved—"

"And you do?"

"And I do. . . . No, dear. Do not kiss me yet . . . You shall . . . It was only that our hearts were hidden away, he said; especially mine. 'He would not love you more, if you wore it on the surface,' he told me; 'it would be enough, if he knew it is there.' . . . He warned me not to hide it until it was discovered by sickness or sorrow or death. Jack, I am a proud woman; and I am very ashamed—not really ashamed; shame-faced—over my—my love!" She gave a quick cry. "I cannot talk of—of these things often. I did not think that I could even to-night; but you made it possible when we met . . . . Three years ago I uncovered my heart; and now—"

She stopped, put her arms round me, kissed me once, twice, three times.

"That is for three years," she told me, flushing, and putting on her hat. She was never so regally beautiful before. . . . . .

"You don't mean that you won't kiss me again till next Christmas eve, Margaret?"

"I will kiss you back whenever you kiss me—but you mustn't too often—and perhaps I will kiss you sometimes, if you ask. Please only sometimes. But not unasked. You understand me quite well, Jack; and you must take me as I am. Now! We can't talk of ordinary things; and we mustn't—handle romance. Some romances are—are shy. Mine is. Let's be very quiet, Jack."

I gave her my arm, and we walked in silence to our door, opened it and went in, but before we closed it I looked out.

"I do not see our Visitor," I said; and the thought of him made my voice hushed and awed.

Margaret turned back and stood beside me at the door. She put her arm through mine.

"He came to you, too?" she asked.

"To me, too," I said; and standing there in the moonlight, facing the white fairyland below, and the heavens above, I told her what passed.

"He said that illusions were nearest the truth," I concluded; "and perhaps this is." I looked up and down the road, and across the snowy fields. And presently I looked above.

"Our Visitor is gone," I said.

"No, dear," Margaret whispered. "He has come to stay with us, all the year, and every year. Our lives shall show; and our love—"

She put her arm round my neck, again unasked, and kissed me. Her face was wet with tears.

These immigrants had come to the long-dreamed-of America at the time of year when good-will and kindness were at the very floodtide. Rich and poor alike were craving the things of the spirit. It was the simple things they wanted and understood, these self-exiled peasants. For the first time real Christmas possessed them. The ancient thrill which touched the watching shepherds with the coming of the world's first Christmas held these simple, ignorant children in thrall. Christ was poor, Christ came as a little child, and because the spirit of the little child was leading them contentment wrapped them round.

into a pair of great, round blue eyes.

"Take me too," said a soft baby voice.

"But, honey," the man took a cold little hand in his and noticed with a start that it was ungloved, "where is your mamma, and your papa?"

"My papa wented long ago," said the sad baby voice; "he wented up to heaven. An' my mamma wented to stay with him yesterday, she tole me so. She said, 'Baby, God will take care of you,' but I can't find him nowhere."

"And what is your name, little girl?" asked the Rich Man, with a sob in his voice.

"Mary," said the tiny girl, "Mary after my mamma."

"Mary," repeated the man, "and have you no other name? Mary—Mary—Mary what?"

"Mary Christmas," said the little girl solemnly.

"It is an omen," said the Rich Man, and with her hand in his they started uptown for the big waiting house.

CHRISTMAS Day broke over the land. A cold snowy Christmas that promised wonderful coasting and sleighing. Again the Rich Man sat before his fire. But he was not alone. A tiny girl was sleeping in the room above, tangled curls framing a flushed baby face; and a fat stocking was hanging over the fireplace that was built to hang stockings at.

hard—not to say it. You see I've played it so long."

"You've—what?" demanded Aunt Polly.

"Played it—the game, you know, that father—" Pollyanna stopped with a painful blush at finding herself so soon again on forbidden ground.

Aunt Polly frowned and said nothing. The rest of the meal was a silent one. Pollyanna was not sorry to hear Aunt Polly tell the minister's wife over the telephone, a little later, that she would not be at the Ladies' Aid meeting that afternoon, owing to a headache. Pollyanna knew that the Ladies' Aid met at two o'clock in the chapel next the church, not quite half a mile away. She planned her going, therefore, so that she should get there a little before three.

"I want them all to be there," she said to herself; "else the very one that wasn't there might be the one who would be wanting to give Jimmy Bean a home—and, of course, two o'clock always means three, really—to Ladies' Aiders."

Quietly, but with confident courage, Pollyanna ascended the chapel steps, pushed open the door and entered the vestibule. A soft babel of feminine chatter and laughter came from the main room. Hesitating only a moment Pollyanna pushed open one of the inner doors. The chatter dropped to a surprised hush. Pollyanna advanced a little timidly. Now that the time had come, she felt unwontedly shy. After all, these half-strange, half-familiar faces about her were not her own dear Ladies' Aid.

"How do you do, Ladies' Aiders?" she faltered politely. "I'm Pollyanna Whittier. I—I reckon some of you know me, maybe; anyway, I do you—only I don't know you all together this way. I—I have come to lay the case before you," she stammered, unconsciously falling into her father's familiar phraseology.

There was a slight rustle.

"Did—did your aunt send you, my dear?" asked Mrs. Ford, the minister's wife.

Pollyanna colored a little.

"Oh, no. I came all of myself. You see, I'm used to Ladies' Aiders. It was Ladies' Aiders that brought me up—with father."

Somebody tittered hysterically, and the minister's wife frowned.

"Yes, dear. What is it?"

"Well, it—it's Jimmy Bean," sighed Pollyanna. "He hasn't any home except the Orphans' one, and they're full and don't want him, anyhow, he thinks; so he wants another. He wants one of the common kind, you know, that begins with a little h, and that has folks in it. He's twelve years old going on thirteen. I thought some of you might like him—to live with you, I mean."

"Well, did you ever!" murmured a voice, breaking the dazed pause that followed Pollyanna's words.

With anxious eyes Pollyanna swept the circle of faces about her.

"Oh, I forgot to say—he will work," she supplemented eagerly.

Still there was silence; then, coldly, one or two women began to question her. After a time they all had the story and began to talk among themselves, animatedly, not quite pleasantly.

Pollyanna listened with growing anxiety. Some of what was said she could not understand. She did gather, after a time, however, that there was no woman there who had a home to give him, though every woman seemed to think that some one of the others might take him, as there were several who had no little boys of their own already in their homes. But there was no one who agreed herself to take him. Then she heard the minister's wife suggest timidly that they, as a society, might perhaps assume his support and education.

A great many ladies talked then, and several of them talked all at once, and even more loudly and more disagreeably than before. It was all very confusing, and not quite pleasant, so that Pollyanna was glad, indeed, when at last she found herself outside in the hushed, sweet air—only she was very sorry, too; she knew it was not going to be easy, or anything but sad, to tell Jimmy Bean to-morrow that the Ladies' Aid had decided that they did not want him.

Pollyanna had not turned her steps toward home when she left the chapel. She had turned them, instead, toward Pendleton Hill.

"I don't have to get home till half past five, anyway," she was telling herself, "and it'll be so much nicer to go around by the way of the woods, even if I do have to climb to get there."

It was very beautiful in the Pendleton woods, as Pollyanna knew by experience. But to-day it seemed even more delightful than ever, notwithstanding her disappointment over what she must tell Jimmy Bean to-morrow.

"I wish they were up here—all those women who talked so loud," sighed Pollyanna to herself, raising her eyes to the patches of vivid blue between the sunlit green of the tree-tops. "Anyhow, if they were up here, I just reckon they'd change and take Jimmy Bean for their little boy, all right," she finished, secure in her conviction, but unable to give a reason for it, even to herself.

Suddenly Pollyanna lifted her head and listened. A dog had barked some distance ahead. A moment later he came dashing toward her, still barking.

"Hullo, doggie—hullo!" Pollyanna snapped her fingers at the dog and looked expectantly down the path. She had seen the dog once before, she was sure. He had been then with the Man, Mr. John Pendleton. She was looking now, hoping to see him; but he did not appear. Then she turned her attention toward the dog, who was acting strangely. He was still barking—little short, sharp yelps, as if of alarm. He was running back and forth, too, in the path ahead. Soon they reached a side path, and down this the little dog fairly flew, only to come back at once, whining and barking.

"Ho! That isn't the way home," laughed Pollyanna, still keeping to the main path.

The dog seemed frantic now. Back and forth, back and forth, between Pollyanna and the side path he vibrated, barking and whining pitifully. Every quiver of his little brown body and every glance from his beseeching brown eyes were eloquent with appeal, so eloquent that at last Pollyanna understood, turned, and followed him.

Straight ahead now, the dog dashed madly; and it was not long before Pollyanna came upon the reason for it all: a man lying motionless at the foot of a steep, overhanging mass of rock a few yards from the side path. A twig cracked sharply under Pollyanna's foot, and the man turned his head. With a cry of dismay Pollyanna ran to his side.

"Mr. Pendleton! Oh, are you hurt?"

"Hurt? Oh, no, I'm just taking a siesta in the sunshine," snapped the man irritably. "See here, how much do you know? What can you do? Have you got any sense?"

Pollyanna caught her breath with a little gasp, but, as was her habit, she answered the questions literally, one by one.

"Why, Mr. Pendleton, I—I don't know so very much, and I can't do a great many things; but most of the Ladies' Aiders, except Mrs. Rawson, said I had real good sense. I heard 'em say so one day—they didn't know I heard, though."

The man smiled grimly.

"There, there, child, I beg your pardon, I'm sure; it's only this confounded leg of mine. Now listen." He paused, and with some difficulty she paused a moment and looked ly through the vestibule to the omber hall beyond, her thoughts

irl. This was John Pendleton's house; the house of mystery; the house into which no one but its master entered; the house which sheltered, somewhere — a skeleton. Yet she, Pollyanna, was expected to enter alone these fearsome rooms, and telephone the doctor that the master of the house lay now—

With a little cry Pollyanna, looking neither to the right nor the left, fairly ran through the hall to the door at the end and opened it. The room was large, and somber with dark woods and hangings like the hall; but through the west window the sun threw a long shaft of gold across the floor, gleamed dully on the tarnished brass andirons in the fireplace, and touched the nickel of the telephone on the great desk in the middle of the room. It was toward this that Pollyanna hurriedly tiptoed.

The telephone card was not on its hook; it was on the floor. But Pollyanna found it, and ran her shaking forefinger down through the C's to "Chilton." In due time she had Dr. Chilton himself at the other end of the wires, and was tremblingly delivering her message and answering the doctor's terse, pertinent questions. This done, she hung up the receiver and drew a long breath of relief. Only a brief glance did Pollyanna give about her; then with a confused vision in her eyes of crimson draperies, book-lined walls, a littered floor, an untidy desk, innumerable closed doors (any one of which might conceal a skeleton), and everywhere dust, dust, dust, she fled back through the hall to the great carved door, still half open as she had left it.

In what seemed to the injured man an incredibly short time, Pollyanna was back in the woods at his side.

"Well, what is the trouble? Couldn't you get in?" he demanded.

Pollyanna opened wide her eyes.

"Why, of course I could! I'm here," she answered. "As if I'd be here if I hadn't got in! And the doctor will be right up just as soon as possible with the men and things. He said he knew just where you were, so I didn't stay to show him. I wanted to be with you."

"Did you?" smiled the man, grimly. "Well, I can't say I admire your taste. I should think you might find pleasanter companions."

"Do you mean—because you're so—cross?"

"Thanks for your frankness. Yes."

Pollyanna laughed softly.

"But you're only cross outside—you aren't cross inside a bit!"

"Indeed! How do you know that?" asked the man, trying to change the position of his head without moving the rest of his body.

"Oh, lots of ways; there—like that—the way you act with the dog," she added, pointing to the long, slender hand that rested on the dog's sleek head near him. "It's funny how dogs and cats know the insides of folks better than other folks do; isn't it? Say, I'm going to hold your head,' she finished abruptly.

The man winced several times and groaned once softly while the change was being made; but in the end he found Pollyanna's lap a very welcome substitute for the rocky hollow in which his head had lain before.

"Well, that is better," he murmured faintly.

He did not speak again for some time. Pollyanna, watching his face, wondered if he were asleep. She did not think he was. He looked as if his lips were tight shut to keep back moans of pain. Pollyanna herself almost cried aloud as she looked at his strong body lying there so helpless.

At last the dog pricked up his ears and whined softly; then he gave a short, sharp bark. The next moment Pollyanna heard voices, and very soon their owners appeared—three men carrying a stretcher and various other articles. The tallest of this party, a smooth-shaven, kind-eyed man whom Pollyanna knew by sight as "Dr. Chilton," advanced cheerily.

"Well, my little lady, playing nurse?"

"Oh, no, sir," smiled Pollyanna. "I've only held his head—I haven't given him a mite of medicine. But I'm glad I was here."

"So am I," nodded the doctor, as he turned his absorbed attention to the injured man.

It is said that Sir Isaac Newton had an atheist among his acquaintances. It is well known that Sir Isaac Newton was a Christian as well as a philosopher and an astronomer. He had in his study a celestial globe on which was an excellent representation of the constellations and the stars which composed them. His atheistic acquaintance came one day to visit him, and was struck with the beauty of the globe. He approached it, and examined it, and said to Sir Isaac Newton, "Who made it?" "No one," replied the celebrated philosopher. The atheist understood and was silent.

Department of Investment Counsel

I AM often asked what are "Baby" Bonds, or what are Hundred Dollar Bonds, and if they are good investment securities. A "baby" bond, or the equivalent term—a $100 bond—is the exact one-tenth fraction of a $1,000 bond, every bit as good and every bit a bond. Some of these baby bonds are exceedingly good investment security for small investors, for they permit a diversification which minimizes risk. The trouble chiefly lies in the fact that so few bond issues of standard railways include bonds of one hundred dollar denomination that there are not enough to go around, and the law of supply and demand, stepping in, naturally effects a higher price for $100 bonds than the price of the $1,000 bonds. But the difference in price is but small and should not prejudice the small investor who is desirous of becoming a real bondholder.

About thirty different $100 bond issues are listed on the New York Stock Exchange. It is believed that in the future more corporations will see the wisdom of borrowing from small investors and will make it convenient for them to become financially interested in railway and industrial enterprises by cutting up part of their future bond offers into $100 denominations. An indication upon the part of heads of big corporations of regard for the savings of the wage-earner is expressed in the unqualified endorsement given "baby" or $100 bonds when Mr. Frank Trumbull, the chairman of the board of directors of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, in his speech at the banquet of the Investment Bankers' Association, said in discussing the best means of interesting capital in railway investment:

"One thing that will help bridge over the problem will be to peopleize our industries; that is, to make a wider and wider distribution of securities. There are four billions of dollars in the savings banks of this country. Think what effect on legislation and on the attitude of the people in all these matters if even one quarter of that amount could be directly in the hands of individuals in the shape of investments. Why do we go, hat in hand, to the peasants of France to get money for our railroads? If the savings bank depositors of America are satisfied with two or three per cent., can you not satisfy them with five or six per cent? Perhaps your association can devise ways of increasing from year to year the distribution of securities in smaller denominations. Why not try it? If you can help increase the savings of the people, will you not be widening the opportunities for your own business?"

The Financial World, in quoting Mr. Trumbull's remarks, says, commenting thereon:

"Yes, why not try it? Popularize or 'peopleize' our securities. And that can only be brought about by splitting them into small denominations, not only in $100 amounts, but make them as little, if need be, as $20. Think what would be the purchasing power of nearly 90,000,000 people, if only one out of ten bought a $20 bond annually! Here alone would exist a market that would absorb $180,000,000 in securities annually, not considering the thousands upon thousands who would buy in larger amounts. Once this becomes a practice, and it is certain in time to become such, then our corporations will be no longer forced to the necessity of going hat in hand, pleading to the French peasant and the Dutch burgher for their savings."

I have found no quotable value to your Narragansett silver and gold stock.

E. D., California.

This department cannot undertake to furnish advice upon land speculation. Ask the president of your local bank about the Sunny-Vale enterprise or visit the tract yourself and be somewhat guided by your own deduction.

I regard the Tampa (Fla.) Electric Railway 5 per cent. bonds with favor. In the Boston (Mass.) market you may possibly save a trifle off from par, but not much. Better let Wabash stock alone.

A. B. W., Utah.

I think well of Seattle Electric Company 5 per cent. bonds at 98; also Southern California Edison Company 5 per cent. bonds at 96; but I do not recommend either issue as coming within your requirement "strictly gilt edge."

D. D. M., Ohio.

You probably have received your notice that the owners of the first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds of American Felt Company have been notified that the bonds have been called for redemption at 110 per cent. or par and accrued interest on January 1, 1913, at the U. S. Mortgage & Trust Company, New York City.

Mrs. C. R. F., Michigan.

I have obtained an interview with Mr. Benjamin D. Haight, Special Deputy Superintendent of the Banking Department, State of New York, now liquidating the affairs of the New York Mortgage Company, Times Building, New York City, who tells me that all the bondholders of this company have been sent by his department two separate letters, which fully explain in concrete form all that the Banking Department has done to date in its efforts in liquidation. You doubtless have received these letters, so I need not quote in detail their contents. Mr. Haight also informs me that he believes the investors in this company will lose nothing.

T. W. M., Maryland.

Your inquiry involves a novel point and I acknowledge that you may be right; but, nevertheless, Seaboard Air-Line Railway Adjustment 5 per cent. Cumulative Income Bonds at 77 (Baltimore Stock Exchange quotation) do not appear wholly attractive to me from either a speculative or an investment viewpoint. By the specific terms surrounding these bonds the interest is paid only when earned. Up to the present interest has been paid promptly semi-annually, since August, 1910, when the reorganization of the road was effected and the receivers discharged. Moreover, the satisfactory earnings of the road justify the belief that the interest payments will be continued. I have no fear of that. Still the menace of the terms of the bonds is there just the same. Hence the low price. These bonds sold at 70 in 1909 when they were issued. They have never been above 84⅛.

J. B., New York.

You state that you paid $4.75 for Goldfield Consolidated, and it is now quoted at $1.20. You ask for a reason for the "slump" in price. In a broad way, it is an axiom that a mining company never earns or pays a dividend. The $23,830,819 the Goldfield Consolidated Company has paid out in cash to the shareholders represents money taken out of the property that cannot ever be put back or ever be paid again. Unlike a manufacturing enterprise that creates a constant product out of raw material and can continue its activities indefinitely, with but a small depreciation of its plant, a mine contains just so much gold or silver or copper—and no more—and when this store of metal is mined and marketed there can be no further production and the property becomes valueless. Goldfield Cons. cannot dig gold forever. Some day the last available ounce of gold will have been reclaimed. Some day the last dividend will be declared. Now the question is, when will that unfortunate day come? I don't know, and I don't believe any one knows, even the directors. I believe the present price of the stock around $1.50 and the fact that the directors at their annual meeting held December 5 voted to pass the next dividend, furnish a somewhat satisfactory forecast of the extent of the ore reserves. Preceding the action of the directors December 5 regarding the dividend, preliminary unofficial reports for the October production showed that the company has not been earning its dividend requirements by about $400,000.

ON CHRISTMAS DAY IN THE MORNING

CHRISTMAS gifts! Christmas gifts! This holiday number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is like the measures in the Bible that were pressed down and running over with good things.

Do not stop this week, my boys and girls, at our Cozy Corner where there is not room enough, by far, for all the Christmas pleasures we would have liked to crowd into it, but turn to the Christmas editorial on page 1286. You are all included in its message and goodwill. Sing the Christmas song and learn the Christmas poems by heart. Do not miss the sweet message of the Sunday school lesson, nor Miss Sangster's charming Christmas story. And I am certain you will enjoy the beautiful Christmas cover, which is a copy of one of the great pictures of the world. It hangs in the Madrid Gallery in Spain, and is worth a king's ransom. Then there is Pollyanna—did you ever know such a dear Christmasy girl as Pollyanna?—and a dozen other delightful surprises besides.

This, you see, is your own festival, when all the world is paying tribute to little children, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sends out a greeting to you which rings round and round the world.

But there is one thing all among your gifts and greetings of which I want to remind you.

Listen, My Dears

Young people very generally have an idea that the principal pleasure of the Christmastide is the pleasure of receiving gifts, and just here their Christmas ends. They will never know until they try, that the greatest joy of all is the deep Christmas joy of giving.

"But what can we give?" you ask. "We are only children."

Listen, dears: Give back to those who are no longer care-free little children the sweet gift of your merry and grateful selves. This is gift-giving indeed. No frowns nor tears nor disappointments at the Christmas season, if you please. Will you all remember this? Perhaps if you tell yourselves that in groups of happy children everywhere at this blessed time, lo here and lo there, the Christ child is among you, it will help you in your Christmas giving of love and gladness to point the way to the kingdom which Christ has said shall be ours when we older ones, like you, once more become just joyous, glad-hearted and happy little children in his sight.

Snow-Ships

HAVE you ever made a snow-ship? No? Well, if Christmas Day is all fluffy and snowy and you want an all-round exciting afternoon just rig up a snow-ship or two or even a small fleet of them and get up a boat race with yourself or your chum. You will have all the fun you are looking for then.

Take a medium-sized pasteboard box with a lid. Cut holes in the sides and top for two horizontal sticks and the mast to pass through. Fasten the sticks firmly together inside the box, and, after slipping the cover over the mast make the sticks secure in their places with sealing-wax. This will hold things trig and steady. Now rig up a paper muslin sail on a wooden arm at right angles with the top of the mast, fasten a stout cord from the lower left-hand corner of the sail to the end of the stick projecting from what would be the stern of the ship, and lastly, out of bent tin fastened to a bit of pine board, make a shoe or kind of runner to fasten on the bottom of the boat. You will discover how perfectly simple the mechanism of a snow-ship is when you begin to make one, and every bright boy will adopt some novel ideas of his own.

I have seen snow-ships all the way from five inches to five feet long, and last Christmas our boys at home rigged up a fleet of a dozen fliers, and the jolliest part of our Christmas Day was watching the pretty things in their vari-colored sails drive over the smooth snow like things bewitched.

"I feel like a new man— Sanatogen certainly did help MY nerves"

THE greatest boon vouchsafed any man is good health. And thousands of men and women to-day tender grateful tribute to the remarkable revitalizing power of Sanatogen in aiding them to find their way back to health and strength.

If YOUR nerves have given way under the overtaxing strain of illness, overwork or worry, if your daily work is toilsome effort, if digestion is an uncertain, discomforting function, if you lack ambition in even the little things of life—it is high time you gave serious and thoughtful heed to the crying demands of your nerves for help. You may do well to consider whether Sanatogen will do for you what these multitudes of men and women have said in writing it has done for them.

Sanatogen offers a natural food-tonic for overworked nerves in its combination of purest protein and organic phosphorus. This combination feeds the nerves with the elements they require and in a form that is easily and readily digested. There is no tax on the stomach—no artificial stimulation to urge on the tired, hungry nerves. It reaches the nerve cells, supplying them with the material they need and helping other foods to nourish and invigorate.

That Sanatogen has meant renewed health and ambition for a vast number of men and women is significant—that it has won the enthusiastic praise and written endorsement of over 16,000 physicians may suggest Sanatogen as the logical answer to the demands of your nerves.

THREE FRIENDS

Marie, Postum and Jack

(A story of fiction bristling with facts)

"Yes, Postum is one of our best friends, Jack, because it made our marriage possible.

"When we first met, you remember, I was rather a sorry specimen.

"Thin, sallow and so nervous and irritable that I must have been an unpleasant nuisance to everyone.

"Then came the knowledge that coffee had broken down my nervous system and was slowly killing me.

"Within a week after the change to Postum I began to digest my food because the old poison—caffeine, in coffee—was withdrawn and my whole nervous system began to rebuild, and I grew round and comfortable. As a nervous wreck I could never hope to win you for a husband, Jack. But now all is changed and we are happy and healthy."

Nowadays Postum comes in powdered form—called
